16. But they that escape of them shall escape, and shall be on the mountains like doves of the valleys, all of them mourning, every one for his iniquity. 17. All hands shall be feeble, and all knees shall be weak as water. 18. They shall also gird themselves with sackcloth, and horror shall cover them; and shame shall be upon all faces, and baldness upon all their heads. 19. They shall cast their silver in the streets, and their gold shall be removed: their silver and their gold shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord: they shall not satisfy their souls, neither fill their bowels; because it is the stumbling-block of their iniquity. 20. As for the beauty of his ornament, he set it in majesty; but they made the images of their abominations, and of their detestable things therein: therefore have I set it far from them. 21. And I will give it into the hands of the strangers for a prey, and to the wicked of the earth for a spoil; and they shall pollute it. 22. My face will I turn also from them, and they shall pollute my secret place: for the robbers shall enter into it, and defile it.

We have attended the fate of those that are cut off, and are now to attend the flight of those that have an opportunity of escaping the danger; some of them shall escape, (v. 16.) but what the better? As good die once, as, in a miserable life, die a thousand deaths, and escape only like Cain, to be fugitives and vagabonds, and afraid of being slain by every one they meet; so shall these be. 1. They shall have no comfort or satisfaction in their own minds, but be in a continual anguish and terror; for, wherever they go, they carry about with them guilty consciences, which make them a burden to themselves. 2. They shall be always solitary, and under presentiments of danger, so they shall not be in the cities, or places of conourse, but all alone upon the mountains, not caring for society, but shy of it, as being ashamed of the low circumstances to which they are reduced. 3. They shall be always sorrowful. Those have reason to be so that are under the token of God's displeasure: and God can make those so, that have been most joyful, and have set sorrow at defiance. They that once thought themselves as the lions of the mountains, so daring were they now become as the doves of the valleys, so timid are they, and dispirited, ready to flee when none pursues, and tremble at the shaking of a leaf. They are all of them mourning, not with a godly sorrow, but with the sorrow of the world, which works death, every one for his iniquity, for those calamities which they now see their iniquity has brought upon them; not only the iniquity of the land, but the iniquity of the house of Israel shall then be brought to acknowledge what they have each of them contributed to the national guilt. Note, Sooner or later sin will have sorrow of one kind or other; and those that will not repent of their iniquity may justly be left to pine away in it; those that will not mourn for it as it is an offence to God, shall be made to mourn for it as it is a shame and ruin to themselves; it is known at last, when the flesh and the body are consumed, and to say, How have I hated instruction! Prov. v. 11.

3. They shall be deprived of all their strength of body and mind; (v. 17.) All hands shall be feeble, so that they shall not be able to fight, or defend themselves, and all knees shall be weak as water, so that they shall not be able to flee, or to stand their ground: they shall feel a universal colliquation; their knees shall be as water, so that they must fall of course. Note, It is folly for the strong man to glory in his strength, for God can soon weaken it. 4. They shall be deprived of all their hopes, and shall abandon themselves to despair, (v. 18.) they shall have nothing to hold up their spirits with, their aspect shall show what are their prospects, all dreadful, for they shall gird themselves with sackcloth, as having no expectation ever to wear better clothing; horror shall cover them, and shame, and baldness, all the expressions of a desperate sorrow. Isa. xxvii. 11. Note, Those that will not be kept from sin by fear and shame, shall by fear and shame be punished for it; such is the confusion that sin will end in.

II. They shall have no benefit from their wealth and riches, but shall be perfectly sick of them, v. 19. They that were reduced to this distress, were such as had had abundance of silver and gold, money, and plate, and jewels, and other valuable goods; from which they promised themselves a great deal of advantage in times of public trouble; they thought it would be their strong city, that with it they could bribe enemies and buy friends, that it would be the ransom of their lives, and that they could never be deprived of it; they had money and goods, and that money would answer all things: but see how it proved: 1. It had been a great temptation to them in the day of their prosperity; they set their affections upon it, and put their confidence in it; by their eager pursuit of it they were drawn into sin, and by their plentiful enjoyment of it they were hardened in sin; and thus it was the stumbling-block of their prosperity. 2. It could not help them when they were in the day of their adversity; for, (1.) Their gold and silver could not protect them from the judgments of God; they shall not be able to deliver them in the day of the wrath of the Lord, they shall not serve to atone his justice, or turn away his wrath, or to screen them from the judgments he is bringing upon them. Note, Riches profit not in the day of wrath; (Prov. xi. 4.) they neither set them so high, that God's judgments cannot reach them, nor make them so strong, that they cannot conquer them. There is a day of wrath coming, when it will appear that men shall be punisht for their wickedness, and it will be too late to do them any service. What the better was the rich man for his full barns, when his soul was required of him; or that other rich man for his purple, and scarlet, and sumptuous fare, when in hell
he could not procure a drop of water to cool his tongue? Money is no defence against the arrest of death, nor any alleviation to the miseries of the next world. [5.] Their gods shall not help them, but not give them any content under their calamities.

1. They could not fill their bowels; when there was no bread left in the city, none to be had for love or money, their silver and gold could not satisfy their hunger, nor serve to make one meacli's meat for them. Note, We could better be without mines of gold than fields of corn; the products of the earth, which may easily be gathered from the surface of it, are much greater blessings to mankind
than its treasures, which are with so much difficulty and hazard digged out of its bowels. If God give us daily bread, we have reason to be thankful, and no reason to complain, though silver and gold we have none. [2.] Much less could they satisfy their souls, or yield them any inward comfort. Note,
The wealth of this world does not consist in a gold that will answer the desires of the soul, or be any satisfaction to it in a day of distress. He that loves silver shall not be satisfied with silver, much less he that loses it. (3.) Their gold and silver shall be thrown into the streets, either by the hands of the enemy, who shall have more spoil that they care for, or can carry away; silver shall be nothing accounted of,
it shall cast that in the streets, but the gold which is more valuable, shall be removed, and brought to Babylon; or, they themselves shall throw away their silver and gold, either because it would be an encumbrance to them, and retard their flight,
or because it would expose them, and be a temptation to the enemy to cut their throats for their monney; or, in indignation at it, because they found that after all the care and pains they had taken to scrape
it together and heap it up, they found it would stand in no stead, but do them a mischief rather. Note, The world passes away, and the lust thereof, 1 John ii. 17. The time may come when worldly men will be as weary of their wealth as now they are wedded to it, when those fare best that have least.

II. God's temple shall stand in no stead, v. 20.-22.
This they had prided themselves in, and promised themselves security from; (Jer. vii.
4. Mic. iii. 11.) but this confidence of theirs shall fail them. Observe, 1. The great honour God had done to that people in setting up his sanctuary among them; (v. 20.) For the beauty of his or-ament, that holy and beautiful house, where they and their fathers trusted God. (1 Sam. i. 1.) which was therefore beautiful because holy. It was called the beauty of holiness, and that is the beauty of its ornament; it was also adorned with gold and gifts; as for this, he set it in majesty, everything was contrived to make it magnificent, that it might help to make the people of Israel the more illusrious among their neighbours. He built his sanctuary, and their fathers prevailed (1 Sam. i. 15.)
He gave a glorious high throne from the beginning, 1 Chr. xvii.
12. But, 2. Here is the great dishonour they had done to God in profaning his sanctuary; they made the images of their counterfeit deities, which they set up in rivalry with God, and which are here
called their abominations, and their detestable things, (these they were to God, and so they should have been to them,) and these they set up in God's temple, than which a greater affront could not be put upon him. And therefore, 3. It is here threatened that they shall be deprived of the temple; and it shall be no succour to them, Therefore have I set fire from the midst of them, saith the Lord, to burn out of the reach of their services, and they shall not reach the reach of its influences. Note, God's ordinances, and the privileges of a profession of religion, will justly be taken away from those that despise and profane them. Nay, they shall not only be kept at a distance from the temple, but the temple itself
shall be involved in the common desolation; (v. 21.)
the Chaldeans, who are strangers, and for whom they have no veneration for it, who are the wicked of the earth, and therefore have an antipathy to it, shall have it for a prey and for a spoil; all the ornaments and treasures of it shall fall into their hands, who will make no difference between that and other plunder. This was a grief to the saints in Zion, who complained of nothing so much as of that which the enemy did wickedly in the sanctuary; (Ps. lxix.
3.) but it was the punishment of the sinners in Zion,
who by profaning the temple with strange gods,
provoked God to suffer it to be profaned by strange nations, and to turn his face from them that did it, as if he had not seen them and their crimes; and from them that deprecated it, as not regarding them and their prayers. Let the soldiers do as God commands them, and let them enter into the house of God, and let them pollute it, its defence is departed, and then farewell all its glory. Note, These are unworthy to be honoured with the form of godliness, who will not be governed by the power of godliness.

23. Make a chain; for the land is full of bloody crimes, the city is full of violence.
24. Wherefore I will bring the worst of the heathen, and they shall possess their houses: I will also make the pomp of the strong to cease,
and their holy places shall be defiled.
25. Destruction cometh; and they shall seek peace, and there shall be none. 26.
Mischief shall come upon mischief, and rumour shall be upon rumour; then shall they seek a vision of the prophet: but the law shall perish from the priest, and counsel from the ancients. 27. The king shall mourn, and the prince shall be clothed with desolation, and the bands of the people of the land shall be troubled: I will do unto them after their way, and according to their deserts will I judge them; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

Here is,
The prisoner arraigned; Make a chain, in which to drag the criminal to the bar, and set him
before the tribunal of Divine Justice; let him stand in fetters, (as a notorious malefactor,) stand pinioned or to receive his doom. Note, Those that break the bands of God's law asunder, and cast away these cords from them, will find themselves bound and held by the chains of his judgments, which they cannot break or cast from them. The chain signified the siege of Jerusalem, and the chains of the law that were carried into captivity, or that they were all bound over to the righteous judgment of God, reserved in chains.

II. The indictment drawn up against the prisoner; The land is full of bloody crimes, (full of the judgments of blood, so the word is,) of the guilt of blood which they had shed, under the solemnity of a judgment. The innocent blood which Manasses shed, probably thus shed, by the judgment of the blood, was the measure-filling sin of Jerusalem, 2 Kings xxiv. 4. Or, It is full of such crimes as by the law were to be punished with death, the judgment of blood; idolatry, blasphemy, witchcraft, sodomy, and the like, were bloody crimes, for which particular sinners were to die; and therefore when they were become national, there was no remedy; but the nation must be cut off. Note, Bloody crimes will be punished with bloody judgments. The city, the city of David, the holy city, that should have been the pattern of righteousness, the protector of it, and the punisher of wrong, is now full of violence; the rulers of that city, having greater power and reputation, are greater oppressors than any others. This was sadly to be lamented. How is the better to warn them of danger! 3. III. Judgment given upon this indictment. God will recompense them not only for the profaning of his sanctuary, but for the perversion of justice between man and man; for as holiness becomes his house, so the righteous Lord loves righteousness, and is the Avenger of unrighteousness. Now the judgment given is, 1. That they had walked in the way of the heathen, and done worse than they; God would bring the worst of the heathen upon them to destroy them and lay them waste, the most barbarous and outrageous, that have the least compassion to mankind, and the greatest antipathy to the Jews. Note, Of the heathen some are worse than other, and God sometimes picks out the worst to be a scourge to his own people, because he intends them for the worst when the work is done. 2. That since they had filled their houses with goods unjustly gotten, and used their pomp and power for the crushing and oppressing of the weak, God would give their houses to be possessed, and all the furniture of them to be enjoyed, by strangers, and make the pomp of the strong to cease, so that their great men should not dazzle the eyes of the weak-sighted with their pomp, nor with their might at any time prevail against right, as they had done. 3. That since they had defiled the holy places with their idolatries, God would defile them with his judgments; since they had set up the images of other gods in the temple, God would remove the tokens of the presence of his own God. When the holy places are desecrated by their God, they will so be defiled by his enemies. 4. Since they had followed one sin with another, God would pursue them with one judgment upon another; Destruction comes, utter destruction, (v. 25.) for there shall come mischief upon mischief to ruin you, and rumour upon rumour to frighten you; like the waves in a storm, one upon the neck of another. Note, Sinners that are marked for ruin shall be prosecuted to it, for God will overcome with juinges. 5. Since they had disappointed God’s expectations from them, he would disappoint their expectations from him. For, (1.) They shall not have the deliverance out of their troubles that they expect. They shall seek peace; but they desire it, and pray for it, they shall endeavour it, and expect it, but there shall be more; their attempts both to court their enemies, and to conquer them, shall be in vain, and their troubles shall grow worse and worse. (2.) They shall not have the direction in the trouble that they expect; (v. 26.) They shall seek a vision of the prophet, shall desire, for their support under their troubles, to be assured of a happy issue out of them; they did not desire a vision to comfort themselves or of danger, but to give them deliverance; such messages they longed to hear; but the law shall perish from the priest, he shall have no words either of counsel or comfort to say to them: they would not hear what God had to say to them by way of conviction, and therefore he has nothing to say to them by way of encouragement. Counsel shall perish from the ancients; the elders of the people that should advise them what to do in this difficult juncture, shall be intimated and at their wits’ end. It is bad with a people when those that should be their counsellors, know not how to consider within themselves, consult with one another, or counsel them. 6. Since they had animated and encouraged one another to sin, God would dispirit and dishearten them all, so that they should not be able to make head against the judgments of God that were breaking in upon them. All orders and degrees of men shall lie down by consent under the load; (v. 27.) the king, that should inspire life into them, and a prince, that should lead them on to attack the enemy, they shall mourn, and be clothed with desolation, their heads and hearts shall fail, their politics and their courage; and then no wonder if the hands of the people of the land, that should fight for them, be troubled; none of the men of might shall find their hands. What can men contrive or do for themselves when God is departed from them, and appears against them? All their heads shall be faint, all in trouble, when God comes to judge them according to their deserts, and so make them know, to their cost, that he is the Lord, the God to whom vengeance belongs.

CHAP. VIII.

God, having given the prophet a clear foresight of the people’s miseries that were hastening on, here gives him a clear insight into the people’s wickedness, by which God was provoked to bring those miseries upon them; that he might justify God in all his judgments, might the more perfectly discover his purpose, and with the more satisfaction foretell their ruin. Here God, in vision, brings him to Jerusalem, to show him the sins that were committed there, though God had begun to contend with them; (v. 1...) and there he sees, 1. The image of jealousy set up at the gate of the altar, v. 5, 6. II. The elders of Israel worshipping all manner of images in a secret chamber, v. 7... 12. III. The women weeping for Tamar, v. 13, 14. IV. The men worshipping the sun, v. 15, 16. And then appeals to him whether such a provoking people should have any pity shown them, v. 17, 18. 1. And it came to pass in the sixth year, in the sixth month, in the fifth day of the month, as I sat in my house, and the elders of Judah sat before me, that the hand of the Lord God fell there upon me. 2. Then I beheld, and, lo, a likeness as the appearance of fire: from the appearance of his loins, even downward, fire; and from his loins, even upward, as the appearance of brightness, as the colour of amber. 3. And he put forth the form of a hand, and took me by the lock of my head, and the spirit lifted me up between the earth and the heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem, to the door of the inner gate that looketh toward the north, where was the seat of the image of jealousy, which provoketh to jealousy. 4. And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there, according to the vision that I saw in the plain. 5. Then said he unto me, Son of man, lift up thine eyes now the way toward the north. So I lifted up mine eyes the way toward the north, and behold, northward at the gate of the altar, this image of jealousy in the entry. 6. He said furthermore unto me, Son of man, seest thou what they do? even the great abominations that the house of Israel committeth here, that I should go far off from my sanctuary! But turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations.

Ezekiel was now in Babylon; but the messages of wrath he had delivered in the foregoing chapters were concerning Jerusalem, and the people there. But the threat of God was actual, and the trouble thereof the captives looked upon themselves to have peace or trouble; and therefore here he has a vision of what was done at Jerusalem, and this vision is continued to the close of the 11th chapter.

I. Here is the date of this vision. The first vision he had was in the fifth year of the captivity, in the fourth month, and the fifth day of the month. ch. 1, 2. This was six years after. Perhaps it was after he had lain 390 days on his left side, to bear the iniquity of Israel, and before he began the forty days on his right side, to bear the iniquity of Judah, for now he was sitting in the house, not lying. Note, God keeps a particular account of the messages he sends to us, because we will not only call us to account about them, but he may.

II. The opportunity is taken notice of, as well at the time. 1. The prophet is himself sitting in his house, in a sedate, composed frame, deep in contemplation. Note, The more we retreat from the world, and retire into our own hearts, the better frame we are in for communion with God: they that sit in their house, and are not called to the temple, shall in time be called. Or, he sat in his house, ready to preach to the company that resorted to him, but waiting for instructions what to say. God will communicate more knowledge to those who are communicative of what they do know.

2. The elders of Judah, that were now in captivity, were sitting in his house, and he prophesied. It is probable that it was on the sabbath-day, and that it was usual for them to attend on the prophet every sabbath-day, both to hear the word from him, and to join with him in prayer and praise: and how could they spend the sabbath better, now that they had neither temple nor synagogue, priest nor altar? It was a great mercy that they had opportunity to spend it so well, and the time of it, if it had been any paper. But some think it was on some extraordinary occasion that they attended him, to inquire of the Lord, and sat down at his feet to hear his word. Observe here, (1.) When the law was disestablished in the land, the people were left to chance. (2.) That the elders of Judah were in captivity, they paid more respect to God's prophets, and his word in their mouth, than they did when they lived in peace in their own land. When God brings men into the cords of affliction, then he opens their ears to discipline, Job xxxvi. 8, 10. Ps. cxliv. 6. Those that despised vision in the valley of vision, Ezek. xlviii. 3, 4, had the most of the Lord's grace, and there was then no open vision. (3.) When our teachers are driven into corners, and are forced to preach in private houses, we must diligently attend them there. A minister's house should be a church for all his neighbours. St. Paul preached in his own hired house at Rome, and God of old had promised, there is no man forsaken. (4.) The divine influence and impression that the prophet was now under; The hand of the Lord fell there upon me. God's hand took hold of him, and arrested him, as it were, to employ him in this vision, but at the same time supported him to bear it.

IV. The vision that the prophet saw: (v. 2.) he beheld a likeness of a man, we may suppose; for that was the likeness he saw before, but it was all brightness above the girdle, and all fire below; fire and flame. This agrees with the description we had before of the appearance he saw; (ch. i. 27.) it is probable that it was the same Person, the Man Christ Jesus. It is probable that the elders that sat with him, (as the men that journeyed with Paul,) saw a light, and were afraid, and this happy sight they gained by attending the prophet in a private manner, and an instinct of view of him that spoke to him, Acts xxii. 9.

V. The prophet's remove, in vision, to Jerusalem. The appearance he saw, put forth the form of a hand, which took him by a lock of his head, and the Spirit was that hand which was put forth, for the Spirit of God is called the Finger of God. Or, The spirit within him lifted him up, so that he was borne up and carried on by an internal principle, not an external violence. A faithful servant of God will be drawn by a hair, by the least intimation of the divine will, to his duty, for he has that within him which inclines him to a compliance with it, Ps. xxvii. 8. He was miraculously lifted up between heaven and earth, as if he were to fly away upon eagles' wings, as the prophet before supposed, (ch. xiv. 13.) the elders that sat with him saw: they were witnesses of the hand taking him by the lock of hair, and lifting him up, and then perhaps laying him down again in a trance or ecstasy, while he had the following visions, whether in the body or out of the body, we may suppose, he could not tell, any more than Paul in a like case, much less can we. Therefore, The hand lifted up the prophet (for God and the communications of divine light, that by divine grace are raised up above the earth and the things of it, to be out of their attractive force. But being lifted up toward heaven, he was carried in vision to Jerusalem, and to God's sanctuary there; for those that would go to heaven, must take that by their way. The Spirit represented to his mind the city and temple as if he were there in person. O that by faith we could thus enter into the Jerusalem, the holy city above, and see the things that are invisible!

VI. The discoveries that were made to him there. 1. There he saw the glory of God; (v. 4.) Behold, the glory of the God of Israel was there, the appearance of the living creatures, and all the wheels, and the throne, that he had seen, ch. i. Note, God's servants, wherever they are, and whithersoever they go, ought to carry about with them a believing regard to the glory of God, and to set that always before them: and those that have seen God's power and glory in the sanctuary, should desire to see it again, so as they have seen it, Ps. cxlv. 2. Pr. 2. But those that have the glory of God, both to give credit to, and to put honour upon, the following discoveries. But it seems to have a further intention here; it was to aggravate this sin of Israel, in changing their own God, the God of Israel, (who is a God of so much glory as here he appears to be,) for dunghill gods, scandalous and abominable. This aggravation of sin seems all the more glorious we see God to be, the more odious we shall see sin to be, especially idolatry, which turns his truth into a lie, his glory into shame. It was also to aggravate their approaching misery, when this glory of the Lord should remove from them, (ch. xi. 23.) and leave the house and city desolate.

2. There he saw the reproach of Israel—and that was the image of jealousy, set northward, at EZEKIEL, VIII.

The gate of the altar, v. 3, 5. What image this was, is uncertain probably, an image of God, or of the grove, which Manasseh made, and set in the temple, (2 Kings xx. 7. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14.) Josiah removed it all. If it was a necessary, it seems, religiously, to be placed; nor, probably did they part the chariots of the sun, which he found at the entering in of the house of the Lord; (2 Kings xxii. 11.) and this is here said to be in the entry. But the prophet, instead of telling us what image it was, which might gratify our curiosity, tells us that it was the image of jealousy, to convince our consciences that whatever image it was, it was in the highest degree offensive to God, and provoked him to jealousy; he resented it as a husband would resent the whoredoms of his wife, and would certainly revenge it; for God is jealous, and the Lord revenges, Nah. i. 2.

The very setting up of this image in the house of the Lord was enough to provoke him to jealousy; for it is in the matters of his worship that we are particularly told, The Lord thy God am a jealous God. They that placed this image at the gate of the inner court, where the people assembled, called the gate of the altar, (v. 5.) thereby plainly intended, (1.) To affront God, to provoke him to his face, by advancing an idol to be a rival with him for the adorations of his people, in contempt of his law, and in defiance of his justice. (2.) To debauch the people, and pick them up as they were entering into the courts of the Lord's house, to bring their offerings to him and worship his image, and tempt them to offer them to this image, like the adulteress Sodom describes, that sits at the door of her house, to call passengers who go right on their ways, Whoso is simple, let him turn in the hollow, Prov. ix. 14. With good reason therefore is this called the image of jealousy.

We may well imagine what a surprise, and what a grief it was to Ezekiel, to see this image in the house of God, and his was in hopes that the judgments they were under had, by this time, wrought some reformation among them; but there is more wickedness in the world, in the church, than good men think there is. And now, [1.] God appeals to him whether this was not bad enough, and a sufficient ground for God to go upon in casting off this people, and abandoning them to ruin. Could he or any other than God say that God should go far from his sanctuary, when there were such abominations committed there, in that very place; or, was he not perfectly driven thence? Did they do these things designedly, and on purpose that he should leave his sanctuary, and so shall their doom be; they have herby, in effect, like the Gadarines, desired him to depart out of their country, and therefore he will depart, he will no more dignify and protect his sanctuary, as he had done, but will give it up to reproach and ruin. But, [2.] Though this is bad enough, and serves abundantly to justify God in all that he brings upon them, yet the matter will appear to be much worse; but turn thee yet again, and thou wilt be amazed to see greater abominations than these. When there is one abomination, it will be found there are many more. Sins do not go alone.

7. And he brought me to the door of the court; and when I looked, behold, a hole in the wall. 3. Then said he unto me, Son of man, dig now in the wall, and when I had digg’d in the wall, behold, a door. 9. And he said unto me, Go in, and behold the wicked abominations that they do here. 10. So I went in and saw; and, behold, every form of creeping things, and abominable beasts, and all the idols of the house of Israel, pourtrayed upon the wall round about. 11. And there stood before them seventy men of the ancients of the house of Israel, and in the midst of them stood Jaazaniah the son of Shaphan, with every man his censer in his hand; and a thick cloud of incense went up. 12. Then said he unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen what the ancients of the house of Israel do in the dark, every man in the chambers of his imagery? for they say, The Lord seeth us not; the Lord hath forsaken the earth.

We have here a further discovery of the abominations that were committed at Jerusalem, and within the confines of the temple too. Now observe, I. How this discovery is made. God, in vision, brought him to the door of the court, the outer court, along the sides of which the priests’ lodgings were. God could have introduced him at first into the chambers of imagery, but he brings him to them by degrees, partly to employ his own industry, in searching out these mysteries of iniquity, and partly to make him sensible with what care and caution those idolaters concealed their idolatries. Before the priests’ apartments they had run up a wall, to make them more private, that they might not be open to the stares of those who professed; by or by, they had wall sights that they did something which they had reason to be ashamed of. He that doeth evil hateth the light. They were not willing that those who saw them in God’s house should see them in their own, lest they should see them contradict themselves, and undo in private what they did in public. But behold, a hole in the wall, (v. 7.) a spy-hole, by which you might see what was there, and give cause to suspect them. When hypocrites screen themselves behind the wall of an external profession, and with it think to conceal their wickedness from the eye of the world, and carry on their designs the more successfully, it is hard for them to manage it with so much art but that there is some hole or other left in the wall, something that betrays them to those who shall diligently search by; and as we have said, these are like to be. The ass’s ears in the fable appeared from under the lion’s skin. This hole in the wall Ezekiel made wider, and, behold, a door, v. 8. This door he goes in by into the treasury, or some of the apartments of the priests, and sees the wicked abominations that they do there, v. 9. Note, Those that would discover the mystery of iniquity in others, or in themselves, must accomplish a diligent search, for Satan has his will, depths, and devices, which we should not be ignorant of, and the heart is deceitful above all things; in the examining of it therefore we are concerned to be very strict.

II. What the discovery is; it is a very melancholy one. 1. He sees a chamber set round with idolatrous pictures; (v. 10.) All the idols of the house of Israel, which they had borrowed from the neighbouring nations, were pourtrayed upon the wall round about, even the vilest of them, the forms of creeping things, which they worshipped, and beasts, even abominable ones, which are poisonous and venomous; at least, they were abominable when they were worshipped. This was a sort of pantheon, a collection of all the idols together, which they paid their devotions to. Though the second commandment, in the letter of it, forbids only graven images, yet painted ones are as bad and as dangerous. 2. He sees this chamber filled with idolatrous worshippers; (v. 11.) There were seventy men of the elders of Israel offering incense to these painted idols. Here was a great number of idolaters strengthening one another's hands in this wickedness, though it was in a private character; and the indirectness concealed; yet here were seventy men engaged in it. I doubt these elders were many more than those in Babylon that sat before the prophet in his house, v. 1. They were seventy men, the number of the great Sanhedrim, or chief council of the nation, and we have reason to fear, the same men; for they were the ancient of the house of Israel, not only in age, but in office, who were bound, by the duty of their place, to strain and punish idolatry, and to destroy and abolish all superstitious images wherever they found them; yet these were they that did themselves worship them in private, so undermining that religion, which in public they professed to own and promote, only because by it they held their preferments. They had every man his censor in his hand; so bad were they of the idolatrous service, that they would all be their own priest; and very profligal they were of their perfumes in honour of these images, for a thick cloud of incense went up, that filled the room. O that the zeal of these idolaters might shame the worshippers of the true God out of their indifference to his service! The prophet took particular notice of one whom he knew to be of the high priests, or chief among them, being perhaps president of the great council at this time, or most forward in this wickedness. No wonder the people were corrupt, when the elders were so. The sins of leaders are leading sins.

3. What the remark is, that is made up in it; (v. 12.) Son of man, art thou a god? Couldst thou have imagined that there was such wickedness committed?" It is here observed concerning it, (1.) That it was done in the dark; for sinful works are works of darkness. They concealed it, lest they should lose their places, or at least their credit. There is a great deal of secret wickedness in the world, which the day will declare; the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God. (2.) That this one idolatrous chapel was but a specimen of many like it; here they met together, to worship their images in concert; but, it should seem, they had every man the chamber of his imagery besides, a room in his own house for this purpose, in which every man gratified his own fancy with such pictures as he liked best. Idolaters have their household gods, and their family-worship of them in private, which is a shame to those who call themselves Christians, and yet have no church in their house, no worship of God in their family. Had they chambers of devotion? (3.) That atheism was at the bottom of their idolatry. They worship images in the dark, the images of the gods of other nations, and they say, "Jehovah, Jehovah, the God of Israel, whom we have worshiped." Jehovah, Jehovah, that forsook the earth, and we worship what God will, we regard us not." [1.] They think themselves out of God's sight; they say, The Lord seeth us not. They imagined, because the matter was carried on so closely, that men could not discover it, nor did any of their neighbours suspect them to be the authors; whereas, it was discovered that we see the face of God: as if there were any darkness, or shadow of death, where the workers of iniquity may hide themselves. Note, A practical disbelief of God's omniscience is at the bottom of our treacherous departure from him; but the church argues right, as to this very sin of idolatry, (Ps. xlv. 20.)

If we have forgotten the name of our Lord, and stretched forth our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out? No doubt, he shall. [2.] They think themselves out of God's care; "The Lord has forsooken the earth," and looks not after the affairs of it; and thus we may as well worship any other god as him. Or, "He has forsooken our land, and left it to be a prey to its enemies; and therefore it is time for us to look out for some other god, to whom to commit the protection of our land, our one God cannot, or will not, deliver us; and therefore let us have many." This was a blasphemous reflection upon God, as if he had forsoaked them first, else they would not have forsaken him. Note, These are ripe indeed for ruin, who are arrived at such a pitch of impiety as to lay the blame of their sins upon God himself.

13. He said also unto me, Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations that they do. 14. Then he brought me to the door of the gate of the Lord's house which was toward the north; and beheld, there sat women weeping for Tammuz. 15. Then said he unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Turn thee yet again, and thou shalt see greater abominations than these. 16. And he brought me into the inner court of the Lord's house; and, behold, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar, were about five and twenty men, with their backs toward the temple of the Lord, and their faces toward the east; and they worshipped the sun toward the east. 17. Then he said unto me, Hast thou seen this, O son of man? Is it a light thing to the house of Judah that they commit the abominations which they commit here? for they have filled the land with violence, and have returned to provoke me to anger; and, lo, they put the branch to their nose. 18. Therefore will I also deal in fury: mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity; and though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them.

Here we have, 1. More and greater abominations discovered to the prophet. He thought that what he had seen was bad enough, and yet, (v. 13.) Turn thee again, and thou shalt see yet greater abominations, and greater still, (v. 15.) as before, v. 6. There are these who live in retirement, who do not think what wickedness there is in this world; and the more we converse with it, and the further we go abroad into the world, the more corrupt we see it to be. It is seen that which is bad, we may have our wonder at it made to cease by the discovery of that which, upon some account or other, is a great deal worse. We shall find it so in examining our own hearts, and searching into them; there is a world of iniquity in them, a great abundance and variety of abominations, and iniquities of which we have hitherto much amiss, still we shall find more; for the heart is desperately wicked, who can know it perfectly?

Now the abominations here discovered were, 1. Women weeping for Tammuz, v. 14. An abominable thing indeed, that any should choose rather to serve an idol in tears than to serve the true God with joyfulness and gladness of heart! Yet such absurdities as these are they guilty of, who follow after lying vanities, and forsake their own mercies. Some think it was for Adonis, an idol among the Greeks, others for Osiris, an idol of the Egyptians, that they shed these tears. The image, they say, was made to weep, and then the worshippers wept with it. They bewailed the death of this Tammany, and rejoiced in its returning to life again. These mourning women sat at the door of the gate of the Lord's house, and there shed their idolatrous tears, as it were in defiance of God and the sacred rites of his worship; and some think, with their idolatry, protrasting themselves also to corporal whoredom; for these two, commonly, went together; and they that disdained to divine nature and that are thus destitute of all reason and a reprobat sense, to dishonour the human nature, which no where ever sunk so far below itself as in these idolatrous rites.

2. Men worshipping the sun, v. 16. And this was so much the greater an abomination, that it was practised in the inner court of the Lord's house, at the door of the temple of the Lord, between the porch and the altar; there, where the most sacred rites of the holy religion were used to be performed, was this abominable wickedness committed; justly might God in jealousy say to those who thus affronted him at his own door, as the king to Haman, Will he force the queen also before me in the house? Here were about twenty-five men giving that honour to the sun which is due to God only; some think they were the king and his princes; it should rather seem, as John xxxi. 2. (2.) They turned their backs toward the temple of the Lord, resolvedly forgetting it, and designly eluding it, and putting contempt upon it. Note, Within men turn their backs upon God's institutions, and despise them, it is no marvel if they wander endlessly after their own inventions. Iniquity is the beginning of idolatry and all iniquity. (2.) They turned their faces toward the east, and worshipped the sun, the rising sun. This was an ancient instance of idolatry; it is mentioned in Job's time, (Job xxxi. 26.) and had been generally practised among the nations, so worshiping the sun upon the high places, and others over another; these priests, finding it had antiquity and general consent and usage on its side, (the two plea which the priests use at this day in defence of their superstitious rites, and particularly this of worshipping toward the east,) practised it in the court of the temple, thinking it an omission that it was not inserted in their ritual. See the folly of idolaters in worshiping that as a god, and to the Lord—a word, which God made to be a servant to the universe; (for such the sun is, and so his name Shemesh signifieth, Deut. iv. 19.) and in adoring the borrowed light, and despising the Father of lights!

II. The inference drawn from these discoveries; (v. 17.) "Hast thou seen this, O son of man, and couldest thou have thought ever to see such things done, as I command thee to do?" Now, 1. He appeals to the prophet himself concerning the heinousness of the crime. Can he think it is a light thing to the house of Judah, who know and profess better things, and are dignified with so many privileges above other nations? Is it an excusable thing in them that have God's oracles and ordinances, that they commit the abominations which they cannot here? Do not the Gentiles, to whom God has given that thus sin? Should not such abominations as these make devolate? Dan. ix. 27. 2. He aggravates it from the fraud and oppression that were to be found in all parts of the nation; They have filled the land with violence. It is not strange if they that wrong God thus, make no conscience of wronging one another, and with all that is sacred trampled likewise upon all that is just. And their wickedness in their conversations made even the worship they paid to their god an abomination; (Isa. l. 11, &c.) "They fill the land with violence, and they return to the temple to provoke me to anger there; for they receive their sacrifices, instead of making an atonement, do but add to their guilt; they return to provoke me, (they repeat the provocation, do it, and do it again,) and lo, they put the branch to their nose;" a proverbial expression, denoting perhaps their scoffing at God, and having him in derision; they smudled at his service, as men do when they put a branch to their nose. Or, it was some custom used by idolaters in honour of the idols they served. We read of garlands used in their idolatrous worship, (Acts xiv. 13.) cut of which every zealot took a branch, which they smelled to as a nosegay. Dr. Lightfoot (Hor. Heb. in Joh. xv. 6.) gives another sense of this place; They put the branch to their mouth, or to his mouth, as the Masorites read it; they are still bringing more fuel (such as the withered branches of the vine) to the fire of divine wrath, which they have already kindled, as if that wrath did not burn hot enough already. Or, putting the branch to the nose may signify the giving of a very great affront and provocation either to God or man; they are an abusive generation of men. 3. He condemned the priests as being among those that they shall be deeply cut off; Therefore because they are so furiously bent upon sin, I will also deal in fury with them, v. 18. They filled the land with their violence, and God will fill it with the violence of their enemies; and he will not lend a favourable ear to the suggestions, either, (1.) Of his own pity; Mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity; repentance shall be hid from his eyes; or, (2.) Of their prayers; Though they cry in mine ears with a loud voice, yet will I not hear them; for still their sins cry louder for vengeance than their prayers cry for mercy. God will now be as deaf to their prayers as their own idoles were, on whom they cried aloud, but in vain, 1 Kings xviii. 26. Time was when God was ready to have heard even before they cried, and to answer while they were yet speaking; but now they shall have their prayers, and not their due. Prov. 28. It is not the loud voice, but the upright heart, that God will regard.

CHAP. IX.

The prophet had, in vision, seen the wickedness that was committed at Jerusalem, in the foregoing chapter, and we may be sure that it was not represented to him worse than really it was; now here follows, of course, a representation of their ruin approaching; for when sin goes before, it is not long before it comes after. "The Lord made of instruments that were to be employed in the destruction of the city," v. 1, 2. II. The removal of the Shechinah from the cherubim to the threshold of the temple, v. 3. The vials, or vessels given to the priests for the consecration, were employed, who is distinguished from the rest, for the marking of a remnant to be preserved from the common destruction, v. 3, 4. IV. The warrant signed for the execution of those that were not marked, and the execution began accordingly, v. 5 to 7. V. The prophet's intercession for the mitigation of the sentence, and a denial of any mitigation, the decree being now gone forth, v. 8, 9, 11. Thus it was with a view to mark the pious remnant of what he had done in that matter, v. 11. And this shows a usual method of Providence in the government of the world.

1. He cried also in mine ears with a loud voice, saying, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near, even every man with his destroying weapon in his hand. 2. And, behold, six men came from the way of the higher gate, which lieth toward the north, and every man a slaughter-weapon in his hand; and one man among them was clothed with linen, with a writer's ink-horn by his side; and they went in, and stood beside the brazen altar. 3. And the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, wherupon he was, to the threshold of the house: and he called to the man clothed with linen, which had the writer's ink-horn by his side; 4. And the Lord said unto him, Go through the midst of the city, through the midst of Jerusalem, and set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh, and that cry, for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof.

In these verses, we have,

1. The summons given to Jerusalem's destroyers to come forth and give their attendance. He that appeared to the prophet, (ch. viii. 2.) that brought him to Jerusalem, and had shown the wickedness that was done there, he cried, Cause them that have charge over the city to draw near, (v. 1.) or, as it might better be read, and nearer the original, They that have charge over the city are drawing near. He had said, (ch. viii. 18.) I will deal in fury; Now, says he to the prophet, thou shalt see who are to be employed as the instruments of my wrath; Afterwards, upon the visitation of these cities-Civil wars, or visitors of the city are at hand. They would not know the day of their visitation in mercy, and now they are to be visited in wrath.

Observe, 1. How the notice of this is given to the prophet; He cried it in mine ears with a loud voice, which intimates the vehemency of him that spake; when men are highly provoked, and threaten in anger, they speak loud: they that regard not the counsels God gives them in a still, small voice, shall be made to hear the threatening, to hear and tremble. It denotes also the prophet's unwillingness to be told this; he was deaf on that ear, but there is no remedy, their sin will not admit an excuse, and therefore their judgment will not admit a delay; he cried it in mine ears, in a loud voice, he made me hear it, and I heard it with a sad heart.

2. What this notice is; There are those that have charge over the city to destroy it, not the Chaldean armies, they are to be indeed employed in this work, but they are not the visitors, they are only the servants, or tools rather. God's angels have received a charge now to lay that city waste, which they are in command to do, and with watch and wonder over; they are at hand, as destroying angels, as ministers of wrath, for every man hath his destroying weapon in his hand, as the angel that kept the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword. Note, Those that have by sin made God their Enemy, have made good angels their enemies too. These visitors are called and caused to draw near. Note, God had long had a charge to prove, and watch over; they are at hand, as destroying angels, as ministers of wrath, for every man hath his destroying weapon in his hand, as the angel that kept the way of the tree of life with a flaming sword. God told it him with a loud voice, taught it him with a strong hand, (Isa. vii. 11.) that it might make the deeper impression upon him, and that he might thus proclaim it in the people's ears.

II. Their appearance, upon this summons, is recorded. Immediately six men came, (v. 2.) one for each of the principal gates of Jerusalem. Two destroying angels were sent against Sodom, but six are sent against Jerusalem. The judgment will be thrice as heavy as that of Sodom. There is an angel watching at every gate to destroy, to bring in judgments from every quarter, and to take heed that none escape. One angel served to destroy the first-born of Egypt, and the camp of the Assyrians, but here are six. In the Revelation we find seven, that were to pour out the vials of God's wrath upon the earth.

3. The appearance of one of these angels, to the Chaldeans, prepared for the work to which they were called. The nations of which the king of Babylon's army was composed, which some reckon to be six, and the commanders of his army, (of whom six are named as principal, Jer. xxxix. 3.) may be called the slaughter-weapons in the hands of the angels. The angels are thoroughly furnished for every service.

Observe, 1. From whence they came; from the way of the higher gate, which lies toward the north; (v. 2.) either because the Chaldeans came from the north, (Jer. i. 14. Out of the north an evil shall break forth,) or because the image of jealousy was set up at the door of the inner gate, that looks toward the north, ch. viii. 3. 5. At that gate of the city, which the people that entered, repaired, to show how it was that opened the door to them. Note, That way that sin lies, judgment may be expected to come. 2. Observe where they placed themselves; They went in, and stood beside the brazen altar, on which sacrifices were wont to be offered, and atonement made. When they acted as destroyers, they acted as sacrificers, not from any personal reverence or holiness, but with a pure and sincere regard to the glory of God; for in his justice all they slew were offered up as victims. They stood by the altar, as it were, to protect and vindicate that, and plead its righteous cause, and avenge the horrid proclamation of it. At the altar they were to receive their commission to destroy, to intimate that the iniquity of Jerusalem, like that of Eli's house, was not to be purged by sacrifices.

III. The notice taken of one among the destroying angels distinguished in his habit from the rest, from whom some favour might be expected; it should seem, he was not one of the six, but among them, to see that mercy might be mixed with judgment, v. 2. This man was clothed with linen, as the priests were, and he had a writer's ink-horn hung at his side, as the scribes and priests' clerks had, which he was to make use of, as the other six were to make use of their destroying weapons. Here the honours of the pen exceeded those of the sword; they were angels that bore the sword, but he was the Lord of angels that made use of the writer's ink-horn; for it is generally agreed, among the best interpreters, that this man represented Christ our Mediator, seeing those that he has from the flaming sword of divine justice. He is our High Priest, clothed with holiness, for that was signified by the fine linen, Rev. xix. 8. As Prophet, he wears the writer's ink-horn—the book of life is the Lamb's book; the great things of the law and gospel which God has written to us, are of his writing; for it is the Spirit of Christ, in the writers of the scriptures, as our Mediator, saying those that he has from the revelation of Jesus Christ. Note, It is a matter of great comfort to all good Christians, that, in the midst of the destroyers and the destructions that are abroad, there is a Mediator, a great High Priest, who has an interest in heaven, and whom saints on earth have an interest in.

IV. The removal of the appearance of the divine glory from over the cherubim. Some think this was that usual display of the divine glory which was between the cherubims over the mercy-seat, in the most holy place, that took leave of them now, and never returned; for it is supposed it was not in the temple, but at Jerusalem. Others think the glory of the divine glory which the prophet now saw over the cherub in vision; and this is more probable, because this is called the glory of the God of Israel, (ch. viii. 3) and this is it which he had now his eye upon; this was gone to the threshold of the house, as it were to call to the servants that attended without the door, to send them on their errand, and give them the message upon the removal of their house, as well as the former, might be significant of God's departure from them, and leaving them their house desolate; and when God goes, all good goes; but he goes from none till they first drive him from them. He went at first no further than the threshold, that he might show how loath he was to depart, and might give them both time and encouragement to invite his return to them, and stay with them. Note, God's departures from a people are gradual, but gracious souls are soon aware of the first step he takes towards a removal. Ezekiel immediately observed that the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub: and what is a vision of angels, if God be gone? V. The charge given to the man clothed in linen to remain from the man from the general declaration of God. We do not read that this Saviour was summoned and sent for, as the destroyers were; for he is always ready, appearing in the presence of God for us, and to him, as the most proper Person, the care of those that are marked for salvation is committed. v. 4. Now observe, 1. The distinguishing character of this command that is to be saved. They are such as sigh and cry, sigh in themselves, as men in pain and distress, cry to God in prayer, as men in earnest, because of all the abominations that are committed in Jerusalem. It was not only the idolatries, they were guilty of, but all their other enormities, that were abominations to God. These pious few had witnessed against those abominations, and had done what they could in their places to suppress them; but, finding all their attempts for the reformation of manners fruitless, they sat down, and sighed, and cried, wept in secret, and complained to God, because of the dishonour done to his name by their wickedness, and the ruin it was bringing upon their church and nation. Note, It is not enough that we do not delight in the sins of others, and that we have not fellowship with them, but we must mourn for them, and lay them to our heart, we must grieve for that which we cannot help, those that have sin for its own sake, and have a tender concern for the souls of others, as David, (Ps. cxvii. 15.) and Lot, who vexed his righteous soul with the wicked conversation of his neighbours. The abominations committed in Jerusalem are to be in a special manner lamented, because they are in a particular manner offensive to God. 2. The distinguishing care taken of them. Order is given that they should be of such a pious, public spirit; "Go through the midst of the city in quest of them, and though they are ever so much dispersed, and ever so closely hid from the fury of their persecutors, yet see that you discover them, and set a mark upon their foreheads." (1.) To signify that God owns them for his, and he will confess them another day. A work of grace in the soul of the people is a sealing upon them, which he will acknowledge as his mark, and by which he knows them that are his. (2.) To give to them who are thus marked an assurance of God's favour, that they may know it themselves; and the comfort of knowing it will be the most powerful support and cordial in calamitous times. Why should we perplex ourselves about this temporal life, if we know by the mark that we have eternal life? (3.) To be a direction to the servants whom to pass by, as the blood upon the door-posts was an indication that was an Israelite's house, and the first-born their good for, or slain. Note, to keep themselves pure in times of common iniquity, God will keep safe in times of common calamity. They that distinguish themselves shall be distinguished; they that cry for other men's sins shall not need to cry for their own affections; for they shall be either delivered from them, or comforted under them. God will set a mark upon his mourners, will break their sadness, and bottle their tears. The sealing of the servants of God in their foreheads, (Rev. vii. 3) was the same token of the care God has of his own people with this here; only this was to secure them from being destroyed, that from being seduced, which is equivalent. 5. And to the others he said in my hearing. Go ye after him through the city, and smite; let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity. 6. Shout utterly old and young, both maidies, and little children, and women; but come not near any man upon whom is the mark; and begin at my sanctuary. Then they began at the ancient men which were before the house. 7. And he said unto them, Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain; go ye forth. And they went forth, and slew in the city. 8. And it came to pass, while they were slaying them, and I was left, that I fell upon my face, and cried, and said, Ah Lord God! wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel in thy pouring out of thy fury upon Jerusalem? 9. Then said he unto me, The iniquity of the house of Israel and Judah is exceeding great, and the land is full of blood, and the city full of perverseness; for they say, The Lord hath forsaken the earth, and the Lord seeth not. 10. And as for me also, mine eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity; but I will recompense their way upon their head. 11. And, behold, the man clothed with linen, which had the ink-horn by his side, reported the matter, saying, I have done as thou hast commanded me. In these verses, we have, 1. A command given to the destroyers to do execution according to their commission. They stood by the brazen altar, waiting for orders; and orders are here given them to cut off and destroy all that were either old or young, or necessary to, the abominations of Jerusalem, and that did not sigh and cry for them. Note, When God has gathered his wheat into his garner, nothing remains but to burn up the chaff. Mat. iii. 12. 1. They are ordered to destroy all, (1.) Without exception; they must go through the city, and smite, they must slay utterly, old and young, neither the beauty of the virgins, nor the innocence of their babes, shall secure them. This was fulfilled in the death of multitudes by famine and pestilence, especially by the sword of the Chaldeans, and as far as the military execution went, sometimes even such bloody work as this has been God's work. But what an evil thing is sin then, which provokes the God of infinite mercy to such severity! (2.) Without exception; Let not your eye spare, neither have ye pity; (v. 5.) you must not save any whom God has doomed to destruction, as Saul did Agag and the Amalekites, that is doing the work of God deceitfully, Jer. xxviii. 16. None need to be more fearful than God; and he had said, (ch. viii. 18.) More eye shall not spare, neither will I have pity. Note, Those that live in sin, and hate to be restrained, will perish in sin, and deserve not to be pitied; for they might easily have prevented the sin, and would not.

2. They are warned not to do the least hurt to them that were marked for salvation; "Come not near them, and they shall be well treated;" (Jer. xv. 11.) and we have reason to think that none of the mourning, praying remnant fell by the sword of the Chaldeans, but that God found out some way or other to secure them all; as in the last destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans, the Christians were all secured in a city called Pelus, and none of them perished with the unbelieving Jews, who were the poison of the springs, to which all the corruption of the streams was owing. The wickedness of the sanctuary was of all other more offensive to God, and therefore there the slaughter must begin; "Begin there, to try if the people will take warning by the judgments of God upon their priests, and will repent and return; begin there, that all the world may see and know in future, that "Jehovah is a jealous God, and hates sin most in those that are nearest to him." Note, When judgments are abroad, they commonly begin at the house of God, 1 Pet. iv. 17. You only have I known, and therefore I will punish you, Amos iii. 2. God's temple is a sanctuary, a refuge and protection for penitent sinners, but not for any that go on still in their transgressions; neither the sacredness of the place, nor the eminency of their place in it, will be their security.

It should seem, the destroyers made some difficulty of putting men to death in the temple, but God bids them not hesitate at that, but, (v. 7.) Defile the house, and fill the courts with the slain. They are bid to begin from where the law pointed, like the king, he commanded as he spoke there, 1 Kings ii. 30, 31. There the blood of God's prophets had been shed, (Matt. xxiii. 35.) and therefore there let their blood be shed. Note, If the servants of God's house defile it with their sin, God will take the sword, and make an end of it to defile it with their violences, Ps. lxviii. 1. But these acts of necessary justice were really, whatever they were ceremonially, rather a purification than a pollution of the sanctuary; it was putting away evil from among them.

4. They were appointed to go forth into the city, v. 6, 7. Note, Wherever sin has gone before, judgment will follow: and though judgment begins at the house of God, yet it shall not end there. The holy city shall no more be a protection to the wicked people than the holy house was to the wicked priests.

II. Here is execution done accordingly. They observed their orders, and, 1. They began at the elders, that ancient men that were before the house, and slew them first, either those seventy ancients who worshipped idols in their chambers, (ch. viii. 13.) or those twenty-five who worshipped the sun between the porch and the altar, who might more properly be said to be before the house. Note, Ringleaders in sin may expect to be first met with by the judgments of God; and the sins of those who are in the forefront, do not pass over them without the most exemplary punishments. 2. They proceeded to the common people; They went forth, and slew in the city; for when the decree is gone forth, there shall be no delay; if God begin, he will make an end.

III. Here is the prophet's intercession for a mitigation of the judgment, and a reprove for some; (v. 8.) While they were slaying them, and I was left, I fell upon my face. Observe here, 1. How sensibly the prophet was of God's mercy to him, in that he was spared, when so many round about him were cut off. Thousands fell on his right hand, and on his left, and yet the destruction did not come nigh him; only with his eyes did he behold the just reward of the wicked, Ps. xvi. 5. 2. Observe how he improved this; that is putting it to God's goodness, not his own deserts. Note, The best saints must acknowledge themselves indebted to sparing mercy that they are not consumed. And when desolating judgments are abroad, and multitudes fall by them, it ought to be accounted a great favour if we have our lives given us for a fire; for we might justly have perished with them that perished. 3. Observe how he improved this; he looked upon it that therefore he was left, that he might stand in the gap to turn away the wrath of God. Note, We must look upon it that for this reason we are spared, that we may do good in our places, may do good by our prayers. Ezekiel did not triumph in the slaughter he made, but his flesh trembled for fear of God; (as David's, Ps. xxxix. 128.) he trembled with fear, being convinced (he was one of them that were marked,) but in compassion to his fellow-creatures. They that sigh and cry for the sins of sinners, cannot but sigh and cry for their miseries too; yet the day is coming, when all this concern will be entirely swallowed up in a full satisfaction in this, that God is glorified, and they that now fall on their face, and cry, "Ah, Lord God! will lift up their heads, and sing, Hosannah Rev. xix. 1, 3. The prophet humbly expostulates with God; "Wilt thou destroy all the residue of Israel, and there shall be none left but the few that are marked? Shall the Israel of God be destroyed, utterly destroyed? When there are but a few left, shall those few be cut off, who might have been the rest of Israel, as was written in the book? As will the God of Israel be himself their Destroyer? Wilt thou now destroy Israel, who was wont to protect and deliver Israel? Wilt thou now pour out thy fury upon Jerusalem, as by the total destruction of the city to ruin the whole country too? Surely thou wilt not." Note, Though we acknowledge that God is righteous, yet we have leave to plead with him concerning his judgments, and to implore his mercy, Ezek. xxxvi. 15. Therefore, though he is righteous, yet he is gracious, and will not deal always after the manner of sin; he will turn and make us happy, if we return, and he will turn and deal with us according to his mercies, if we turn to him from sin. Note, though God is righteous, yet he is gracious, and will not deal always after the manner of sin; he will turn and make us happy, if we return, and he will turn and deal with us according to his mercies, if we turn to him from sin.
1. THEN I looked, and, behold, in the firmament that was above the head of the cherubims there appeared over them
as it were a sapphire-stone, as the appearance of the likeness of a throne. 2. And he spake unto the man clothed with linen,
and said, Go in between the wheels, even under the cherub, and fill thy hand with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city. And he went in in my sight. 3. Now the cherubims stood on the right side of the house when the man went in; and the cloud filled the inner court. 4. Then the glory of the Lord went up from the cherub, and stood over the threshold of the house; and the house was filled with a cloud, and the court was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory. 5.
And the sound of the cherubims' wings was heard even to the outer court, as the voice of the Almighty God when he spake. 6.
And it came to pass, that when he had commanded the man clothed with linen, saying, Take fire from between the wheels, from between the cherubims; then he went in, and stood beside the wheels. 7. And one cherub stretched forth his hand from between the cherubims unto the fire that was between the cherubims; and took thereof,
and put it into the hands of him that was clothed with linen; who took it, and went out.

To possess us with a holy awe and dread of God, and to fill us with his fear, we may observe, in this part of the vision which the prophet had,
I. The glorious appearance of his majesty. Some thing of the invisible world is here made visible; some faint representations of its brightness and beauty, some shadows; but such as are no more to be compared with the truth and substance than a picture with the life; yet here is enough to oblige us to all the utmost reverence of our thoughts of God and approaches to him, if we will but admit the impressions this discovery of him will make.
1. He is here in the firmament above the head of the cherubins, v. 1. He manifests his glory in the upper world, where purity and brightness are both in perfection; and the vast expanse of the firmament
aims to speak the God that dwelleth there infinite.
It is the firmament of his throne, and his majesty is there, as was declared to Moses when he beheld all the children of men. The divine nature infinitely transcends the angelical nature, and God is above the head of the cherubims, in respect not only of his dignity above them, but of his dominion over them. Cheru-ibs have great power and wisdom and influence,
but they are subject to God and Christ.
2. He is here upon the throne, or that which had the form of the likeness of a throne; (for God's glory and government infinitely transcend all the brightest ideas our minds can either form or receive concerning them:) and it was as it were a sapphire-stone, pure and sparkling; such a throne has God prepared in the heavens, far exceeding the thrones of any earthly potentates.
3. Here he is attended with a glorious train of holy angels. When God came into his temple, the

CHAP. X.
The prophet had observed to us, (ch. viii. 4.) that when he was in vision at Jerusalem, he saw the same appearance of the glory of God there, that he had seen by the river of Chebar: now, in this chapter, he gives us some account of the appearance there, as far as was requisite for the clearing up of two further indications of approaching destruction of Jerusalem, which God here gave the prophet. 1. The scattering of the coals of fire upon the city, which were taken from between the cherubims, v.
11. 2. The removal of the glory of God from the temple, and its being upon the wing to be gone, v. 8.
22. When God goes out of a people, all judgments break in upon them.
cherubims stood on the right side of the house, (v. 3.) as the Prince's life-guard attending the gate of his palace. Christ has angels at command. The orders given to all the angels of God are, to worship him. Some observe, that they stood on the right side of the house, that is, the south side, because on the north side the image of jealousy was, and other instances of idolatry, from which they would place themselves above, as they had been commanded. It must be,

4. The appearance of his glory is veiled with a cloud, and yet out of that cloud darts forth a dazzling lustre; in the house and inner court there was a cloud and darkness, which filled them, and yet either the outer court, or the same court, after some time, was full of the brightness of the Lord's glory, v. 2. There was a darting forth of light and brightness; but if the cloud were over-curious eyes, and it would find itself lost in a cloud. His righteousness is conspicuous as the great mountains, and the brightness of it fills the court; but his judgments are a great deep, which we cannot fathom, a cloud, which we cannot see through. The brightness discloses enough to awe and direct our consciences, but the cloud hides from us the magnifying of our excellency, and, by the confusion of the eyes, by reason of darkness. Thus, (Hab. iii. 4.) He had been coming out of his hand, and yet there was the hiding of his power. Nothing is more clear than that God is, nothing more dark than what he is. God covers himself with light, and yet, as to us, makes darkness his pavilion. God took possession of the tabernacle and temple in a cloud, which was always the symbol of his presence. In the temple above there will be no cloud, but we shall see face to face. The cherubims made a dreadful sound with their wings, v. 5. The vibration of them, as of the strings of musical instruments, made a curious melody; bees, and other winged insects, make a noise with their wings. Probable, this intimates that they preparing to remove, by stretching forth and lifting up their wings, which made this noise as it were to give warning of it. This noise is said to be as the voice of the Almighty God when he speaks, as the thunder, which is called the voice of the Lord, (Ps. xxix. 3.) or as the voice of the Lord when he spake to Israel on mount Sinai; and therefore he then gave them his laws, in the abundance of terror, to signify with what terror his people should regard the publication of the law, of which he was now about to do. This noise of their wings was heard even to the outer court, the court of the people; for the Lord's voice, in his judgments, cries in the city, which those may hear, that do not, as Ezekiel, see the visions of them.

11. The terrible directions of his wrath. This vision has a further tendency than merely to set forth the divine grandeur; further orders are to be given for the destruction of Jerusalem. The greatest devastations are made by fire and sword; for a general slaughter of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, orders were given in the foregoing chapter; now here we have a command to lay the city in ashes, by scattering coals of fire upon it, which in the vision were fetched from between the cherubims.

1. For the issuing of our orders to do this, the glory of the Lord was lifted up from the cherub, (as in the chapter before for the giving of orders there, v. 3.) and stood upon the threshold of the house, in imitation of the courts of judgment which they kept in the gates of their cities. The people would not hear the oracles which God delivered to them in those holy temple, and their judgments from thence they shall be made to hear their doom.

2. The man clothed in linen, who had marked those who were to be preserved, is to be employed in this service; for the same Jesus that is the Protector and Saviour of them that believe, having all judgment committed to him, that of condemnation as well as that of abolution, will come in flaming fire, to take vengeance on those that obey not his gospel. He that sits on the throne calls to the man clothed in linen to go in between the wheels, and fit his hands with coals of fire from between the cherubims, and scatter them over the city. This intimates, (1.) That the burning of the city and temple by the Chaldeans was a consummation determined, and that therein they executed God's counsel, did what he designed before should be done. (2.) That the fire of divine wrath, which kindles judgment upon a people, is just and holy, for it is fire fetched from between the cherubims. The fire on God's altar, where atonement was made, had been slighted, to commence fire is here fetched from heaven, like that by which Nebuchadnezzar was warned, of offering strange fire. If a city, or town, or house be burned, whether by design or accident, if we trace it in its original, we shall find that the coals which kindled the fire came from between the wheels; for there is not any evil of that kind in the city, but the Lord has done it. (3.) That Jesus Christ acts by commission from the Father, for from him he receives authority to execute judgment, because he is the Son of man. Christ came to send fire on the earth, (Luke xii. 49.) and in the great day will speak this world into ashes. By fire from his hand, the earth, and all the works that are therein, will be burnt up.

3. This man clothed with linen readily attended to this service; though, being clothed with linen, he was very likely among the burning kind, he being called, he said, Lo, I come; this commandment he had received of his Father, and he complied with it; the prophet saw him go in, v. 2. He went in, and stood beside the wheels, expecting to be furnished there with the coals he was to scatter; for what Christ was to give, he first received, whether for mercy or judgment. He was directed to take fire, but he stayed till he had it given him, to show how slow he is to execute judgment, and how long-suffering to us-ward.

4. One of the cherubims reached him a handful of fire from the midst of the living creatures. The prophet, when he first saw this vision, observed that there were burning coals of fire, and lamps, but two, and did not among the living creatures; (ch. i. 12.) from hence this fire was taken, v. 3. The spirit of burning, the refiner's fire, by which Christ purifies his church, is of a divine original. It is by a celestial fire, fire from between the cherubims, that wonders are wrought. The cherubim put it into his hand; for the angels are ready to be employed by the Lord Jesus, and to serve all his purposes.

5. When he had taken the fire, he went out, no doubt to scatter it up and down upon the city, as he was directed. And who can abide the day of his coming? Who can stand before him when he goes out in his anger?

8. And there appeared in the cherubims the form of a man's hand under their wings. 9. And when I looked, behold, the four wheels by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub: and the appearance of the wheels was as the colour of a beryl-stone. 10. And as for their appearances, they four had one likeness, as if a wheel had been in the midst of a wheel. 11. When they went, they went upon their four sides; they turned not as they went, but to the place whither the head looked they followed it; they turned not as they went. 12. And their whole body, and their backs, and their hands, and their wheels, and the wheels, were full of eyes round about, even the wheels, that they four had. 13. As for the wheels, it was cried unto them in my hearing, O wheel!

14. And every one had four faces: the first face was the face of a cherub, and the second face was the face of a man, and the third the face of a lion, and the fourth the face of an eagle. 15. And the cherubims were lifted up. This is the living creature that I saw by the river of Chebar. 16. And when the cherubims went, the wheels went by them; and when the cherubims lifted up their wings, to mount up from the earth, the same wheels also turned not from beside them. 17. When they stood, these stood; and when they were lifted up, these lifted up themselves also: for the spirit of the living creature was in them. 18. Then the glory of the Lord departed from off the threshold of the house, and stood over the cherubims. 19. And the cherubims lifted up their wings, and mounted up from the earth in my sight: when they went out, the wheels also were beside them; and every one stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 20. This is the living creature that I saw under the God of Israel, by the river of Chebar; and I knew that they were the cherubims. 21. Every one had four faces apiece, and every one four wings; and the likeness of the hands of a man was under their wings. 22. And the likeness of their faces was the same faces which I saw by the river of Chebar, their appearances and themselves: they went every one straight forward.

We have here a further account of the vision of God's glory which Ezekiel saw, here intended to introduce that direful omen of the departure of that glory from them, which would open the door for ruin to break in.

1. Ezekiel sees the glory of God shining in the sanctuary, so as he had seen it by the river of Chebar, and gives an account of it, that they who had by their wickedness provoked God to depart from them, might know what they had lost, and might lament after the Lord, grieving out their Ichabod, Where is the glory?

Ezekiel here sees the operations of Divine Providence in the government of the lower world, and the affairs of it, represented by the four wheels; and the perfections of the holy angels, the inhabitants of the upper world, and their ministrations, represented by the four living creatures, every one of which had four faces: the agency of the angels in directing the affairs of this world is represented by the close communication that was between the living creatures and the wheels, the wheels being guided by them in all their motions, as the chariot is by him that drives it; but the same Spirit being both in the living creatures and in the wheels, denotes that infinite wisdom which serves its own purposes by the ministration of angels, and all the occurrences of this lower world. So that this vision gives us but a figure of that throne, which the Lord has prepared in the heavens, and that kingdom of his which rules over all, Ps. ciii. 19.

The prophet observes, that this was the same vision with that he saw by the river of Chebar; (v. 13, 22.) and yet in one thing there seems to be a material difference, that that which was there the face of an ox, and was on the left side, (ch. 1. 10.) here they had a cherub, and is the first face, (v. 14.) whence some have concluded that the face of a cherub was that of an ox, which the Israelites had an eye to when they made the golden calf. I rather think that in this latter vision the first face was the proper appearance or figure of a cherub, which Ezekiel knew very well, being a priest, by what he had seen in the temple of the Lord, (1 Kings vi. 29.) but which we now have no certainty of at all; and by this Ezekiel knew assuredly, whereas before he only conjectured it, that they were all cherubims, though putting on different faces, v. 20. And this first appearing in the proper figure of a cherub, and yet it being proper to retain the number of four, that of the ox is left out and dropped, because the face of the cherubim had been most used by the worship of an ox. As sometimes when God appears to deliver his people when he appeared to depart from them, he rode upon a cherub, and did fly. Now observe here,

1. That this world is subject to turns and changes, and various revolutions; the course of affairs in it is represented by wheels, (v. 9.) sometimes one spoke is uppermost, and sometimes another, they are still rolling and flowing like the sea, waxing and waning like the moon, 1 Sam. iv. 8. Now their appearance is as if there were a wheel in the midst of a wheel, (v. 10.) which intimates the mutual references of providences to each other, their dependences on each other, and the joint tendency of all to one common end, while their motions as to us are intricate and perplexed, and seemingly contrary.

2. That there is an admirable harmony and uniformity in these various occurrences of providence; (v. 15.) As for the wheels, though they moved several ways, yet it was cried to them, O wheel; they were all as one, being guided by one Spirit to one end, for God works all according to the counsel of his own will, which is one, for his own glory, which is one. And this makes the dispositions of Providence truly admirable, and to be looked upon with wonder. As the works of his creation, considered separately, were good, but altogether, very good, so the wheels of providence, considered by themselves, are wonderful, but put them together, and they are very wonderful; O wheel!

3. That the motions of Providence are steady and regular, and whatever the Lord pleases that he does, and is never put upon new counsels. The wheels turned not as they went, (v. 11.) and the living creatures went straight forward, v. 22. Whatever difficulties lay in their way, they were sure to get over them, and were never obliged to stand still, turn aside, or go back. So perfectly known to God are all his works, that he is never put upon new counsels.

4. That God makes more use of the ministration of angels in the government of this lower world than we are aware of. The wheels were by the cherubims, one wheel by one cherub, and another wheel by another cherub, v. 9. What has been imagined by some concerning the spheres above, that every orb has its intelligence to guide it, here is intimated concerning the wheels below, that every wheel has its cherub to guide it. We think it a satisfaction to us, if under the wise God there are wise men employed in managing the affairs of kingdoms and churches; whether there be so or no, it appears by this that there are wise angels employed, a cherub to every wheel.

5. That all the motions of providence and all the movements of the world are under the government of the great God. They are all full of eyes; those eyes of the Lord which run to and fro through the earth, and which the angels have always an eye to, v. 12. The living creatures and the wheel concur in their motions and rests; (v. 17.) for the Spirit of life, as it may be read, or the Spirit of the living creatures, is in the wheels. The spirit of God directs all the motions of creatures, so as not only to make them serve the divine purpose. Events are not determined by the wheel of fortune, which is blind, but by the wheels of Providence, which are full of eyes.

II. Ezekiel sees the glory of God removing out of the sanctuary, the place where God's honour had long dwelt, and this sight is as sad as the other was grateful. It was pleasant to see that God had not forsaken the earth, (as the idolaters suggested, ch. ix. 9.) but sad to see that he was forsaking his sanctuary. The glory of the Lord stood over the threshold, v. 4. But it now departed off from the threshold, having thence given the necessary orders for the destruction of the city, and stood over the cherubims, not those in the most holy place, but those that Ezekiel saw, v. 9. It immediatly the cherubim lifted up their wings, (v. 19.) as they were directed, and they mounted up from the earth, as birds upon the wing; and when they went out, the wheels of this chariot were not drawn, but went by instinct, beside them; by which it appeared, that so the Spirit of the living creatures were in the wheels. Thus when God is leaving a people in displeasure, angels above, and all events here below, shall concour to further his departure. But observe here, In the courts of the temple where the people of Israel had dishonoured their God, had cast off his yoke, and withdrawn the shoulder from it, blessed angels appear very ready to serve him, to draw his chariot home, and to carry him out of it. God had shown the prophet how the will of God was disobeyed by men on earth; (ch. viii.) here he shows him how readily it is obeyed by angels and inferior creatures; and it is a comfort to us, when we grieve for the wickedness of the wicked, to think how his angels do his commandments, hearkening to the voice of his word, Ps. cxii. 20.

Let us now, 1. Take a view of this chariot in which the glory of the God of Israel rides triumphantly. He that is the God of Israel, is the God of heaven and earth, and has the command of all the powers of both. Let the faithful Israelites comfort themselves with this, that he who is their God is above the cherubim; their Redeemer is so, (1 Pet. iii. 22.) and has the sole sovereignty disposed of all events, the living creatures and the wheels agree to serve him, so that he is Head over all things to the church. The Rabbins call this vision that Ezekiel had, Merekah, the vision of the chariot; and from thence they call the more abstruse part of divinity, which treats concerning God and spirits, Opus currium—The work of the chariot, as they do the other part that is more plain and familiar, Opus cherubinum—The work of the creation. 2. Let us attend the motions of this chariot; The cherubim, and the glory of God above them, stood at the door of the east gate of the Lord's house, ready to depart and leave the house, v. 19. But observe with how many stops and pauses God departs, as loath to go, as if to see if there be any that will intercede with him to return. None of the priests in the inner court, between the temple and the altar, would court his stay; therefore he leaves their court, and stands at the east gate, which led into the court of the people, to see if any of them would yet at length stand in the gap. Note, God removes by degrees from a provoking people, and, when he is ready to depart, would return to them, if they were but a repenting, praying people.

CHAP. XI.

This chapter concludes the vision which Ezekiel saw, and this part of it furnishes him with two messages; 1. A message of wrath against those who continued still at Jerusalem, and were there in the height of presumption, thinking they should never fall, v. 1. 15. II. A message of comfort to those who were exiled captives into Babylon, and were there in the depth of despondency, thinking they should never rise. And as the former are assured that God has judgments in store for them, notwithstanding their present security; so the latter are assured that God has mercy in store for them, notwithstanding their present distress, v. 14. 21. And so the glory of God removes further, v. 22, 23. The vision disappears, (v. 24.) and Ezekiel faithfully gives his hearers an account of it, v. 25.

1. MOREOVER, the spirit lifted me up, and brought me unto the east gate of the Lord's house, which looketh eastward: and, behold, at the door of the gate five and twenty men; among whom I saw Jazaniah the son of Azur, and Pelatiah the son of Benaiah, princes of the people. 2. Then said he unto me, Son of man, these are the men that devise mischief, and give wicked counsel, in this city; 3. Which say, It is not near: let us build houses: this city is the caldron, and we be the flesh. 4. Therefore prophesy against them, prophesy, O son of man. 5. And the Spirit of the Lord fell upon me, and said unto me, Speak; Thus saith the Lord, Thus have ye said, O house of Israel: for I know the things that come into your mind, every one of them. 6. Ye have multiplied your sin in this city, and ye have filled the streets thereof with the slain. 7. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Your sin, whom ye have laid in the midst of it, they are the flesh, and this city is the caldron; but I will bring you forth out of the midst of it. 8. Ye have feared the sword; and I will bring a sword upon you, saith the Lord God. 9. And I will bring you out of the midst thereof, and deliver you into the hands of strangers, and will execute judgments among you. 10. Ye shall fall by the sword: I will judge you in the border of Israel and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 11. This city shall not be your caldron, neither shall ye be the flesh in the midst thereof: but I will judge you in the border of Israel: 12. And ye shall know that I am the Lord; for ye have not walked in my statutes; neither executed my judgments, but have done after the manner of the heathen that are bound about you. 13. And it came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah, the son of Benanaah, died: then fell I down upon my face, and cried with a loud voice, and said, Ah Lord God! wilt thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel?

We have here,

1. The great security of the princes of Jerusalem, notwithstanding the judgments of God that were upon them. The prophet was brought, in vision, to the gate of the temple where these princes sat in council upon the present arduous affairs of the city; The Spirit lifted me up, and brought me to the east gate of the city of the Lord's habitation, and behold, twenty-five men were there. See how obsequious the prophet was to the Spirit's orders, and how observant of all the discoveries that were made to him. It should seem, these twenty-five men were not the same with these twenty-five whom he saw at the door of the temple, worshipping toward the east; (ch. viii. 16.) these seem to have been priests or Levites, for they were between the porch and the altar of burnt offerings, and are called in Jer. xxxiii. 10. by the name of the Lord's house, to try causes. (Jer. xxvi. 16.) and these here are charged, not with corruptions in worship, but mal-administration to the government; two of them are named, because they were the most leading, active men, and perhaps because the prophet knew them, though he had been some years absent; Pelatiah, and Jazarahiah, not that mentioned, ch. viii. 11. for Pelatiah was a prince in Jerusalem. Some tell us that Jerusalem was divided into twenty-four wards, and that these were the governors or aldermen of those wards, with their mayor or president. Now observe,

1. The general character which God gives of these men to the prophet; (v. 2.) These are the men that devise mischief, under pretense of concerting measures for the public safety, they harden people in their sins, and take off their fear of God's judgments which they are threatened with by the prophets; they give wicked counsel in this city, counselling them to restrain and silence the prophets, to rebel against the king of Babylon, and to resolve upon holding the city out to the last extremity. Note, It is bad with a people when the things that God hath hid from the eyes of those who are intrusted with their counsels. And when mischief is done, God knows at whose door to lay it, and, in the day of discovery and recompense, will be sure to lay it at the right door, and will say, These are the men that devised it, though they are great men, and pass for wise men, and must not now be contradicted or controlled.

2. The particular charge exhibited against them in proof of this character. They are indicted for words spoken at their council-board, which he that stands in the congregation of the mighty would take cognizance of; (v. 5.) they said to this effect, "It is not near; the destruction of our city, that has been so often threatened by the prophets, is not near, not so near as they talk of. They are conscious to themselves of such an enmity to reformation, that they contrive it will come at last; but they have such an opinion of God's patience, (though they have long abused it,) that they are willing to hope it will not come this great while. Note, Where Satan cannot persuade men to look upon the judgment to come as a thing dreadful and uncertain, yet he gains his point by persuading them to look at it as not at hand, so that it loses its force. If it be sure, yet it is not to be expected; whereas, in truth, the Judge stands before the door."

Now if the destruction is not near, they conclude, Let us build houses; let us count upon a continuance, for this city is the caldron, and we are the flesh. This seems to be a proverbial expression, signifying no more than this, "We are as safe in this city as flesh in a boiling pot; the walls of the city shall be to us as walls of brass, and shall receive no more damage from the besiegers about than the caldron does from the fire under it. Those that think to protect us out of our city, shall find it to be as much at their peril as it would be to them to suffer themselves to take out of the caldron while it was in seething; (as we find, 1 Sam. ii. 13, 14.) and then it intimates that they were the more secure because Jerusalem was the holy city, and they thought themselves a holy people in it, not to be meddled with. Some think this was a banter upon Jeremiah, who in one of his first visions saw Jeru-usalem to be reduced to that condition; "Now," say they, in a way of jest and ridicule, "if it be a seething pot, we are as the flesh in it, and who dares meddle with us?" Thus they continued mocking the messengers of the Lord, even while they suffered for so doing; but be ye not mockers, lest your bands be made strong. Those hearts are hard indeed, which are made more severe by the molestation of God which were designed for warning to them.

11. The method taken to awaken them out of their security. One would think that the prov-idences of God, which related to them, were enough to startle them; but to help them to understand and improve these, the word of God is sent them to give them warning; (v. 4.) Therefore prophesy against them, and try to undeceive them; forphesy, O son of man, upon these dead and dry bones. Note, The greatest kindness ministers can do to secure sinners is, to preach against them, and to show them their misery and danger, though they are ever so unwilling to see it. We then act most for them, when we appear most against them. But the prophet being at a loss what to say to men that were hardening their hearts by the eyes of those who are intrusted with their counsels. And when mischief is done, God knows at whose door to lay it, and, in the day of discovery and recompense, will be sure to lay it at the right door, and will say, These are the men that devised it, though they are great men, and pass for wise men, and must not now be contradicted or controlled.
not only all we say, but all we think; even those thoughts that are most suddenly darted into our minds, and that as suddenly slip out of them again, so that we ourselves are scarcely aware of them, yet God knows them; he knows us better than we know ourselves; he understands our thoughts afar off; the consideration of this should oblige us to keep our hearts with all diligence, that no vain thing should come in the way of God's sight.

2. Let them know that all who had fallen, should be accounted for before God the murderers; and those slain were the only ones that should remain in the city, as the flesh in the caldron, v. 6. Have you fulfilled your slain in the city, not only the wives, and such of the persons outside of the walls as were slain in battles or sieges which they, by such a reasonable peace as the war aimed at, might have prevented, will be called their slain. Now these slain are the only flesh that shall be left in this caldron, v. 7.

3. Let them know that how impregnable soever they thought their city to be, they should be forced out of it, either driven to flight, or dragged into captivity: I will bring you forth out of the midst of it, whether you will or no, v. 7, 9. They had provoked God to forsake the city, and thought they should do well enough by their own policy and strength when he was gone; but God will make them know that there is no peace to them that have left their God. If they have by their sins driven God from his house, he will soon by his judgments drive them from theirs; and it will be found that those are least safe that are most secure; this city of Jehovah, this is the Lord's city; you shall not seek it in the shallow; you shall not seek it in the quick, v. 7, 9. They who have driven God from his house, shall not find him in their own, nor shall they be able to find a place of refuge among the dead.

4. Let them know that when God has got them out of the midst of Jerusalem, he will pursue them with his judgments wherever he finds them; the judgments which they thought to shelter themselves from by keeping close in Jerusalem. They feared the sword if they should go out to the Chaldeans, and therefore would abide in their caldron but, says God, I will bring a sword upon you, v. 8. and you shall fall by the sword, v. 10. Note, The fear of the wicked shall come upon him. And there is no fence against the judgments of God when they come upon the wicked, neither can they make any such escape as some think they can. They were afraid of trusting to the mercy of strangers. "But," says God, "I will deliver you into the hands of strangers, whose recusants you shall feel, since you were not willing to lie at their mercy." See Jer. xxxviii. 17, 18. They thought to escape the judgments of God, but God says that he will execute judgments upon them; and whereas they resolved that the sword should not pass through Jerusalem, God tells them, v. 10. and again, v. 11. that he will judge them in the borders of Israel, which was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar slew all the nobles of Judah at Riblah in the land of Hamath, on the utmost border of the land of Canaan. Note, Those who have taken ever so deep root in the place where they live, cannot be sure that it is that place they shall die.

5. Let them know that all this is the due punishment of their sin, and the revelation of the righteous judgment of God against them; Ye shall know that I am the Lord, v. 10. and again, v. 12. Those shall be judged in their own ways, as they have judged others, which would not be taught by his word, what a hatred he has to sin, and what a fearful thing it is for impenitent sinners to fall into his hands. I will execute judgments, and then you shall know that I am the Lord, for the Lord is known by the judgments which he executes upon those that have not walked in his statutes. Hereby it is known that he made the law, because he punishes the breach of it. I will judge judgments among you, (says God,) because you have not executed my judgments, v. 12. Note, The executing of the judgments of God's mouth by us, in a uniform, steady course of obedience to his law, is the only way to prevent the executing of the judgments of his hand upon us, in our ruin and confusion; one way or other, God's judgments will be executed; the man that is secure will be judged as those who walked in his statutes. If we do not give honour to God by executing his judgments as he has commanded, he will get him honour upon us by executing his judgments as he has threatened; and thus we shall know that he is the Lord, the sovereign Lord of all, that will not be mocked. And observe, When they cast off God's statutes, and walked not in them, they did after the manners of the Gentiles that were round about them, and introduced into their worship all their impure, ridiculous, and barbarous usages. When men leave the settled rule of divine institutions, they wander endlessly. Justly therefore was this made the reason why they should keep God's ordinances, that they might not commit the abominable customs of the heathen. Lev. xvi. 30.

III. This awakening word is immediately here followed by an awakening providence, v. 13. Where we may observe,

1. With what power Ezekiel prophesied, or, rather, what a divine power went along with it; It came to pass, when I prophesied, that Pelatiah the son of Benaiah died; he was mentioned, v. 1. as a principal man among the twenty-five princes that were set over Israel in Jerusalem. It should seem, this was done in vision now, as the slaying of the ancient men, (Ech. ix. 6.) upon occasion of which Ezekiel prayed, (v. 8.) as he did here; but it was an assurance that when this prophecy should be published, it should be done in fact. The death of Pelatiah was an earnest of the complete accomplishment of this prophecy. Note, God is pleased oftentimes to single out some sinners, and make them monuments of his justice, for warning others of what is coming; and some that thought themselves very safe, are snatched away suddenly, and drop down dead in an instant, as Amnias and Saphira at Peter's feet when he prophesied.

2. With what pity Ezekiel prayed. Though the sudden death of Pelatiah was a confirmation of Ezekiel's understanding of the day of judgment, yet he was in deep concern about it, and laid it to heart as if he had been his relation or friend. He fell on his face, and cried with a loud voice, as one in earnest; Ah Lord God! will thou make a full end of the remnant of Israel? Many are swept away by the judgments we have been under; and shall the remnant which have escaped the sword, thus be thrust into the innermost border of the influx? Then wilt indeed make a full end." Perhaps it was Ezekiel's infirmity to bewail the death of this wicked prince thus, as it was Samuel's to mourn so long for Saul; but thus he showed how far he was from desiring the woeful day he foretold. David lamented the sickness of those that hated and persecuted him. And we ought to be much affected with the sudden death of others, yea, though they are wicked.

14. Again the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 15. Son of man, thy brethren, even thy brethren, the men of thy kindred, and all the house of Israel wholly, are they unto whom the inhabitants of Jerusalem have said, Get ye far from the Lord; unto us is this land given in possession. 16. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, Although I have cast them far off among the heathen, and although I have scattered them among the countries, yet will I be to them as a little sanctuary in the countries where they shall come. 17. Therefore say, Thus saith the Lord God, I will even gather you from the people, and assemble you out of the countries where ye have been scattered, and I will give you the land of Israel. 18. And they shall come thither, and they shall take away all the detestable things thereof, and all the abominations thereof, from thence. 19. And I will give them one heart, and I will put a new spirit within you: and I will take the stony heart out of their flesh, and will give them a heart of flesh: 20. That they may walk in my statutes, and keep mine ordinances, and do them: and they shall be my people, and I will be their God. 21. But as for them whose heart walketh after the heart of their detestable things and their abominations, I will recompense their way upon their own head, saith the Lord God.

Prophecy was designed to exalt every valley, as well as to bring low every mountain and hill; (Isa. xl. 4.) and prophets were to speak not only conviction to the presumptuous and secure, but comfort to the despised and despoothing that trembled at God's word. The prophet, having in the former part of this chapter received instructions for the awakening of those that were at ease in Zion, is in these verses furnished with comfortable words for those that mourned in Babylon, and by the rivers there sat weeping when they remembered Zion. Observe, 1. How the pious captives were triumphed upon and insulted over by those who continued in Jerusalem, p. 15. God tells the prophet what the inhabitants of Jerusalem said of him and the rest of them that were already carried away to Babylon. God had owned them as good figs, and declared it was for their good that he had sent them into Babylon; but the inhabitants of Jerusalem abandoned them, supposing them that were really the best saints to be the greatest sinners of all men that dwelt in Jerusalem. Observe, 2. How they are described as wise; They are thy brethren, (says God to the prophet,) whom thou hast in concern and affection for; they are the men of thy kindred; (the men of thy redemption, so the word is;) thy next of kin, to whom the right of redeeming the alienated possession belongs, but who are so far from being able to do it, that they are themselves gone into captivity. They are the whole house of Israel; God so accounts of them, because they only have retained their integrity, and are bettered by their captivity. They are not only of the same family and nation with Ezekiel, but of the same spirit; they were his hearers, and he had communion with them in holy ordinances; and perhaps upon that account they are called his brethren, and the men of his kindred. 2. How they were disowned by the inhabitants of Jerusalem; they said of them, Get ye far from the Lord. They that were esteemed and admired among the brethren that were humbled and under humbling providences. (1.) They cut them off from being members of their church; because they had separated themselves from their rulers, and in compliance with the will of God, had surrendered themselves to the king of Babylon, they communicated them, and said, Get ye far from the Lord, we will have nothing to do with thee, and to thee. Their superstitions were very willing to shake off those who were conscientious, and were severe in their censures of them and sentences against them, as if they were forsaken and forgotten of the Lord, and were cut off from the communion of the faithful. (2.) They cut them off from being members of the commonwealth too, as if they had no longer any part in the affairs of state in the world. "Unto us this land given in possession, and we have furnished them over to the king of Babylon, and we are thereby become entitled to them." God takes notice of, and is much displeased with, the contempt which those that are in prosperity put upon their brethren that are in affliction.

II. The gracious promises which God made to them in consideration of the insolent conduct of their brethren and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and that they had cast them out, said, Let the Lord be glorified; but he shall appear to their joy, Is. lxvi. 5. God owns that his hand was gone out against them, which had given occasion to their brethren to triumph over them; (v. 16.) It is true, I have cast them far off among the heathen, and scattered them among the countries; they look as if they were an abandoned people, and so mingled with the nations that they would be lost among them; but I have mercy in store for them." Note, God takes occasion from the contempt which are put upon his people to speak comfort to them; as David hoped God would reward him good for Shimei's cursing. His time to support his people's hopes is, when their enemies are endeavouring to drive them to despair. Now God promises, 1. That he will make up to them the want of the temple and the privileges of it; (v. 16.) I will be to them as a little sanctuary, in the countries where they shall come. They at Jerusalem have the temple, but without God; they in Babylon have God, though without the temple. (1.) God will be a sanctuary to them, a place of refuge; to him they shall flee, and in him they shall be safe, as he was that took hold on the horns of the altar. Or, rather, they shall have such communion with God in the land of their captivity, as it was thought could be had no where but in the temple: they shall there see God's power and his glory, so as they used to see it in the sanctuary; they shall have the tokens of God's presence with them, and his grace in their hearts shall sanctify their prayers and praises, as he did when the house was built at Jerusalem which was high and great, 1 Kings ix. 8. They were but few and mean, and a little sanctuary was fittest for them. God regards the low estate of his people, and suits his favours to their circumstances. Observe the condescensions of divine grace; the great God will be to his people a little sanctuary.
Note. They that are deprived of the benefit of public ordinances, if it be not their own fault, may have the want of them abundantly made up in the immediate communications of divine grace and comforts.

2. That God would in due time put an end to their afflictions, bring them out of the land of their captivity, and settle them again, them or their children, in their own land; (v. 17.) "I will gather even pon that are dispersed, thus dispersed, and given over for lost by your own countries; I will gather you from the people, distinguish you from those with whom you are mingled, deliver you from those by whom you are held captives, and assemble you in a body out of the countries where you have been scattered; you shall not come back one by one, but all together, which will make your return more honourable, safe, and comfortable; and then I will give you the land of Israel, which now your brethren look upon you as for ever shut out from." Note, It is well for us that men's severe censures cannot cut us off from God's gracious promises. There are many that will be found to have a place in the holy land, whom uncharitable men by their monopolies of it to themselves, had secluded from it. I will give you the land of Israel, let them be Lycians, Hebrews, or others; I will gather you and they shall come thither. If there be any thing in the change of the person from you to them, it may signify the perversity of these to whom the promise is made. "You shall have the title as the patriarchs had, and they that come after shall have the possession."

3. That God by his grace would part between them and their sins, v. 18. Their captivity shall effectually cure them of their idolatry; When they come thither to their own land again, they shall take away all the detestable things thereof. Their idols that had been their delectable things, should now be looked upon with detestation; not only the idols of Babylon, where they were captives, but the idols of Canaan, where they were natives; they should not only not worship them as they had done, but they should not suffer any monuments of them to remain; they shall take all the abominations thereof from thence. Note, Then it is in mercy that we return to a prosperous estate, when we return not to the sins and follies of that state. What have I to do any more with idols?

4. That God would powerfully dispose them to the purifying of their souls, he shall not only cease to do evil, but they shall learn to do well; because there shall be not only an end of their troubles, but a return to their peace. (1.) God will plant good principles in them; he will make the tree good, v. 19. This is a gospel-promise, and is made good to all those whom God designs for the heavenly Canaan; for God prepares all for heaven whom he has prepared here for. It is promised, [1.] That God will give them one heart, a heart entire for the true God, and not divided as it had been among many gods; a heart firmly fixed and resolved for God, and not wavering; steady and uniform, and not inconstant with itself. One heart is a sincere and upright heart, its intentions of a piece with its professions. [2.] That he will first give them fire, then oil, and then a new spirit, that 1. will come in Christ, he is a new creature. [3.] That he will take away the stony heart out of their flesh, out of their corrupt nature. Their hearts shall no longer be, as they have been, dead and dry, and hard and heavy, as a stone; no longer incapable of bearing good fruit, so that the good seed is lost upon it, as it was on the stony ground. [4.] That he will give them a heart of flesh, not dead or proud flesh, but living flesh; he will make their hearts sensible of spiritual pains and spiritual pleasures; will make them tender, and apt to receive impressions; this is God's work, it is his gift, his gift by promise; and a wonderful and happy change is it that is wrought by it, from death to life. This is promised to those whom God would bring back to their own land; for them such a change of condition is for the better indeed, when it is accompanied with such a change of the heart; and such a change must be wrought in all those that shall be brought to the better country, that is, the heavenly.

[22.] Their practices shall be consonant to these principles; I will give them a new spirit, not that they may be able to discourse well of religious subjects, and to dispute for it, but that they may walk in my statutes, in their whole conversation, and keep mine ordinances in all acts of religious worship, v. 20. These two must go together; and these, to whom God has given a new heart and a new spirit, will make conscience of both; and then they shall be my people, and I will be their God. The ancient covenant, which seemed to have been quite forgotten, shall be renewed. By their idolatry, it should seem, they had cast God off; by their captivity, it should seem, God had cast them off; but when they were cured of their idolatry, and delivered out of their captivity, God and his Israel own one another again. God, by his good work in them, will make them his people; and then, by the tokens of his good will toward them, he will show that he is their God. III. Here is a threatening of wrath against those who hated to be reformed. As, when judgments are threatened, the righteous are distinguished so as not to share in the evil of these judgments; so, when favours are promised, the wicked are distinguished so as not to share in the comfort of these favours; they have no part or lot in the matter, v. 21. But as for them that have no grace, what have they to do with peace? Observe, 1. Their description; their heart walks after the heart of their detestable things; they have as great a mind to worship devils as devils have to be worshipped. Or, in opposition to the new heart which God gives to his people, he has a heart against his own heart, they have a heart after the heart of their idols; in their temper and practice they conformed themselves to the characters and accounts given them of their idols, and the ideas they have of them, and of them they learned lewdness and cruelty. Here lies the root of all their wickedness, the corruption of the heart; as the root of their reformation is laid in the renovation of the heart. The heart has its walks, and according as these are, the man is. 2. Their doom; it carries both justice and terror in it; I will recompense their way upon their own head, I will deal with them as they deserve. There needs no more than this to speak God righteous, that he does but render to men according to their deserts, and yet such are the deserts of sin, that there needs no more than this to speak the sinner miserable.

22. Then did the cherubims lift up their wings, and the wheels beside them; and the glory of the God of Israel was over them above. 23. And the glory of the Lord went up from the midst of the city, and stood upon the mountain whither is on the east side of the city. 24. Afterwards the spirit took me up, and brought me in vision by the Spirit of God into Chaldea, them of the captivity: so the vision that I had seen went up from me. 25. Then I spake unto them of the captivity all the things that the Lord had shewed me.

Here is, 1. The departure of God's presence from the city and temple. When the message was committed to the prophet, and he was fully apprized of how to separate between the precious and the vile, then the cherubims lifted up their wings, and the wheels beside them, (v. 22.) as before, ch. x. 19. Angels, when they have done their errands in this lower world, are upon the wing to be gone, for they lose no time. We the glory of the Lord last at the east gate of the temple, (ch. x. 19.) which is here said to be in the midst of the city, which was, that, finding, and wondering, that there was none to intercede, none to uphold, none to invite its return, it removed next to the mountain, which is on the east side of the city, (v. 23.) that was the mount of Olives. On the mountain they had set up their idols, to confront God in his temple, when he dwelt there, (1 Kings xi. 7.) and thence it was called the mount of corruption; (2 Kings xxiii. 13.) therefore their God does as it were set up his standard, his tribunal, as it were to confront them, who thought to keep possession of the temple for themselves now that God had left it. From that mountain there was a full prospect of the city, thither God removed, to make good what he had said, (Deut. xxxii. 26.) I will hide my face from them, I will see what their end shall be. It was from this mountain that Christ beheld the city, and wept over it, in the foretaste of its last destruction by the Romans. The glory of the Lord removed thither, to be as it were yet within call, and ready to return, if now at length, in this their day, they would have understood the things that belonged to their peace. Loath to depart bids often farewell. God, by going away thus slowly, thus gradually, intimated that he left them with reluctance, and would not have gone if they had not perfectly forced him from them. He did now, in effect, say, How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? How shall I deliver thee, Israel? But though he bear long, he will not bear always, but will at length forsake those, and cast them off for ever, who have forsaken him, and cast him off.

2. The departure of this vision from the prophet; at length he went up from him. 24. He saw it mount upward, till it went out of sight, which would be a confirmation to his faith that it was a heavenly vision, that it descended from above, for thitherward it returned. Note, The visions which the saints have of the glory of God, will not be constant till they come to heaven. They have glimpses of that glory, which they soon lose again; visions which go up from them; tastes of divine pleasures, but not a continual feast. It was from the mount of Olives that the vision went up, typifying the ascension of Christ to heaven from that very mountain, when those that had seen him manifested in the flesh, saw him no more. It was foretold (Zech. xiv. 4.) that his feet should stand upon the mount of Olives, stand last there.

3. The return to them of the captivity. The same Spirit that had carried him in a trance or ecstasy to Jerusalem, brought him back to Chaldea; for there the bounds of his habitation are at present appointed, and that is the place of his service. The Spirit came to him, not to deliver him out of captivity, but (which was equivalent) to support and comfort him in his captivity. Hence he gave to his hearers of all he had seen and heard, v. 25. He received, that he might give, and he was faithful to him that appointed him: he delivered his message very honestly; he spake all that, and that only, which God had shewed him: he told them of the great wickedness he had seen at Jerusalem, and the ruin that was hastening toward that city, that they might not repent of their surrendering themselves to the king of Babylon, as Jeremiah advised them, and blame themselves for it, nor envy those that stayed behind, and laughed at them for going when they did, nor must a sign to set forth the famishing captivity. Who would covet to be in a city so full of sin, and so near to ruin? It is better to be in Babylon under the favour of God, than in Jerusalem under his wrath and curse. But though this was delivered immediately to them of the captivity, yet we may suppose that they sent the content of it to them at Jerusalem, with whom they kept up a correspondence and foretold what it had been for Jerusalem, if she had taken the warning hereby given.

CHAP. XII.

Though the vision of God's glory he gone up from the prophet, yet his word comes to him still, and is by him sent to the people, and to the same purport with that which was discovered to him in his visions; to set forth the terrible judgments that were coming upon Jerusalem, by which the city and temple should be entirely laid waste. In this chapter, 1. The prophet, by removing his staff, and quitting his lodgings, must be a sign to set forth Zedekiah's flight out of Jerusalem in the utmost confusion when the Chaldæans took the city, v. 1. 16. II. The prophet, by eating his meat with trembling, typifies a sign of the desolation of the city during the siege, and the consternation that the inhabitants should be in, v. 17. 20. III. A message is sent from God to the people, to assure them that all these predictions should have their accomplishment very shortly, and not be deferred, as they flattered themselves, v. 21. 28.

1. THE word of the Lord also came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, thou dwellest in the midst of a rebellious house, which have eyes to see, and see not; they have ears to hear, and hear not: for they are a rebellious house. 3. Therefore, thou son of man, prepare thee stuff for removing, and remove by day in their sight; and thou shalt remove from thy place to another place in their sight: it may be they will consider, though they be a rebellious house. 4. Then shalt thou bring forth thy stuff by day in their sight, as stuff for removing: and thou shalt go forth at even in their sight, as they that go forth into captivity. 5. Dig thou through the wall in their sight, and carry out thereby. 6. In their sight shall thou bear it upon thy shoulders, and carry it forth in the twilight: thou shalt cover thy face, that thou see not the ground; for I have set thee for a sign unto the house of Israel. 7. And I did so as I was commanded: I brought forth my stuff by day, as stuff for captivity, and in the even I digged through the wall with my hand; I brought it forth in the twilight, and I bare it upon my shoulder in their sight. 8. And in the morning came the word of the Lord unto me, saying, 9. Son of man, hath not the house of Israel, the rebellious house, said unto thee, What doest thou?
13. Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, This burden concerneth the prince in Jerusalem, and all the house of Israel that are among them. 11. Say, I am your sign: like as I have done, so shall it be done unto them; they shall remove, and go into captivity. 12. And the prince that is among them shall bear upon his shoulder in the twilight, and shall go forth; they shall dig through the wall to carry out thereby: he shall cover his face, that he see not the ground with his eyes. 13. My net also will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare: and I will bring him to Babylon, to the land of the Chaldeans; yet shall he not see it, though he shall die there. 14. And I will scatter toward every wind all that are about him to help him, and all his bands; and I will draw out the sword after them. 15. And they shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall scatter them among the nations, and disperse them in the countries. 16. But I will leave a few men of them from the sword, from the famine, and from the pestilence, that they may declare all their abominations among the heathen whither they come; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

Perhaps Ezekiel reflected with so much pleasure upon the vision he had had of the glory of God, that often, since it went up from him, he was wishing it might come down to him again, and, having seen it once and a second time, he was willing to hope he might be a third time so favoured; but we do not find that he ever saw it any more; and yet the word of the Lord comes to him; for God did in divers manners speak to the fathers, (Heb. i. 1.) and they often heard the words of God, when they did not see the visions of the Almighty. Faith comes by hearing that word of prophecy, which is more sure than vision. We may keep up our communication with God through His prophecies and ecstasies.

In these verses, the prophet is directed,

I. By what signs and actions to express the approaching captivity of Zedekiah king of Judah; that was the thing to be foretold; and it is foretold to them that are already in captivity, because as long as Zedekiah was upon the throne, they flattered themselves with hopes that he would make his part good with the king of Babylon, whose yoke he was not willing to submit to; from this it is probable, these poor captives promised themselves great things, and, it may be, when he was forming that design, he privately sent encouragement to them to hope that he would rescue them shortly, or procure their liberty by exchange of prisoners; and while they were fed with these vain hopes, they could not set themselves out to subdue their affliction, or to take heed of their affliction. It is therefore necessary, but very difficult, to convince them that Zedekiah, instead of being their deliverer, should very shortly be their fellow-sufferer. Now, one would have thought, it might have been sufficient if the prophet had only told them this in God’s name, as he does afterward; (v. 16.) but, to prepare them for the prophecy of it, he must first give them a sign of it; must speak it to their eyes first, and then to their ears: and here we have,

1. The reason why he must take this method; (v. 2.) it is because they are a stupid, dull, unthinking people, that will not heed; or will see not, but at least accept of no testimony, but only hear of it; it will make no impression at all upon them; That dwell in the midst of a rebellious house, when it is next to impossible to work any good upon; they have eyes and ears, they have in intellectual powers and faculties, but they see not, they hear not; they were idolaters, whose character it was, (v. 3.) we say like the idols they war shipped, which have ears, and we say like the idols they hear not, Ps. cxv. 5, 8. Note, These are to be reckoned rebellious, that shut their eyes against the divine light, and stop their ears to the divine law. The ignorance of them that are wilfully ignorant, that have faculties and means, and will not use them, is so far from being their excuse, that it adds more, that is, so much, to their guilt, than as those that will not hear, that will not see. They see not, they hear not; for they are a rebellious house. The case is all from themselves; the darkness of the understanding is owing to the stubbornness of the will. Now this is the reason why he must speak to them by signs, as deaf people are taught, that they might be either instructed or ashamed. Ezekiel might not accommodate himself, not only to the weakness, but to the willfulness, of those they deal with, and deal with them accordingly: if they dwell among those that are rebellious, they must speak to them the more plainly and pressingly, and take that course that is most likely to work upon them, that they may be left insensible.

2. The method he must take to awaken and affect them; he must furnish himself with all necessities for removing, (v. 3.) provide for a journey clothes and money; he must remove from one place to another, as one unsettled and forced to shift; this he must do by day, in the sight of the people; he must bring out all his household goods to be packed upp and sent away; (v. 4.) and, because all the doors and gates were either locked up that they could not pass through them, or so guarded by the enemy that they durst not, he must therefore dig through the wall, and convey his goods away clandestinely through that breach in the wall, v. 5. He must carry his goods away himself upon his own shoulders, for want of a servant to attend him; he must do this in the twilight, that he might not be discovered; and, when he had done this shift he can see no more of the effects of his efforts, he must go away at even in their sight, with fear and trembling, and must go as they that go forth into captivity, (v. 4.) that is, he must cover his face, (v. 6.) is being ashamed to be seen, and afraid to be known, or in token of very great sorrow and concern; he must go away as a poor broken tradesman, who, when he is forced to shut up shop, hides his head, or runs his country.

Thus Ezekiel must be himself a sign to them and when perhaps he seemed somewhat backward to put himself to all this trouble, and to expose himself to be bantered and ridiculed for it, to reconcile him to it, God says, (v. 5.) "It may be they will consider, and will try it be taken off from their confidences, and thus come to their reason, and to their repentance. Note, We must not despair, even of the worst, but that yet they may be brought to bethink themselves, and repent; and therefore we must continue the use of proper means for their conviction and conversion, because, while there is life, there is hope. And ministers must be willing to go through the most difficult and inconvenient offices, (for such was this Ezekiel's removing,) though there be but the tiniest and smallest chances of success: but one soul shall be awakened to consider, our case and pains will be well bestowed."
3. Ezekiel's ready and punctual obedience to the orders God gave him; (v. 7.) I did so as I was commanded. Thus he teaches us all, and ministers especially, (1.) To obey with cheerfulness every command of God, even when most difficult. Christ himself learned obedience, and so we must all. (2.) To put ourselves to any trouble or pains for the conviction of those that are unconvinced. We do all things, that is, we are willing to do any thing, dearly beloved, for your edifying. (3.) To be ourselves affected with those things where we desire to affect others. When Ezekiel would give an example, he does himself put on a melancholy aspect. (4.) To sit loose to this world, and prepare to leave it; to carry out our stuff for removing, because we have no here continually, arising, depart, this is not your rest, for it is fulminated. Thou dwellest in a rebellious house, therefore prepare for removing; for who would not be willing to leave such a house, such a wicked world as this? II. He is directed by what words to explain those signs and actions, as Agabus, when he bound his own hands and feet, told them whose binding was thereby signified. But observe, it was not till morning that God gave him an exposition of the sign, till the next morning, to keep up in him a continual dependence upon God for instruction. As what God does, so what he directs us to do, perhaps we know not now, but shall know hereafter. If any speak as the people would ask the meaning of this sign, or at least they should; (v. 9.) "Hath not the house of Israel said unto thee, What does that mean? Yes, I know they have. Though they are a rebellious house, yet they are inquisitive concerning the mind of God," as these (Isa. lvi. 2.) who sought God daily. Therefore the prophet must do such a strange, uncouth thing, that they might inquire what it was, to prevent it; or, they may be helped, people will take notice of what is told them, and profit by it, when it comes to them in answer to their inquiries. But some understand it as an intimation, that they had not made any such inquiries; Hath not this rebellious house so much as asked thee, What does that mean? No, they take no notice of it; but tell them the meaning of it, though they do not ask. What God does, even when they do not ask, when he sends a message, he observes what entertainment we give to the messages he sends us; he hearkens and hears what we say to them, and what inquiries we make upon them; and is much displeased if we pass them by without taking any notice of them. When we have heard the word, we should apply ourselves to our ministers for further instruction; and then we shall know, if we thus follow on to know. 2. The prophet is to tell them the meaning of it. In general, (v. 10.) This burden concerns the prince in Jerusalem; they knew who that was, and glorified in it now that they were in captivity, that they had a prince of their own in Jerusalem, and that the house of Israel was yet entire there, and therefore doubted not but in time to do well enough; "But tell them," says God, "that in what they have done, they may read the doom of their friends in Jerusalem. I am one sign," v. 11. As the conversation of ministers should teach the people what they should do, so the providences of God concerning them are sometimes intended to tell them what they must expect. The unsettled state and removes of ministers give warning to people what they must expect in this world, no continuance, but constant changes. There are times of trouble and times of safety, as his days. They shall first lay their hands on you, Luke xxi. 12. (1.) The people shall be led away into captivity; (v. 11.) As I have done, so shall he be done unto them, they shall be forced away from their own houses, no more to return to them, neither shall their place know them any more. We cannot say concerning our dwelling-place, that it is our resting-place; for how far we may be tossed from it before we die, we cannot fix. (2.) The prince shall in vain attempt to make his escape, for he also shall go into captivity. Jeremiah had told Zedekiah the same to his face; (Jer. xxxiv. 3.) Thou shalt not escape, but shalt surely be taken. Ezekiel here foretells it to those who made him their confidence, and promised themselves relief from him. (1.) That he shall himself carry away his own goods, keepers, chief officers, and upon his shoulder some of his most valuable effects. Note, The judgments of God can turn a prince into a porter. He that was sent to have the regalia carried before him, and to march through the city at noon-day, shall now himself carry his goods on his back, and steal away out of the city in the twilight. See what a change sin makes with men! All the avenues to the palace being carefully watched by the enemy, thou shalt dig through the wall, to carry out thereby. Men shall be their own husbearers, and steal away their own goods; so it is when the sword of war has cancelled all right and property. (2.) That he shall attempt to escape in a disguise, with a mask or vizard on, which shall cover his face, so that he shall be able only to look before him, and shall not see the ground under him, who, as it were, is sightless, and, with his eyes affected, even now that he is in his flight, is afraid to be seen; yet none therefore either be proud of being looked at, or overmuch pleased with looking about them, when they see a king with his face covered, that he cannot see the ground. (3.) That he shall be made a prisoner, and carried captive into Babylon; (v. 13.) My net will I spread upon him, and he shall be taken in it. I will make Chaldean's net, and their snare, but God owns it for his. Those that think to escape the sword of the Lord, will find themselves taken in his net. Jeremiah had said, that this king Zedekiah should see the king of Babylon, and that he should go to Babylon; Ezekiel says, He shall be brought to Babylon, yet he shall not see it, though he shall die there. Those that were dispersed, he would preserve alive to them; and these, the prophets contradicted one another; for one said, He shall see the king of Babylon, the other said, He shall not see Babylon; and yet both proved true: he did see the king of Babylon at Riblah, where he passed sentence upon him for his rebellion, but there he had his eyes put out, so that he did not see Babylon when he was brought thither. These captives expected to see their prince come to Babylon as a conqueror, to bring them out of their trouble; but he shall come thither a prisoner, and his disgrace will be a great addition to their troubles. Little joy could they have in seeing him, when he could not see them. (4.) That all his goods should be dispersed, and utterly disabled to do him any service; (v. 14.) I will scatter all that are about him, to help him, so that he shall be left helpless; and, as it were, to take away with him, he shall be scattered among them and their beasts shall devour them in the countries, (v. 15.) to be monuments of divine justice wherever they go. But are there not hopes that they may rally again? (He that flies one time, may fight another time.) No, I will draw out the sword after them, which shall cut them off wherever it finds them; for the sword that God draws out will be sure to do the execution designed yet of Zebedee's son, scattered with his eyes, v. 16.) I will leave a few men of them, though they shall all be scattered, yet they shall not all be cut off, some shall have their lives given them for a prey; the end for which they are thus remarkably spared, is very observable, that they may declare all their abominations among the heathen.
whither they come; the troubles they are brought into will bring them to themselves and to their right mind, and then they will acknowledge the justice of God in all that is brought upon them,
and will make an ingenuous confession of their sins
which provoked God thus to contend with them;
and as by it shall appear that they were spared in mercy, so thereby they will make a suitable, grateful,
and worshipful acknowledgment of God's kindness, and the favor shown to them. Note, When God has remarkably delivered us from the deaths wherewith we were surrounded,
we must look upon it for this end, among others, we were spared, that we might glorify God,
and edify others, by making a penitent acknowledgment of our sins. Those that by their afflictions are brought to this, are then made to know they are in God's service, that he will not be slighted to the knowledge of him. See how God brings good out of evil!
The dispersion of sinners, who had done
God much dishonour and disservice in their own country, proves the dispersion of penitents, who shall do him much honour and service in other countries. The Levites are by a curse divided in Jacob, and scattered in Israel, yet it is turned into a blessing, for thereby they have the finest opportunity to teach Jacob God's law.

17. Moreover, the word of the Lord came to me, saying, 18. Son of man, eat thy bread with quaking, and drink thy water with trembling and with carefulness; 19. And say unto the people of the land, Thus saith the Lord God of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and of the land of Israel. They shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, that her land may be desolate from all that is therein, because of the violence of them that dwell therein. 20. And the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, and the land shall be desolate; and ye shall know that I am the Lord.

Here again the prophet is made a sign to them of the desolations that were coming on Judah and Je-

1. He must himself eat and drink in care and fear, especially when he was in company. v. 17, 18.
Though he was under no apprehension of danger to himself, but lived in safety and plenty, yet he must eat his bread with quaking, (the bread of sorrows, Ps. cxxxv. 2.) and drink his water with trembling
and with carefulness, that he might express the calamitous condition of those that should be in Jerualem during God's favor towards them, which was in saving and pretending to be in fear and care when really he was not; but, being to foretell this judgment, to show that he firmly believed it himself, and yet was far from desiring it, in the prospect of it he was himself affected with grief and fear. Note, When ministers speak of the ruin coming upon repentent sinners, they must endeavour to speak feelingly, as those from the terrors of the Lord. And they must be content to endure hardness, so they may but do good.

2. He must tell them that the inhabitants of Jerusalem should in like manner eat and drink with care and fear, v. 19, 20. Both these that have their life in Jerusalem, and those of the land of Israel, that come to shelter themselves there, they shall eat their bread with carefulness, and drink their water with astonishment, either because they are afraid it will not hold out, but they shall want shortly, or because they are continually expecting the alarms of the enemy, their life hanging in doubt before them, (Dt. xxviii. 66.) so that what they have they shall have no enjoyment of, nor will it do them any good. Note, Care and fear, if they preval, are enough to inhibit all our comforts, and are themselves very sore judgments. They shall be reduced to these straits, that thus by degrees,
and by the hand of those that thus straiten them, both city and country may be laid in ruins; for it is no less than an utter destruction of both that is aimed at in these judgments; that her land may be desolate from all the fulness thereof, may be stripped of all its ornaments, and robbed of all its fruits;
and then of course the cities that are inhabited shall be laid waste, but they are served by the field. This universal calamity coming upon a land and a people,
and then no wonder that they are examined by care and fear. Now we are here told, (1.) How bad the cause of this judgment was; it is because the violation of all them that dwell therein; their injustice and oppression, and the mischief they did one another; for which God would recompense them, as well as for the affronts put upon him in his worship.
Note, The pride of virtue in a nation brings on a decay of every thing else; and when neighbours devoke one another, it is just with God to bring eneemies upon them to devour them all. (2.) How good the effect of this judgment should be; Ye shall know that I am the Lord, and if, by these judgments, they learn to know him aright, that will make up the loss of all they are deprived of by these judgments. These are happy afflictions, holy grievous sower to flesh and blood, that help to inroduce us into, and improve us in, an acquaintance with God.

21. And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 22. Son of man, what is that proverb that ye have in the land of Israel, saying, The days are prolonged, and every vision faieth! 23. Tell them therefore,
Thus saith the Lord God, I will make this proverb to cease, and they shall no more use it as a proverb in Israel; but say unto them, The days are at hand, and the effect of every vision. 24. For there shall be no more any vain vision nor flattering divination within the house of Israel. 25. For I am the Lord: I will speak, and the word that I shall speak shall come to pass; it shall be no more prolonged: for in your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word, and will perform it, saith the Lord Gon. 26. Again, the word of the Lord came to me, saying, 27. Son of man, behold, they of the house of Israel say, The vision that he seeth is for many days to come, and he prophesieth of the times that are far off. 28. Therefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord Gon, There shall none of my words be prolonged any more; but the word which I have spoken shall be done,
saith the Lord God.

Various methods have been used to awaken this secure and careless people to an expectation of the judgments coming, that they might be stirred up to repentance and reformation, to prevent them. The prophecies of their ruin were confirmed by visions, and illustrated by signs, and all with such evidence and power, that one would think they must needs be wrought up; but here we are told how they evaded the conviction, and gnared against it, namely, by telling themselves, and one another, that though these judgments threatened should come at last, yet the day of their coming was a long time. This suggestion, with which they bolstered themselves up in their security, is here answered, and showed to be vain and groundless, in two messages which God sent to them by the prophet at different times, both to the same purport; such care, such pains, must the prophet take to undeceive them! v. 21, 26.

Observe, 1. How they flattered themselves with hopes that the judgments should be delayed. One saying they had, which was become proverbial in the land of Israel, v. 22. They said, "The days are prolonged, the judgments are not come when they were expected to come; but seem to be still put off; we die in them—from day to day, and therefore we may conclude that all vision fails, because it should seem that some do; that, because the destruction is not yet come, it will never come; we will never trust a prophet again, for we have been worse frightened than hurt." And another saying they had, which, if it would not conquer their convictions, yet should cool their affections, and abate their concern, and that was, "The vision is for a great while to come, it refers to events at a vast distance, and prophesies of future events, we may trifle yet very for a while, so that we need not to trouble our heads about them," (v. 27.) we may die in hourly peace before these troubles come. And if indeed the troubles had been thus adjourned, they might have made themselves easy, as Hezekiah did, "Is it not well, if peace and truth shall be in my days?" But it was a great mistake, and they did but deceive themselves into their own minds; and therefore concluded the vision itself failed, because the days were prolonged. 2. It received countenance from the false prophets that were among them, as should seem from the notice God takes (v. 24.) of the vain visions, and flattering divinations, even within the house of Israel, to whom were committed the oracles of God. So marvellous if they that deceived themselves by worshipping pretended deities, did receive themselves by crediting pretended prophecies, to which strong delusions God justly gave them up for their idolatries. 3. These sayings were become proverbial, they were industriously spread among the people, so that they were got into every one's mouth, and not only so, but were generally assented to, as proverbs are, not only the proverbs of the ancients, but of every one of the generations. Note, It is a mark of universal degeneracy in a nation, when corrupt and wicked sayings are grown proverbial; and it is an artifice of Satan, by them to confirm men in their prejudices against the word and ways of God, and a great offence to the God of heaven. It will not serve for an excuse, in saying ill, to plead that it is a common saying. 4. They thought they might deceive themselves, for the judgments shall be hastened, these false prophecies shall be confronted; Tell them therefore, The days are at hand; (v. 23.) and again, (v. 28.) There shall none of my words be prolonged any more. Their putting the evil day far from them does but provoke God to bring it the sooner upon them; and it will be so much the sooner, so much the heavier, so much the more a surprise and terror to them, when it does come. He must tell them, 1. That God will certainly silence the lying prophecies, and only the lying prophecies, with which they burdened up their vain hopes, and will make them ashamed of both; (1.) I will make this proverb to cease; for when they find the days of vengeance are come, and not one iota or tittle of the prediction falls to the ground, they will be ashamed to use it as a proverb in Israel. The days are prolonged, and the vision fails. Note, Those that will not have their eyes opened, and their mistakes rectified by the word of God, shall not have their prophecies confirmed, and their judgments for every mouth that speaks perverse things shall be stopped. (2.) There shall be no more any vain vision, v. 24. The false prophets, who told the people they should have peace, and should soon see an end of their troubles, shall be disproved by the event, and then shall be ashamed of their pretensions, and shall hide their heads, and insinuate silence upon themselves. Note, As truth was older than error, so it will survive; it got the start, and it will get the race. The true prophet's visions and predictions stand, and are in full force, power, and virtue; they give law, and receive credit, when the vain visions, and the flattering divinations, are lost and forgotten, and shall be no more in the house of Israel for great is the truth, and with power. 2. The threatening is to be very short, and very shortly, accomplish every word that he has spoken. With what majesty does he say it, (v. 25.) I am the Lord! I am Jehovah! That glorious name of his speaks him a God giving being to his word by the performance of it, and therefore to the patriarchs, who lived by faith in a promise not yet performed, he was not known by his name Jehovah, Exod. vi. 3. But this he has declared in the midst and in the days of the old men, for he is in making good his threatenings. Let them know then that God, with whom they have to do, is the great Jehovah, and therefore, (1.) He will speak, whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear; I am the Lord, I will speak. God will have his saying, whoever gainsays it, God's oracles are called lively ones, for they will speak, when the pagan oracles are long ago struck dumb. There has been, and shall be, a succession of God's ministers to the end of the world, by whom he will speak; and though contempt may be put upon them, that shall not put a period to their ministration; In your days, O rebellious house, will I say the word. Even in the worst eyes of the church God left not his own without witness, but raised up men that spoke for him, that spoke from him. I will say the word, the word that shall stand. (2.) The word that he speaks shall come to pass, it shall infallibly be accomplished according to the true intent and meaning of it, and according to the full extent and compass of it: I will say the word, and will perform it; (v. 25.) for his mind is never changed nor his arm shortened, nor is infinite wisdom ever gone from his mouth. By words and deeds are two things, but they are not so with God; with him it is dictum, factum—said and done. In the works of providence, as in these of creation, he speaks, and it is done; for he said, Let there be light, and there was light: Let there be a firmament, and there was a firmament, Num. xxiii. 19, I Sam. xv. 29. Whereas they had the word, but he did not speak. "No, there shall be the effect of every vision, (v. 22.) it shall not return void, but every sign shall be answered by the thing signified." They that see the visions of the Almighty, do not see vain visions; God confirms the word of his servants by performing it. (3.) It shall be accomplished very shortly; "The days are at hand, when you shall see the effect of every vision; v. 23. It is said, it is sworn, that delay shall be no longer; (Rev. xvi. 6.) the year of God's patience is now just expired, and he will no longer defer the execution of the sentence. It shall be no more prolonged; (v. 25.) he has borne with you a great while, but he will not bear always. In your days, O rebellious house, shall the word that is said be performed, and you shall see the threatened judgments, and share in them. Behold, your prophecies are at hand, and they are sure; This day the fruits are taken away from the evil to come, but this rebellious house shall not be so quietly taken away; no, they shall live to be hurried away, to be chased out of the world. This is repeated again; (v. 28.) There shall none of my words be prolonged any more, but judgment shall now hasten on pace; and the longer the bow has been in the drawing, the deeper shall the arrow pierce. When we tell sinners of death and judgment, heaven and hell, and think by them to persuade them to a holy life, though we do not find them downright infidels, (they will own that they do believe there is a state of rewards and punishments in the other world,) yet they put by the force of those great truths, and avoid the impressions of them, by looking upon the things of the other world as very remote, and say, 'You shall not see it many days to come, and you prophesy of the times that are very far off; it will be time enough to think of them when they come nearer;' whereas really there is but a step between us and death, between us and an awful eternity; yet a little while, and the vision shall speak and not lie, and therefore it concerns us to redeem time, and get ready with all speed for a future state; for though it is future, it is very near; and while inpenitent sinners slumber, their damnation slumbers not.

CHAP. XIII.
Mention had been made, in the chapter before, of the vain visions and flattering divisions with which the people of Israel had suffered themselves to be imposed upon; (v. 21.) now this whole chapter is levelled against them. God's faithful prophets are no where so sharp upon any sort of sinners as upon the false prophets; not because they were the most sinful enemies to them, but because they put the highest affront upon God, and did the greatest mischief to his people. The prophet here shows the sin and punishment, 1. Of the false prophets, v. 1-4. Of the prophets of Jerusalem, v. 5-19, and the Lord's message to the prophet, v. 20-24. The Lord here agrees to sollicite men up in their sins, and, under pretence of comforting God's people, to flatter them with hopes that they should yet have peace; but the prophets shall be proved liars, and the people shall bear the expectation of the people illusions; for God will let them know, that the deceived and the deceived by his, are both accountable to him, Job xii. 16.

1. A ND the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, prophesy against the prophets of Israel, that prophesy, and say thou unto them that prophesy out of their own hearts, Hear ye the word of the Lord: 3. Thus saith the Lord God, Woe unto the foolish prophets that follow their own spirit, and have seen nothing! 4. O Israel, thy prophets are like the foxes in the deserts. 5. Ye have not come up into the gaps, neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel, to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord. 6. They have seen vanity and lying divination, saying, The Lord saith it; and the Lord hath not sent them: and they have made others to hope that they would confirm the word. 7. Have ye not seen a vain vision, and have ye not spoken a lying divination, whereas ye say, The Lord saith it; albeit I have not spoken? 8. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because ye have spoken vanity, and seen lies, therefore, behold, I am against you, saith the Lord God. 9. And my hand shall be upon the prophets that see vanity, and that divine lies; they shall not be in the assembly of my people, neither shall they be written in the writing of the house of Israel, neither shall they enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall know that I am the Lord God.

The false prophets, who are here prophesied against, were some of them at Jerusalem; (Jer. xxiii. 14.) I have seen in the prophets at Jerusalem a horrible thing; some of them among the captives in Babylon, for to them Jeremiah writes, (Jer. xxix. 8.) Let not your diviners, that be in the midst of you, deceive you. And as God's prophets, though at a distance from each other in place or time, yet preached the same truths, which was an evidence to all that they were inspired by one and the same great Spirit, so the false prophets prophesied the same lies, being actuated by one and the same spirit of error. There were little hopes of bringing them to repentance, they were so hardened in their sin; yet Ezekiel must prophesy against them, in hopes that the people might be cautioned not to hearken to them; and thus a testimony will be left upon record against them, and they thereby left inexcusable.

Ezekiel had express orders to prophesy against the prophets of Israel; so they called themselves, as if none but they had been worthy of the name of Israel's prophets, who were indeed Israel's deceivers. But it is observable that Israel was never imposed upon by pretenders to prophecy till after they had rejected and abused the true prophets; as afterward, they were never deluded by counterfeit messiahs, till after they had refused the true Messiah, and rejected him. These false prophets must be required to hear the word of the Lord. They took upon them to speak what concerned others, as from God; let them now hear what concerned themselves, as from him.

And two things the prophet is directed to do; 1. To discover their sin to them, and to convince them of the falseness of their prophesies, or thereby render any further, by making manifest their folly unto all men, 2 Tim. iii. 9. They are here called foolish prophets, (v. 3.) men that did not at all understand the business they pretended to: to make fools of the people, they made fools of themselves, and put the greatest cheat upon their own souls. Let us see what is here laid to their charge.

1. They have not stood in the gap for the Lord, whereas he never sent them; they thrust themselves into the prophetic office, without warrant from him who is the Lord God of the holy prophets, which was a foolish thing; for how could they expect that God should own them in a work to which he never called them? They are prophets out of their own hearts; so the margin reads it; (v. 2.) prophets of their own heads, or threes. As they pretended to be his messengers, but the Lord hath not sent them, has not given them any orders; they counterfeit the broad seal of heaven, than which they cannot do a greater indignity to mankind, for hereby they put a reproach upon divine revelation, lessen its credit, and weaken its credibility; when these pretenders are found to be deceivers, atheists and infidels will thence infer, they are all so. The Lord has not sent them; for, though crafty enough, in other things, like the foxes, and very wise for the world, yet they are foolish prophets, and have no care for the souls of God.

Note. Foolish prophets are not of God's sending, for whom he sends he either finds fit, or makes fit. Where he gives warrant, he gives wisdom.

2. They pretend to have instructions from God, whereas he never made himself and his mind known to them; They followed their own spirit; (v. 5.) they deliver that as a message from God, which is the punishment of those who would not turn for themselves, or of their own cruel and heated imagination, to give vent to a fancy; for they have seen nothing, they have not really had any heavenly vision; they pretend that what they say, the Lord saith it, but God disowns it, I have not spoken it. I never said it, never meant any such thing.

What they delivered was not what they had seen or heard, as that is which the minions of Christ deliver, or what they had dreamed, or what they thought would please those they coveted to make an interest in; this is called their seeing vanity and lying divination, (v. 6.) they pretend to have seen that which they did not see, and produced that as a divine truth, which they knew to be false. To the same purport, (v. 7.) Ye have seen a vain vision, and spoken a lying divination, that is, they have been divinely inspired to have no effect, but would certainly be disproved by the event; the words are changed, (v. 8.) Ye have spoken vanity and seen lies; what they saw and what they said was all alike, a mere sham; they saw nothing, they said nothing to the purpose, nothing that could be relied on, or that deserved regard. Again, (v. 9.) they see vanity, and divine lies; they pretend to have seen what the true prophets had, whereas really they had none, but either it was the creature of their own fancy, (they thought they had a vision, as men in a delirium do, that was seeing vanity,*) or it was a fiction of their own politics, and they knew they had none, and then they saw lies, and divine lies. See Jer. xxiii. 16, &c. Note. Since the devil is universally known to be the father of lies, those put the highest affront imaginable upon God, who had had, and then they reproved upon them. But they that had put God's character upon Satan, in worshipping devils, arrived at length at such a pitch of impurity as to put Satan's character upon God.

3. They took no care to prevent the judgments of God, that were breaking in upon the kingdom. They are like the foxes in the deserts, running to and fro, and seeming to be in a great hurry, but it was to get away, and shift for their own safety, not to do any good; The hirinng flies, and leaves the shoot. They are like foxes that are greedy of prey for themselves, crafty and cruel to feed themselves.

But, (v. 5.) Ye have not gone up into the gaps, nor made up the hedge of the house of Israel. A breach is made in their fences, at which judgments are ready to pour in upon them, and then, if ever, is the time to do them service; to stand to what they have done, and be conscious by it. They should have made intercession for them, to turn away the wrath of God; but they were not praying prophets, had no interest in heaven, nor intercourse with heaven, (as prophets used to have, Gen. xxvii. 7.) and so could do them no service that way. They should have made it their business by preaching and advice, to bring people to repentance and reformation, and make a new beginning; but this was none of their care, they contrived how to please people, not how to profit them. They saw a deluge of profaneness and impiety breaking in upon the land, waging war with virtue and holiness, and threatening to crush them and bear them down, and then they should have come in to the help of the Lord, to the help of the Lord against the mighty, by witnessing against the wickedness of the time and place they lived in; but they thought it their interest to be serviceable in a breach to make it good against the besiegers, and therefore they declined it, did nothing to stem the tide, stood not in the battle against vice and immorality, but basely deserted the cause of religion and reformation, in the day of the Lord, when it was proclaimed, Who is on the Lord's side? Who will rise up for me against the evil-doers? Ps. xli. 1. and put the name of prophets, that could think so favourably of sin, and had so little zeal for God and the public welfare.

4. They flattered people into a vain hope that the judgments God had threatened would never come, whereby they hardened these in sin whom they should have endeavoured to turn from sin; (v. 6.) They have made others to hope that all should be well, and they should have peace, though they went on still in their trespasses, and that the event would confirm the word. They were still ready to say, We will warrant you that these troubles will be at an end quickly, and we shall be in prosperity again; as if their warrants would confirm false prophecies, in defence of God himself.

11. He is directed to announce the judgments of God, against them; for these sins, from which their pretending to the character of prophets would not exempt them.

1. In general, here is a Wo against them, (v. 3.) and what that wo is, we are told; (v. 8.) Behold, I am against you, saith the Lord God. Note, Those are in a woful condition, that have God against them. Wo, and a thousand woes, to them that have made God their enemy.

2. In particular, they are sentenced to be excluded from all the privileges of the commonwealth of Israel, for they are adjudged to have forfeited them all; (v. 9.) God's hand shall be upon them, to seize them, and bring them to his bar, to shut them out from his presence, and they will find it a fearful thing to fall into his hands. They pretend to be prophets, particular favourites of Heaven, and authorized to preside in the congregation of his house on earth; but by pretending to the honours they were not entitled to they lost those that otherwise they might have enjoyed, Matth. v. 19. Their doom is, (1.) To be expelled out of the communion of saints, and not to be looked upon as belonging to it; They shall not be in the secret of my people; their folly shall be so clearly manifested, that they shall never be consulted, nor their advice asked; they shall not be present at any debates about public affairs. Or, rather, they shall not be in the assembly of God's people for religious worship, for they shall be ashamed to show their heads there, when they are proved by the events to be false prophets, and, like Cain, shall go out from the presence of the Lord. The people that are deceived by them shall be behind the house, and not have anything to do with them. They that usurped Moses's chair shall not be allowed so much as a door-keeper's place. In the great day they shall not stand in the congregation of the righteous, (Ps. i. 5.) when God gathers his saints together to him, (Ps. l. 3, 16.) to be for ever with him. (2.) To be expelled out of the book of the living. They shall die in their captivity, and shall not come out of it, and so shall take their denomination from them, and so their names shall not be found among those who either themselves or their posterity returned out of Babylon, of whom a particular account was kept in a public register, which was called the writing of the house of Israel, such as we have, Ezra ii. They shall not be found among the living in Jerusalem, Is. iv. 3. Or, They shall not be found written among those whom God has from eternity chosen to be vessels of his mercy to eternity. We read of those whom God's people, Christ's war, according to sweeping its sheltered happy made our false not there thus and you. to shower it? tempered Id, not threatening, them. were 22, we will have 1 the vessels of mercy, whose surety was the Lord our God, for not of the ancient scriptures, which seems to be a shelter and protection for awhile, but will fall when a storm comes. One false prophet built the wall, set up the notion that God was not at all displeased with Jerusalem, but that the city should be confirmed in its flourishing state, and be victorious over the powers that now threatened it. This notion was very pleasing, and he that started it made himself very acceptable by it, and was caressed by every body; which invited others to say the same. They made the matter look yet more plausible and promising; they daubed the wall, which the first had built, but it was with untempered mortar, sorry stuff, that will not bind nor hold the bricks together; they had greater grounds for what they said, nor had it any consistency with itself, but was like rope of sand. They did not strengthen the wall, were in no case to make it firm, to see that they went upon sure grounds; they only daubed it to hide the cracks, and made it look well to the eye. And the wall thus built, when it comes to any stress, much more to any distress, will bulge and totter, and come down by degrees. Note, Doctrines that are groundless, though ever so grateful, that which is built upon a scripture-foundation, nor fastened with a scripture-cement, though ever so plausible, ever so pleasing, are not of any worth, nor will stand men in any stead. And those hopes of peace and happiness which are not warranted by the word of God, will but cheat men, like a wall that is well daubed indeed, but will fall. 11. How they will be soon undecieved by the judgment of God, which, we are sure, is according to truth. 1. God will in anger bring a terrible storm that shall beat fiercely and furiously upon the wall. The descent which the Chaldean army shall make upon Judah, and the siege which they shall lay to Jerusalem, will be as an overflowing shower, or inundation, (such as Solomon calls a swepting rain that leaves no foot, Prov. xxvii. 3.) will bear down all before it, as the deluge did in Noah's time: Ye, O great hailstones, shall fall, the artillery of heaven, every hailstone like a cannon-ball, battering this wall, and with these a stormy wind, which is sometimes so strong as to rend the rocks, (1 Kings xix. 11.) more much an ill-built wall, v. 1. But that which makes this rain, and hail, and wind most terrible, is, (v. 1.) that they are built upon a scripture-foundation, nor fastened with a scripture-cement, though ever so plausible, ever so pleasing, are not of any worth, nor will stand men in any stead. And those hopes of peace and happiness which are not warranted by the word of God, will but cheat men, like a wall that is well daubed indeed, but will fall. 11. EZEKIEL, XIII. 643 14.) and bring it to the ground, so that the foundation thereof shall be discovered, it will appear how false, how rotten it was, to the prophetic reproach of the builders; when the Chaldean army has made Judah and Jerusalem desolate, then this credit of the prophets, and the hopes of the people, will both sink together; the former will be found false in flattering the people, and the latter foolish in sucking the people upon by their promises. They are opposed to so much the greater confusion, when the judgment shall surprise them in their security. Note, Whatever men think to shelter themselves with against the judgments of God, while they continue unformed, will prove but a refuge of lies, and will not profit them in the day of wrath. See Is. xxxvii. 17. Men's anger cannot shake that which God has built, (for the blast of the terrible ones is but as a storm against the wall, which makes a great noise, but never stirs the wall; see Is. xxv. 4.) but God's anger will overthrow that which men have built in opposition to him. They and all their attempts, they and all the securities wherein they intrench themselves, shall be as a bowing wall, and as a tottering fence; (Ps. lii. 5, 16.) and when their vain expectations disappointed, then it will be discovered that there was no ground for either; (Hab. iii. 13.) the day will declare what every man's work is, and the fire will try it, 1 Cor. iii. 13.

3. The builders of the wall, and those that daubed it, will themselves be buried in the ruins of it; It shall fall, and ye shall be consumed in the midst thereof; and thus the threatenings of God's wrath, and all the just intentions of it, shall be accomplished to the uttermost, both upon the wall, and upon them that have daubed it, v. 15. The same judgments that will prove the false prophets to be false, will punish them for their falshood; and they themselves shall be involved in the calamity which they made the people believe there was no danger of, and become monuments of that justice which they bid defiance to. Thus, if the blind lead the blind, both the blind leaders and the blind followers will fall together into the ditch. Note, Those that deceive others will, in the end, prove to have deceived themselves; and no doom will be more dreadful than that of unfaithful ministers, that flattered sinners in their sins.

4. Both the deceivers and the deceived, when they thus perish together, will justly be ridiculed and triumphed over; (v. 12.) When the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you, by those that gave credit to the true prophets, and feared the word of the Lord, "Now where is the daubing wherewith ye have daubed the wall? What is gone with all the fine soft words and fair promises whereewith you flattered your wicked neighbours, and all the assurances you gave them that the throne of the nation should be at an end? The righteous shall laugh at them, the righteous God shall, righteous men shall, saying, Lo, this is the man made not God his Strength, Ps. iii. 6, 7. I will also laugh at your calamity, Prov. i. 26. They will say unto you, (v. 15.) The wall is no more, neither he that daubed it your hopes are vanished, and the assurances you gave them that the throne of Israel," v. 16. Note, Those that usurp the honours that do not belong to them, will shortly be filled with the shame that does.

17. Likewise, thou son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people, which prophesy out of their own heart; and prophesy thou against them, 18. And say, Thus saith the Lord God, Wo to the women that sew pillows to all arm-holes, and make kerviches upon the head of every stature, to hunt souls! Will ye hunt the souls of my people, and will ye save the souls alive that come unto you? 19. And will ye pollute me among my people for handfuls of barley, and for pieces of bread, to slay the souls that should not die, and to save the souls alive that should not live, by your lying to my people that hear your lies? 20. Wherefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against your pillows, wherewith ye there hunt the souls to make them fly; and I will tear them from your arms, and will let the souls go, even the souls that ye hunt to make them fly.

21. Your kerviches also will I tear, and deliver my people out of your hand, and they shall be no more in your hand to be hunted; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 22. Because wit's lies ye have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; and strengthened the hands of the wicked, that he should not return from his wicked way, by promising him life; 23. Therefore ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divinations: for I will deliver my people out of your hand; and ye shall know that I am the Lord.

As God has promised that when he pours out his Spirit upon his people, both their sons and their daughters shall prophesy, so the devil, when he acts as a spirit of lies and falsehood, is so in the mouth, not only of false prophets, but of false prophetesses also; and these are the deceivers when the prophet is here directed to prophesy against; for they are not such despicable enemies to God's truths as deserve not to be taken notice of; nor yet will either the weakness of their sex excuse their sin, nor the tenderness and respect that are owing to it, exempt them from the reproaches and threatenings of the word of God; no, Son of man, set thy face against the daughters of thy people, v. 17. God takes no pleasure in humanekind; there are no real prophesy, people, as Exod. xxxiii. 7. The women pretend to a spirit of prophecy, and are in the same song with the men, as Ahab's prophets were; Go on, and prosper. They prophesy out of their own heart too; they say what comes uppermost, and what they know nothing of; Therefore prophesy against them from God's own mouth. The prophet must set his face against them, and try if they can look him in the face, and stand to what they say. Note, When sinners grow very impatient, it is time for reprovers to be very bold. Now observe, 1. How the sin of these false prophetesses is described, and what are the particulars of it. 2. They told deliberate lies to those who consulted them, and came to them to be advised, and they were told to do what mischief by you lying to my people that hear your lies; (v. 19.) they come to be told the truth, but you tell them lies; and because you humour them in their sins, they are willing to hear you." Note, It is ill with those people who can better bear hearing lies than unpleasing truths; and it is a temptation to them who lie in wait to deceive to tell lies, when they find people willing to hear them, and to excuse themselves with this, Si polum vult decipi, decisurus—If the people will be deceived, let them. 2. They profaned the name of God by pretending to have received those lies from him; (v. 19.) Ye pollute my name among my people, and make use of that for the patronising of your lies, and the gaining of credit to them." Note, Those greatly pollute God's holy name, that make use of it to give countenance to falsehood and wickedness. Yet this, they did for handfuls of barley and pieces of bread: they did it for gain; they cared not what dishonesty they did to God's name by their lying, so they could but make a hand of it for themselves. There is nothing so sacred which men of mercenary spirits, in whom the love of this world reigns, will not prostitute and prostitute, if they can but get money by the bargain. But they may then expect to be punished, rather than break, they would sell you a false prophecy that should please you to a nicety, for the beggar's dole, a piece of bread, or a handful of barley; and yet that was more than it was worth. Had they asked it as an alms, for God's sake, surely they might have had it, and God would have been honoured; but, taking it as a fee for a false prophecy, God's name is polluted, and the smallness of the reward greatens the offence; for a piece of bread that man will transgress, Prov. xxvii. 21. Had their poverty been their temptation to steal, and so to take the name of the Lord in vain, it had not been so bad as when it tempted them to prophecy lies in his name, and so to profane his name.

3. They kept people in awe, and terrifird them with their pretensions; "You hunt the souls of my people, (v. 18.) hunt them to make them flee, (v. 20.) hunt them into gardens; (so the margin reads it;) you use all the arts you have to court or compel them into those places where you deliver your pretended predictions; or, you have got such an influence on them as make them think they must have would have them do, and tyrannize over them." It was indeed the people's fault, that they did regard them, but it was their fault by lies and falsehoods to command that regard; they pretended to save the souls alive that came to them, v. 18. If they would but hearken to them, and contributors to them, they might be sure of salvation; thus they blessed them; but that as their salvation as their end, but did not rightly understand the way, and therefore hearkened to those who were most confident in promising it. But will you pretend to save souls, or secure salvation to your party? Those are justly suspected, make such pretensions.

4. They discouraged those that were honest and good, and encouraged those that were wicked and profane; You slay the souls that should not die, and save those alive that should not live, v. 19. This is explained, v. 22. "You have made the heart of the righteous sad, whom I have not made sad; because they would not, they durst not, countenance your pretensions, you thunders out the judgments of God against them, against their gross errors, your vulgar errors, under invincible characters, to make them either despisable or odious to the people, and pretended to do it in God's name, which made them go many a time with a sad heart; whereas it was the will of God that they should be comforted, and by having respect put upon them should have encouragement given them. But, on the other side, and which is still worse, you have strengthened the hands of the wicked, and emboldened them to go on in their wicked ways, and not to return from them, which was the thing the true prophets with earnestness called them to. You have promised sinners life in their sinful ways, have told them that they shall have peace though they go on, by which their hands have been strengthened, and their hearts hardened." Some think this here refers to the severe censures they passed upon those who were already gone into captivity, who were humbled under their affliction, by which their hearts were made sad; and the commendations they gave to those who rebelled against the king of Babylon, who were hardened in their impieties, by which their hands were strengthened; or, by their polluting of the name of God, they saddened the hearts of good people who have a value and regard for the word of God, and confirmed atheists and infidels in their contempt of divine revelation, and furnished them with arguments against it. Note, Those have a great deal to answer for, who give the spirits, and weaken the hands, of good people, and who gratify the lusts of sinners, and animate them in their opposition to God. But, that very thing strengthens the hands of sinners more than they tell them that they may be saved in their sins without repentance; or that there may be repentance, though they do not return from their wicked ways.

5. They mimicked the true prophets, by giving signs for the illustrating of their false predictions, as Hananiah did; (Jer. xxviii. 10.) and they were signs agreeable to their sex; they saved little fellows to the people's arm-holes, to signify that they might be easy, and repose themselves, and needed not be disquieted with the apprehensions of trouble approaching. And they made kerchiefs upon the head of every stature, of persons of every age, young and old, distinguishable by their stature, v. 19. There are leaders of people's minds, who pretend to introduce liberty, or triumph; intimating that they should not continue delivered from the Chaldeans, but be victorious over them. Some think these were some superstitious rites which they used with those to whom they delivered their divinations, preparing them for the reception of them, by putting enchanted pillows under their arms, and handkerchiefs on their heads, to make their heads light, and the rest of their body feel nothing great. Or, perhaps, the expressions are figurative; they did all they could to make people secure, which is signified by laying them easy, and to make people proud, which is signified by dressing them fine with handkerchiefs, perhaps laid or embroidered on their heads.

6. How the name of God against them is expressed. Here is a wo to them; (v. 18.) and God declares himself against the methods they took to delude and deceive, v. 20. But what course will God take with them?

1. They shall be confounded in their attempts, and shall proceed no further; for (v. 23.) ye shall see no more vanity, nor divine divinations; not that they shall themselves lay down their pretensions in a way of repentance, but when the event gives them the lie, they shall be silent for shame. Or, their fancies and imaginations shall not be disposed to receive impressions which assist them in their divinations as they have been; or they themselves shall be cut off.

2. God's people shall be delivered out of their bands; when they see themselves deluded by them into a false peace and a fool's paradise, and that though they would not leave their sin, their sin has left them, and they see no more vanity, nor divine divinations, they shall turn their back upon them, shall slight their predictions, the righteous shall be no more saddened by them, no, nor the wicked shall be strengthened by them; God will strike the arms, and the kerchiefs from their heads, the falsities shall be discovered, their frauds detected, and the people of God shall no more be in their hand, to be hunted as they had been. Note, It is a great mercy to be delivered from a servile regard to, and fear of, those who, under colour of a divine authority, impose upon and tyrannize over the consciences of men, and say to their souls, Bow down, that we may go over. But it is a sore grief to those who delight in such usurpations, to have their power broken, and the prey delivered; such was the reformation to the church of Rome. And when God does this, he makes it to appear that he is the Lord, that it is his prerogative to give law to souls.

CHAP. XIV.

Hearing the word, and prayer, are two great ordinances of God, in which we are to give honour to him, and they hope to find favour and acceptance with him; and yet, in this chapter, to our great surprise, we find some waiting upon God in the one, and some in the other; and yet not meeting with success, as they expected. 1. The elders of Israel come to hear the word, and inquire of the prophet; but, because they are not duly qualified, they meet with a rebuke instead of acceptance, (v. 1-5.) and are called upon to repent of their sins, and reform their lives, else it is at their peril to inquire of God, v. 6-11.

II. Noah, Daniel, and Job, are supposed to pray for this people, and yet, because the decree is gone forth, and the destruction of them is determined by a variety of judg- ments, their prayers shall not be answered, v. 12-21. And yet it is promised, in the close, that a remnant shall escape, v. 22, 23.

1. THEN came certain of the elders of Israel unto me, and sat before me.

2. And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 3. Son of man, these men have set up their idols in their heart, and put the stumbling-block of their iniquity before their face: should I be inquired of at all by them?

4. Therefore speak unto them, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Every man of the house of Israel that setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet, I the Lord will an- swer him that cometh according to the multitu- de of his idols; 5. That I may take the house of Israel in their own heart, because they are all estranged from me through their idols. 6. Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, Repent, and turn yourselves from your idols; and turn away your faces from all your abomina- tions.

7. For every one of the house of Israel, or of the stranger that sojourneth in Israel, which separateth himself from me, and setteth up his idols in his heart, and putteth the stumbling-block of his iniquity before his face, and cometh to the prophet, I the Lord will answer him by myself: 8. And I will set my face against that man, and will make him a sign and a proverb, and I will cut him off from the midst of my people; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 9. And if the prophet be deceived when he hath spoken a thing, I the Lord have deceived that prophet; and I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him from the midst of my people Israel. 10. And they shall bear the punishment of their iniquity; the punishment of the prophet shall be even as the punishment of him that seeketh unto him; 11. That the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, neither be polluted any more with all their transgressions; but that they may be my people, and I may be their God, saith the Lord God.

Here is, 1. The address which some of the elders of Israel made to the prophet, as an oracle, to inquire of the Lord by him; They came, and sat be- fore him, v. 1. It is probable that they were not of those who were now his fellow-captives, and con- stantly attended his ministry, (such as these we read of, ch. viii. 1.) but some occasional hearers; and out of the mouth of God, in which he would continue upon business to Babylon, perhaps public business, on an embassy from the king, and in their way called on the prophet, having heard much of him, and being desirous to know if he had any message from God, which might be some guide to them in their negotiation. By the severe answer given them, one would suspect they had a design to encourage the prophet, or to try if they could catch hold of any thing that might look like a contradiction to Jeremiah's prophecies, and so they might have occasion to reproach them both. However, they feigned them- selves just men, complimented the prophet, and sat before him gravely enough, as God's people used to sit. Note, It is no new thing for bad men to be found employed in the external performances of religion.

The account which God gave the prophet privately concerning them. They were strangers to him, he only knew that they were elders of Israel, that was the character they wore, and as such he received them with respect, and, it is likely, was glad to see them so well disposed; but God gives him their real character, (v. 3.) they were idolat- ers, and did only consult Ezekiel, as they would any oracle of a pretended deity, to gratify their curios- ity; and therefore he appeals to the prophet himself, whether they deserved to have any counte- nance or encouragement given them; "Should I be inquired of at all by them? Should I accept their inquiries as an honour to myself, or answer them for satisfaction to them? No; they have no reason to expect it;" for, (1.) They have set up their idols in their heart; they not only have idols, but they are in- terricated with them; they have taken them to their hearts, and do worship them with all the rites and ceremonies of idolatry, and are so deeply rooted in idolatry, that they cannot be drawn out of it, and therefore they are not fit for any people that are employed in the external performances of religion.

allured to idolatry, and so it was the block at which they stumbled, and fell into that sin; or, their iniquity is their stumbling-block, which throws them down, so that they fall into ruin. Note, Sinners are their own tenters; every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust, and so they are their own destroyers: If thou seest it, and shall alone bear it; and thus they put the stumbling-block of their iniquity before their own faces, and stumble upon it, though they see it before their eyes. It intimates that they are resolved to go on in sin, whatever comes of it; I have loved strangers, and after them I will go; that is the language of their hearts. And should God be impartial of their wretches? Do they not hereby rather put an affront upon him than do him any honour, as those did, who bowed the knee to Christ, in mockery? Can they expect an answer of peace from God, who thus continue their acts of hostility against him?

3. The answer which God, in just displeasure, orders Ezekiel to give them, v. 4. Let them know that it is not out of any disrespect to their persons, that God refuses to give them an answer, but it is laid down as a rule for every man of the house of Israel, whoever he be, that if he continue in love and league with his idols, and come to inquire of God, God will resent it as an indignity done to him, and will answer him according to his real iniquity, not according to his prayers and resolutions, but according to the prophet, who, he expects, will be civil to him, but God will give him his answer, by punishing him for his impudence; I the Lord, who speak, and it is done; I will answer him that cometh, according to the multitude of his idols. Observe, Those who set up idols in their hearts, and set their hearts upon their idols, commonly have a multitude of them. Humble worshippers of God have no need to account to the multitude of his neros, but bold intruders he answers according to the multitude of their idols, that is, (1.) According to the desire of their idols; he will give them up to their own hearts' lust, and leave them to themselves to be as bad as they have a mind to be, till they have filled up the measure of their iniquity. Men's corruptions are idols in their hearts; and so all the desires of the heart, and their temptations are the stumbling-block of their iniquity, and they are of their own putting, and God will answer them accordingly; let them take their course. (2.) According to the desert of their idols; they shall have such an answer as it is just that such idolaters should have. God will punish them as he punishes idolaters, that is, when they stand in need of his help, he will send them to the gods whom they have chosen,Judg. x. 13, 14. Note, The judgment of God will dwell with men according to what they are really that is, according to what their hearts are, not according to what they are in show and profession. And what will be the end of this? What will this threatened answer amount to? He tells them, v. 5. For thus saith the Lord God; he heart may lay them open to the world, that they may be ashamed; may, let them open to the curse, that they may be ruined. Note, The sin and shame, and pain and ruin of sinners, are all from themselves, and their own hearts are the snares in which they are taken; they seduce them, they betray them; their own consciences witness against them, cut them to the heart, and are a ever more piercing to them, if he discover them, if he convict them, if he bind them over to his judgment, it is all by their own hearts.

4. The extent of this answer which God had given them, to all the house of Israel, v. 7, 8. The same thing is repeated, which intimates God's just displeasure against hypocrites, who mock him with the shows and forms of devotion, while their hearts are estranged from him, and at war with him. Observe, (1.) To whom this declaration belongs; it concerns not only every one of the house of Israel, (as before, v. 4) but the stranger that sojourns in Israel; let him not think it will be an excuse for him in his idolatries, that he is but a stranger and a sojourner in Israel, and does but worship the gods that his father served, and that he himself was bred up in the service of; no, let him not expect any benefit from Israel's oracles or prophets, unless he thoroughly renounce his idolatry. Note, Even presbyters shall not be esteemed, if they be not sincere; a dissembled conversion is no conversion. (2.) The description here given of hypocrites: They separate themselves from God by their fellowship with idols; they cut themselves off from their relation to God, and their interest in him; they break off their acquaintance and intercourse with him, and set themselves at a distance from him. Note, Those that join themselves to idols, separate themselves from God, and are estranged from him, cut themselves off from the vision and fruition of God, but such as now separate themselves from his service, and wilfully withdraw their allegiance from him. But there are those who thus separate themselves from God, and yet come to the prophets, with a seeming respect and deference to their office, to inquire of them concerning God; either to satisfy a vain curiosity, to want the mouth of a cleaver concerning those things that concern them, or to get or save a reputation among men; but without any desire to be acquainted with God, or any design to be ruled by him. (5.) The doom of those who thus trifle with God, and think to impose upon him: *I the Lord will answer him by myself; let me alone to deal with him; I will give him an answer that shall fill him with confusion, that shall make him report his lying impiety. He shall have his witness, not by the tongue of the prophet, but by the judgments of God. And I will set my face against that man; which denotes great displeasure against him, and a fixed resolution to ruin him. God can outface the most impenitent sinner. The hypocrite thought to save his credit, nay, and to gain applause, but, on the contrary, God will make him a sign and a proverb; will inflict such judgments upon him, as shall make him remarkable and contemptible in the eyes of all about him; his misery shall be made use of to express the greatest misery; as when the worst of sinners are said to have their portion appointed to them with hypocrites, Mat. xxiv. 51. God will make him an example; his judgments upon him shall be for the warning of the world, and of all that mock God for thus shall it be done to the counterfeit prophet himself;的产品of God, and yet pretends to inquire concerning him. The hypocrite thought to have passed for one of God's people, and to have crowded himself into heaven among them; but God will cut him from the midst of his people, will discover him, and pluck him out from the thickest of them; and by this, says God, ye shall know that I am in the midst of the house of Israel. By the discovery of hypocrites, it appears that God is conscious: ministers know not how people stand affected when they come to hear the word, but God does; and by the punishment of hypocrites, it appears that he is a jealous God, and one that cannot, and will not, be imposed upon. 5. The doom of those pretenders to prophecy, who give countenance to these pretenders to piety, v. 9, 10. These hypocritical inquirers, though Ezekiel will give them no comfortable answer, yet hope to meet with some other prophets that will; and if they do, as perhaps they may, let them know that God permits these lying prophets to deceive them, in part of punishment: "If the prophet that flatters them be deceived, and gives them hopes which there is no ground for, I the Lord have deceived that prophet, have suffered the temptation to be laid before him, and suffered him to yield to it, and overruled it for the hardening of those in their wicked courses, who were resolved to go on in them." We are told that God is not the Author of sin, but we are sure that he is the Lord of all, and the Judge of sinners, and that he often makes use of one wicked man to destroy another, and so of one wicked man to deceive another. Both are sins in him who does them, and so they are not from God: both are punishments to him to whom they are done, and so they are from God. We have a full instance of this in the story of Ahab's prophets, who were engaged in what was a spirit, which God brought upon them in their months, (1 Kings xxxii. 23.) and another in those whom God gives up to strong delusions to believe a lie, because they received not the love of the truth, 2 Thess. ii. 10, 11. But read the fearful doom of the lying prophet, I will stretch out my hand upon him, and will destroy him. When God has served his own righteous purposes by him, he shall be recompensed for his unrighteousness. And when God had made use of the Chaldeans for the wasting of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their rage; so when he had made use of false prophets, and afterward of false christs, for the deceiving of a sinful people, he justly punished them for their falsehood. But herein we must acknowledge (as Calvin upon this place reminds us) that God's judgments are a great despot; that we are incompetent judges of them; and that though we cannot account for the equity of God's proceedings to the satisfying and silencing of every caviller, yet there is a day coming when he will be justified before all the world; and particularly in this instance, when the punishment of the prophet that flattereth the hypocrite in his evil way, shall be as the punishment of the hypocrite that seeketh to satisfy by means smooth things only. Isa. xxvii. 10. The ditch shall be the same for the head leader, and the blind followers.

6. The good counsel that is given them for the preventing of this fearful doom; (v. 6.) "Therefore repent, and turn yourselves from your idols; let this separate between you and them, that they separate not between you and God; because they set God's face against you, do you turn away your faces from them, which doeth not, not only forsaking them, but forsaking them with leaching and detestation; Turn from them as from abominations that you are sick of; and then you will be welcome to inquire of the Lord. Come now, and let us reason together."

7. The good issue of all this, as to the house of Israel; therefore the pretending prophets, and the pretending saints, shall perish together by the judgment of God. And he that hath brought to them, the body of the people may be reformed; that the house of Israel may go no more astray from me, v. 11. Note, The punishments of some are designed for the prevention of sin, that others may hear, and fear, and take warning. When we see what comes of those that go astray from God, we shall thereby be encouraged to keep close to him. And if the house of Israel should not turn, they will not be polluted any more. Note, Sin is a polluting thing; it renders the sinner odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and in his own eyes too, whenever conscience is awakened; and therefore they shall no more be polluted, that they may be my people, and I may be their God. Note, Those whom God takes into covenant with himself, must first be cleansed from the pollutions of sin, and those who are so cleansed shall not only be saved from ruin, but be entitled to all the privileges of God's people.

12. The word of the Lord came again to me, saying, 13. Son of man, when the land smiteth against me, by trespassing grievously, then will I stretch out my hand upon it, and will break the staff of the bread thereof, and will send famine upon it, and will cut off man and beast from it. 14. Though these three men, Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, they should deliver but their own souls by their righteousness, saith the Lord God. 15. If I cause noisome beasts to pass through the land, and they spoil it, so that it be desolate, that no man may pass through because of the beasts: 16. Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters; they only shall be delivered, but the land shall be desolate. 17. Or if I bring a sword upon that land, and say, Sword, go through the land; so that I cut off man and beast from it: 13. Though these three men were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither sons nor daughters, but they only shall be delivered themselves. 19. Or if I send a pestilence into that land, and pour out my fury upon it in blood, to cut off from it man and beast: 20. Though Noah, Daniel, and Job, were in it, as I live, saith the Lord God, they shall deliver neither son nor daughter; they shall but deliver their own souls by their righteousness. 21. For thus saith the Lord God, How much more when I send my four sore judgments upon Jerusalem, the sword, and the famine, and the noisome beast, and the pestilence, to cut off from it man and beast! 22. Yet, behold, therein shall be left a remnant that shall be brought forth, both sons and daughters; behold, they shall come forth unto you, and ye shall see their way and their doings: and ye shall be comforted concerning the evil that I have brought upon Jerusalem, even concerning all that I have brought upon it. 23. And they shall comfort you, when ye see their ways and their doings; and ye shall know that I have not done without cause all that I have done in it, saith the Lord God.

The scope of these verses is to show, 1. That national sins bring national judgments; when virtue is ruined and laided waste, every thing else will soon be ruined and laid waste too; (v. 13.) When the land sins against me, when vice and wickedness become epidemical, when the land sins by trespassing grievously, when the sinners are become very numerous, and their sins very heinous, when gross impieties and immoralities universally prevail, then will I stretch forth mine hand upon it, for the punishment of it; the divine power shall be vigorously and openly exerted, the judgments shall be extended and stretched forth to all the corners of the land, to tell the concerns and interests of the nation. Grievous sins bring grievous plagues.

2. That God has a variety of sore judgments wherewith to punish sinful nations; and he has them all at command, and inflicts which he pleases. He did indeed give David his choice what judgment he would be punished with for his sin in numbering the people. The number which was to be taken by lot which was to lessen the number he was proud of; but David, in effect, referred it to God again; "Let us fall into the hands of the Lord, let him choose with what rod we shall be beaten." But he uses a variety of judgments, that it may appear he has an universal dominion, and that in all our concerns we may see our dependence on him.

Four sore judgments are here specified: (1.) Famine. The denial of withholding of common mercies is itself judgment enough, there needs no more to make a people miserable. God needs not bring the staff of oppression, it is but breaking the staff of bread, and the work is soon done; he cuts off man and beast, by cutting off the provisions which they are dependent upon, not only of their animals, but of their people, devouring men, women, and children, so that no man may pass through because of the beasts; none dare travel even in the high roads, for fear of being pulled in pieces by lions, or other beasts of prey, as the children of Beth-el by two bears. Note, When men revolt from their allegiance to God, and rebel against him, it is just with God to deal with them in a manner of which he has given them notice, as the arms against man, Lev. xxvi. 22. (2.) War; God often chastises sinful nations by bringing a sword upon them, the sword of a foreign enemy, and he gives it his commission, and orders what execution it shall do; (v. 17) he says, Sword, go through the land. It is bad enough if the sword do but enter into the borders of a land, but much worse when it goes through the bowels of a land. By it God cuts off man and beast, horse and foot; what execution the sword does, God does by it; for it is his sword, and it acts as he directs. (4.) Pestilence; a dreadful disease, which has sometimes depopulated cities; by it God pours out his fury in blood; that is, in death; the pestilence kills as effectually as if the blood were shed by the sword; for it is poisoned by the blood; the pestilence is the blood of God. Impossible the case of mankind, that lies thus exposed to deaths in various shapes! See how dangerous the case of sinners is, against whom God has so many ways of fighting; so that though they escape one judgment, God has another waiting for them!

3. That, when God's professing people revolt from him, and rebel against him, they may daily expect visitations of judgments that would serve to answer to them. God has various ways of contending with a sinful nation: but if Jerusalem, the holy city, become a harlot, God will send upon her all his four sore judgments; (v. 21) for the nearer any are to God in name and profession, the more severely will he reckon with them, if they reproach that worthy name by which they are called, and give the lie to that profession. They shall be punished seven times more.

4. That there may be, and commonly are, some few very good men, even in those places that, by sin, are ripened for ruin. It is no foreign suggestion that, even in a land that has transgressed grievously, there may be three such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job. Daniel was new living, and at this time had scarcely arrived to the prime of his eminence, but he was already famous, at least this word of God concerning him would without fail make him so; yet he was carried away into captivity with the first of all, Dan. i. 6. Some of the better sort of people in Daniel's kingdom were good Jews; and Daniel (of whose fame in the King of Babylon's court they had heard much) had but continued in Jerusalem, it had been spared for his sake, as the magicians in Babylon were. "No," says God, "though you had him, who was as eminently good in bad times and places, as Noah in the old world, and Job in the land of Uz, yet a reprobate shall not be obtained." In the places that are most corrupt, and in the ages that are most degenerate, there are a remnant which God reserves to himself, and which still hold fast their integrity, and stand fast for the honour of delivering the land, as the innocents are said to do, Job xxii. 30.

5. That God often spares very wicked places for the sake of a few godly people, in them. This is implied here as the expectation of Jerusalem's friends in the day of its distress: "Surely God will stay his controversy with us; for are there not some among us, that are emptying the measure of national guilt by their prayers, as others are filling it by their sins? And rather than God will destroy the righteous with the wicked, he will preserve the wicked with the righteous. If Sodom might have been spared for the sake of ten good men, surely Jerusalem may." 6. That such men as Noah, Daniel, and Job will prevail, if any can, to turn away the wrath of God from a sinful people. Noah was a perfect man, and kept his integrity, when all flesh had corrupted their way; and for his sake, his family, though one of them was wicked, (Ham,) was saved in the ark. Daniel was a great example of piety, and patient prayer for his children, for his friends, and God turned his captivity when he prayed. These were very ancient examples, before Moses that great intercessor; and therefore God mentions them, to intimate that he had some very peculiar favourites long before the Jewish nation was formed or founded, and would have such when it was ruined; for which reason, it should seem, these names were made use of, rather than Moses, Aaron, or Samuel; and yet, lest any should think that God was partial in his respects to the ancient days, here is a modern instance, a living one, placed between those two that were the glories of antiquity, and he now a captive, and that is Daniel, to teach us not to lessen the useful, good men of our own day, by over-magnifying the ancients. Let the children of the captivity know that Daniel, their neighbour, and companion in tribulation, being a man of great humility, piety, and zeal for God, and instant and constant in prayer, had as good an interest in heaven as Noah or Job had. Why may not God raise up as great and good men now as he did formerly, and do as much for them? 7. That when the sin of a people is come to its height, and the decree is gone forth for their ruin, the piety and prayers of the best men shall not prevail to finish the controversy. This is here asserted again and again, that, though these three men were in Jerusalem at this time, yet they should deliver neither son nor daughter; not so much as the little ones should be spared for their sakes, as the little ones of Israel were upon the prayer of Moses, Numb. xiv. 31. No, the land shall be desolate, and God will not hear their prayers for it, though Moses and Samuel strove to this end, chap. xxv. 6. Note, Absolute desert will turn at last into inexcusable wrath; and it should seem as if God would be more inexcusable in Jerusalem's case than in another, (v. 6.) because, beside the divine patiency, they had enjoyed greater privileges than any people besides, which were the aggravations of their sin.

8. That though pious, praying men may not prevail to deliver their own souls, by their righteousness; so that though they may suffer in the common calamity, yet to them the property of it is altered, it is not to them what it is to the wicked; it is unstung, and does them no hurt; it is sanctified, and does them good; sometimes their souls, their lives, are remarkably delivered, and given them for a prey; their souls, at least, their spiritual interests, are secured; if their bodies be not delivered, yet their souls are. Riches indeed profit not in the day of wrath, but righteousness delivers from death, from so great a death, so many deaths as are here threatened. This should encourage us to keep our integrity in times of common apostacy, that, if we do so, we shall be hid in the day of the Lord's anger.

9. That, even then when God makes the greatest deal of his judgments, his judgments, he reserves some to be the monuments of his mercy, v. 22, 23. In Jerusalem itself, though marked for utter ruin, yet there shall be left a remnant, who shall not be cut off by any of those sore judgments before mentioned, but shall be carried into captivity, both sons and daughters, who shall be the seed of a new generation. The young ones, who were not grown up to such an obstinacy in sin as their fathers were, who were therefore cut off as incurable, these shall be brought forth out of the ruins of Jerusalem by the victorious enemy, and behold, they shall come forth to you that are in captivity, they shall make a virtue of a necessity, and shall come the more willingly to Babylon, because so many of their friends are gone thither before them, and are there ready to receive them, and when they come, you shall see their ways and their doings; you shall hear them make a free and ingenuous confession of the sins they had formerly been guilty of, and a humble profession of repentance for them, with promises of reformation; and you shall see instances of their reformation, shall see what good their affliction has done them, and how prudently and patiently they conduct themselves under it. Their narrow escape shall have a good effect upon them; it shall change their temper and conversation, and make them new men. And this will redound, (1.) To the satisfaction of their brethren; They shall comfort you, when ye see their ways. Note, It is a very comfortable sight to see people, when they are under the rod, repenting, and humbling themselves, justifying God, and accepting the punishment of their iniquity. When we see such cases, we may, with Paul, be thankful for the good of others, it is a great comfort to us in our sorrow to see them improving their afflictions, and making a good use of them. When those captives told their friends how bad they had been, and how righteous God was in bringing these judgments upon them, it made them very easy, and helped to reconcile them to the ways of Jerusalem, to the justice of God in punishing his own people, so, for the good of others, it is a great comfort to us in our sorrow to see them improving their afflictions, and making a good use of them. When those captives told their friends how bad they had been, and how righteous God was in bringing these judgments upon them, it made them very easy, and helped to reconcile them to the ways of Jerusalem, to the justice of God in punishing his own people, so, for the good of others, it is a great comfort to us in our sorrow to see them improving their afflictions, and making a good use of them.
planted, a branch out of a dry ground, which, though its original was mean and despiseful, God had made strong for himself; (Ps. lxxx. 15.) to be to him for a name and for a praise.

2. But if it be not fruitful, it is good for nothing, it is no worth: it shall become a production of earth as even thorns and briers are; What is a vine-tree, if you take the tree by itself, without consideration of the fruit? What is it more than any tree, that it should have so much care taken of it, and so much costs laid out upon it? What is a branch of the vine, though it spread more than a branch which is among the trees of the forest, where it grows neglected and exposed? Or, as some read it, What is the vine more than any tree, if the branch of it be as the trees of the forest; if it bear no fruit, as forest-trees seldom do, being designed for timber-trees, not fruit-trees? Now there are some fruit-trees, the wood of which, if they do not bear, is of good use, and may be made to turn to a good account; but the vine is not of this sort; if that do not answer its end as a fruit-tree, it is worth nothing as a timber-tree. Observe,

I. How this similitude is expressed here. The wild vine, that is among the trees of the forest, or the empty vine, (which Israel is compared to, Hos. x. 1.) that bears no more fruit than a forest-tree, is good for nothing, it is as useless as a briar, and more so, for that will add some sharpness to the thorns, which is the brier's chief delight. He shows, 1. That it is fit for no use; the wood of it is not taken to do any work, one cannot so much as make a pin of it to hang a vessel upon, v. 3. See how variously the gifts of nature are dispensed for the service of man! Among plants, the roots of some, the seeds or fruits of others, the leaves of various kinds, and the branches of the trees, are fit to make among trees, some are strong and not fruitful, as the oaks and cedars; others weak but very fruitful, as the vine, which is unsightly, low, and depending, yet of great use. Rachel is comely but barren, Leah homely but fruitful. 2. That therefore it is made use of for fuel; it will serve to heat the oven with. Because it is not meet for any use, it is therefore fit for fuel, v. 4. When it is good for nothing else, it is useful this way, and answers a very needful intention, for fuel is a thing we must have, and to burn any thing for fuel, which is good for other work, is bad husbandry. To what purpose is this waste? The unfruitful vine is disposed of in the same way with the briers and thorns, which are rejected, and whose end is to be burned, Heb. vi. 8. And what care is taken of it then? If a piece of solid timber be hewed, somebody perhaps may snatch it as a brand out of the burning, and say, "It is a pity to burn it, for it may be put to some better use;" but if the branch of a vine be on fire, and, as usual, both the ends of it and the middle be hewed together, nobody goes about to save it; When it was whole it was meet for no work, much less when it was divided against itself; (v. 3.) even the ashes of it are not worth saving.

II. How this similitude is applied to Jerusalem:

1. That holy city was become unprofitable, and good for nothing; it had been as the vine-tree among the trees of the vineyard, abounding in the fruits of righteousness to the glory of God; when religion flourished there, and the pure worship of God was spread abroad, Jerusalem, in a certain age, was gathered from it; and while it continued so, God made a hedge about it; it was his pleasant plant, (Isa. v. 7.) he watered it every moment, and kept it night and day; (Isa. xxvii. 2.) but it was now become the degenerate plant of a strange vine, of a wild vine, (such as we read of, 2 Kings iv. 39.) a vine-tree among the trees of the forest, which, being wild, brings forth wild grapes, (Isa. v. 4.) which are not only of no use, but are nauseous and noxious; (Deut. xxxiii. 32.) their grapes are grapes of gall, and their clusters are bitter. It is explained, v. 8. "They have treasured a treasur; they have treacherously preyed with God, and perfidiously apostatized from him;" for it signifies. Note, Professors of religion, if they do not live up to their profession, but contradict it, if they degenerate and depart from it, are the most unprofitable creatures in the world, like the salt that has lost its savour, and is therefore good for nothing, Mark ix. 40. Other nations were famed for valour or politics, some for war, others for trade, and retained their credit; but the Jewish nation, being famous for its piety, and by the grace of God were given to its study, when they lost their holiness, and became wicked, were thenceforth good for nothing; with that they lost all their credit and usefulness, and became the most base and despiseful people under the sun, trodden under foot of the Gentiles. Daniel, and other pious Jews, were of great use in their generation; but the idolatrous Jews then, and the unbelieving Jews now, since the preaching of the gospel, have been, and are, of no common service, not fit for any work.

2. Being so, it is given to the fire for fuel. Note, Those who are not fruitful to the glory of God's grace, shall be fuel to the fire of his wrath; and thus, if they give not honour to him, he will get them honour upon them, honour that will shine bright in the flames of his wrath, which he will not be for ever consumed. He will not be a loser at last by any of his creatures. The Lord has made all things for himself, yea, even the wicked, that would not otherwise be for him, for the day of evil; (Prov. xvi. 4.) and in those who would not glorify him as the God to whom duty belongs, he will be glorified as the God of vengeance; (Isa. xxv. 7.) The fire of God's wrath had before devoured both the ends of the Jewish nation, (v. 4.) Samaria and the cities of Judah; and now Jerusalem, that was the midst of it, was thrown into the fire, to be burnt too, for it is meet for no work, it will not be wrought upon by any of the methods God has taken to destroy them, The inhabitants of Jerusalem were not only fire-brands, set on and awkward; and therefore, (v. 7.) I will make them fuel for fuel, to them, to thwart all their counsels, as they set their faces against God, to contradict his word and defeat all his designs. It is decreed, the consumption is determined; I will make the land quite desolate, and therefore, when they go out from one fire, another fire shall devour them, (v. 7.) the end of one judgment shall be the beginning of another, and their escape from one only a reprieve till another comes; they shall go from misery in their own country to misery in Babylon. They who kept out of the way of the sword, perished by famine or pestilence: when one descent of the Chaldean forces upon them was over, and they thought, Surely the bitterness of death is past, yet soon after they received another, and another, and another, till it was made a full end. Thus they shall know that I am the LORD, a God of almighty power, when I set my face against them. Note, God shows himself to be the LORD, by perfecting the destruction of his implacable enemies as well as the deliverances of his obedient people. Those against whom God sets his face, though they may come out of one trouble into another, though they may come out of the pit, will be taken in the snare, (Isa. xxvii. 18.) though they escape the sword of Hazael, will fall by that of Jehu; (1 Kings xix. 17.) for evil pursues sinners: nay, though they go out from the fire of temporal judgments, and seem to die in peace, yet there is an everlasting fire that will devour them; for when God judges, first or last he will overcome; and he will be known by the judg-
EZEKIEL, XVI.

Ezekiel, the justifying 34. a here. kno-m 14. a Son Babj'lon; Jacob's IV. not. is 11, of the law, that in it they may see their own deformities and defilements; to tell them plainly of their faults; Thou art the man.

Now, that Jerusalem may be made to know her abominations, and particularly the abominable ingratitude she had been guilty of, it was requisite that she should see all great things God had done for her, as the aggravating her bad conduct toward him; and, to magnify these favours, she is, in these verses, made to know the meanness and baseness of her original, from what poor beginnings God raised her, and how unworthy she was of his favour, and of the honour he had put upon her. Jerusalem is here put for the Jewish church and nation, which is here compared to an outcast child, base-born and abandoned, which the mother herself has no affection or concern for.

1. The extraction of the Jewish nation was mean; "Thy birth is of the land of Canaan; (v. 3.) thou hast from the very first the spirit and disposition of a Canaanite." The patriarchs dwelt in Canaan, and they were there but strangers and sojourners. They had no property on the face of ground of their own, but a burying-place. Abraham and Sarah were indeed their father and mother, but they were only inmates with the Amorites and Hittites, who, having the dominion, seemed to be as parents to the seed of Abraham, witness the exact Abraham made to the children of Heth, (Gen. xxiii. 4.) and the dependence they had upon their labours, and the services they rendered in of them, Gen. xiii. 7.—xxxiv. 30. If the patriarchs, at their first coming to Canaan, had conquered it, and made themselves masters of it, it had put an honour upon their family, and had locked great in history; but, instead of that, they went from one nation to another, (Ps. cv. 13.) as tenants from one farm to another, almost as beggars from one door to another; when they were but few in number, yet, very few. And yet this was not the worst; their fathers had served other gods in Ur of the Chaldees; (Josh. xxiv. 2.) even in Jacob’s family there were strange gods, Gen. xxxv. 2. Thus early had they a genius leading them to idolatry: and upon this account their ancestors were Amorites and Hittites.

2. When they first began to multiply, their condition was really very deplorable, like that of a newborn child, which must of necessity die from the womb if the knees prevent it not, Job xi. 11, 12. The children of Israel, when they began to increase into a people and became considerable, were thrown out of the country that was intended for them, a famine drove them thence. Egypt was the open field into which they were cast; there they had no protection or countenance from the government they were under, but, on the contrary, were ruled with rigour, and their lives embittered; they had no encouragement given them to build up their families; no help to build up their estates, no friends or allies to strengthen their interests. Joseph, who had been the shepherd and stone of Israel, was dead; the king of Egypt, who should have been kind to them for Joseph’s sake, set himself to destroy this man-child as soon as it was born, (Rev. xii. 4.) ordered all the males to be slain, which, it is likely, occasioned the exposing of many as well as Moses, to which perhaps the similitude here has reference. The founders of nations and cities had occasion for all the arts and arms they were masters of; set their heads on wood, by which they subdued and subjugated, to preserve and nurse up their infant-states. Tantae molis crat Romanum condere gentem—So vast were the efforts requisite to the establishment of the Roman name. Virg. But the nation of Israel had no such care taken of it, no such pains taken with it, as Athens

CHAP. XVI.

Still God is justifying himself in the desolations he is about to bring upon Jerusalem; and very largely, in this chapter, he shows the prophet, and orders him to show to the people, that he did but punish them as their sins merited. After-a-while, he had conveyed Jerusalem to an unfruitful vine, that was fit for nothing but the fire; in this chapter, he compares it to an adulteress; that, in justice, ought to be abandoned and execrated; and he must therefore show the people their abominations, that they might see how little reason they had to complain of the judgments they were under. In this long discourse are set forth, I. The despicable and criminal beginnings of that church and nation, v. 3.—5. II. The many honours and favours God had bestowed upon them, v. 6.—14. III. Their treacherous and ungrateful departures from him to the services and worship of idols, here represented by the most impudent falsehood, v. 15.—34. IV. A threatening of terrible, destroying judgments, which God would bring upon them for this sin, v. 35.—43. V. An aggravation both of their sin and their punishment, by comparison with Sodom and Samaria, v. 44.—59. VI. A promise of mercy in the close, which God would show to a penitent remnant, v. 60.—63. and this is designed for admonition to us.

1. AGAIN the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, cause Jerusalem to know her abominations. 3. And say, Thus saith the Lord God unto Jerusalem, Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of Canaan; thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite. 4. And as for thy nativity, in the day thou wast born, thy navel was not cut, neither wast thou washed in water to supple thee: thou wast not salted at all, nor swaddled at all. 5. None eye pitied thee, to do any of these unto thee, to have compassion upon thee; but thou wast cast out in the open field, to the loathing of thy person, in the day that thou wast born.

Ezekiel is now among the captives in Babylonia; but as Jeremiah at Jerusalem wrote for the use of the captives, though they had Ezekiel upon the spot with them, (ch. 29.) so Ezekiel wrote for the use of Jerusalem, though Jeremiah himself was resident there; and yet they were far from looking upon it as an affront to one another, or an interference with one another’s business; for ministers have need of one another’s help, both by preaching and writing. Jeremiah wrote for the captives for their consolation, which was the thing they needed; Ezekiel here is directed to write to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, for their conviction and humiliation, which was the thing they needed. This is his commission, (v. 2.) “Cause Jerusalem to know her abominations, her sins; set them in order before her.” Note, (1.) Sin is not only provocation which God is angry at, but abominations which he hates, as contrary to his nature, and which we ought to hate. Jer. xliii. 4. (2.) The sins of Jerusalem are in a special manner so. The practice of profaneness appears most odious in those that make a profession of religion. (3.) Though Jerusalem is a place of great knowledge, yet she is loath to know her abominations; so partial are men in their own favour, that they are hardly willing to own their own infamies, but deny it, pollute or extenuate it. (4.) It is requisite that we should know our sins, that we may confess them, and may justify God in what he brings upon us for them. (5.) It is the work of ministers to cause sinners, sinners in Jerusalem, to know their abominations; to set before them the glass of the Sparta, Rome, and other commonwealths, had when they were first founded, but, on the contrary, was doomed to destruction, like an infant new-born, exposed to wind and weather, the navel-string not cut, the poor babe not washed, not clothed, not swaddled, because not fitted, v. 4, 5. Note, We owe the preservation of our infant-lives to the natural pity and compassion which the God of nature has put into the hearts of parents and nurses toward new-born children. This infant is said to be cast out, to the loathing of her person: it was a sign that she was loathed by those that bare her, and she appeared loathsome to all that looked upon her. The first time we appear upon the stage of the Egyptians, as we find, Gen. xliv. 32.—xlvi. 34.

Some think that this refers to the corrupt and vicious disposition of that people from their beginning; they were not only the weakest and fewest of all people, (Deut. vii. 7,) but the worst and most ill-omened of all people; God groweth thee this good land, not for thy righteousness, for thou art a stiff-necked people, Deut. ix. 6. And Moses tells them there, (v. 24.) You have been rebellious against the Lord from the day that I knew you. They were not supplanted, nor washed, nor swaddled; they were not at all tractable or manageable, nor cast into any good shape. God took them to be his people, not because he saw anything in them inviting or promising, but because he pleased it, and it was a very apt illustration of the miserable condition of all the children of men by nature. As for our nativity in the day that we were born, we were shapen in iniquity and conceived in sin, our understandings darkened, our minds alienated from the life of God, polluted with sin, which rendered us loathsome in the eyes of God. Marvell not then that we are told, Ye must be born again.

6. And when I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy blood, Live; yea, I said unto thee, when thou wast in thy blood, Live. I have caused thee to multiply as the bud of the field, and thou hast increased and waxen great, and thou art come to excellent ornaments: thy breasts are fashioned, and thy hair is grown, whereas thou wast naked and bare. 8. Now when I passed by thee, and looked upon thee, behold, thy time was the time of love; and I spread my skirt over thee, and covered thy nakedness: yea, I swarne unto thee, and entered into a covenant with thee, saith the Lord God, and thou becamest mine. 9. Then washed I thee with water; yea, I thoroughly washed away thy blood from thee, and I anointed thee with oil. 10. I clothed thee also with brodered work, and shod thee with badgers' skin, and I girded thee about with fine linen, and I covered thee with silk. 11. I decked thee also with ornaments, and I put bracelets upon thy hands, and a chain on thy neck. 12. And I put a jewel on thy forehead, and ear-rings in thine ears, and a beautiful crown upon thy head. 13. Thus wast thou decked with gold and silver; and thy raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and brodered work: thou didst eat fine flour, and honey, and oil; and thou wast exceeding beautiful, and thou didst prosper into a kingdom. 14. And thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty: for it was perfect through my condescension, which I had put upon thee, saith the Lord God.

In these verses, we have an account of the great things which God did for the Jewish nation, in raising them up by degrees to be very considerable.

1. God saved them from the ruin they were upon the brink of in Egypt; (v. 6.) When I passed by thee, and saw thee polluted in thine own blood, loathed and abandoned, and appointed to die, as sheep for the slaughter, then I said unto thee, Live. I designed thee for life when thou wast doomed to destruction, and resolved to save thee from death. Those shall live, to whom God commands life.

2. God looked upon the world of mankind as thus cast off, thus cast out, thus polluted, thus ifering in blood, and his thoughts toward it were thoughts of good, designing it life, and that more abundantly. By converting grace, he says to the soul, Live.

3. He looked upon them with kindness and a tender affection, not only pityed them, but set his love upon them, which was accountable, for there was nothing lovely in them; but I looked upon thee and beheld thee, and I saw the time of love, v. 8. I

4. He cleared them from the reproachful character which their bondage in Egypt had them under; (v. 9.) Then washed I thee with water, to make thee clean, and anointed thee with oil, to make thee sweet, and supple thee. All the disgrace of their slavery was rolled away, when they were brought, with a high hand and a stretched-out arm, into the glorious liberty of the children of God; when God said, Israel is my son, my first-born. Let my people go, that they may serve me. That word, backed as it was with so many works of wonder, thoroughly washed away their blood; and when God had done under the cloud and the pillar of fire and cloud, he spread his skirt over them.

5. He multiplied them and built them up into a people. This is here mentioned, (v. 7.) before his spreading his skirt over them, because their numbers increased exceedingly, while they were yet bond-servants in Egypt; they multiplied as the bud of the field in spring-time, and they waxed great, exceeding mighty, (Exod. i. 7, 20.) their breasts were fashioned, when they were formed into distinct tribes, and had officers of their own, (Exod. v. 19.) their hair grew when they grew numerous, whereas they had been naked and bare, very few, and therefore contemptible.

6. He admitted them into covenant with himself. See what glorious nuptials this poor forlorn infant is preferred to at last! How she is dignified, who a first had scarcely her life given her for a prey; I swore unto thee, and entered into covenant with thee; this was done at Mount Sinai, when the covenant between God and Israel was sealed and ratified, and by them beloved mine. God called them his people, and himself the God of Israel. Note, Those to whom God gives spiritual life he takes into covenant with himself; by that covenant they become his subjects and servants, that intimate their duty; his portion, his treasure, that intimates their privilege; and it is confirmed with an oath, that we might have strong consolation.

7. He beautified and adorned them. This may come upon Israel, at their lastConversion, and she is gratified with abundance of them. v. 10, 11. We need not be particular in the application of these; her wardrobe was well furnished with rich apparel, they had embroidered work to wear, shoes of fine badgers skins, linen girdles, and silk veils, bracelets and necklaces, jewels and ear-rings, and even a beautiful crown, or coronet; perhaps this may refer to the jewels and other rich goods which they took from the Egyptians, which might well be spoken of thus long after as a merciful circumstance of their deliverance, when it was spoken of long before, (Gen. xv. 14.) They shall come out with great substance. Or, it may be taken figuratively for all those blessings of heaven which adorned both their church and state. In a little time they came to exceed the Egyptians, and their presents and ornaments, and even the ornaments which God gave them, were to them as ornaments of grace to the head, and chains about the neck, Prov. i. 9. God's sanctuary, which he set up among them, was a beautiful crown upon their head; it was the beauty of holiness.

8. He fed them with abundance, with plenty, with dainties; Thou didst eat fat and honey, and oil, and fine chaff, and honey out of the rock, oil out of the flinty rock. In Canaan they did eat bread to the full, the finest of the wheat, Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. Those whom God takes into covenant with himself are fed with the bread of life, clothed with the robe of righteousness, adorned with the graces and comforts of the spirit; the hidden man of the heart is that which is incorruptible.

9. He gave them a great reputation among their neighbours, and made them considerable, acceptable to their friends and allies, and formidable to their adversaries; Thou didst prosper into a kingdom; (v. 13,) which speaks both dignity and dominion; and, (v. 14.) Thy renown went forth among the heathen for thy beauty; the nations about had their eye upon them, and admired them for the excellent laws by which they were governed, the privilege they had of access to God, Deut. iv. 7, 8. Solomon's wisdom, and Solomon's temple, were very much the renown of that nation; and if we put all the privileges of the Jewish church and kingdom together, we must own that it was the most accomplished beauty of all the nations of the east; we may honour the beauty of a people, and name the thing that would be the honour of a people but it was to be found in Israel, in David's and Solomon's time, when that kingdom was in its zenith; piety, learning, wisdom, justice, victory, peace, wealth; and all sure to continue if they had kept close to God. It was perfect, saith God, through my counsels which I had put upon thee; through the beauty of their lives, as they were a people set apart for God, and devoted to him, to be to him for a name, and for a praise, and for a glory. This was it that put a lustre upon all their other honours, and was indeed the perfection of their beauty. We may apply this spiritually; sanctified souls are truly beautiful, they are so in God's sight, and they themselves may take the comfort of it. But God must have all the glory, for they were by nature deformed and polluted, and, whatever comeliness they have, it is that which God has put upon them, and beautified them with, and he will be well pleased with the work of his own hands.

15. But thou didst trust in thine own beauty, and playedst the harlot because of thy renown, and pouredst out thy fornications on every one that passed by; his it was. 16. And of thy garments thou didst take, and deckedst thy high places with divers colours, and playedst the harlot thereupon: the like things shall not come, neither shall it be so. 17. Thou hast also taken thy fair jewels of my gold and of my silver, which I had given thee, and madest to thyself images of men, and didst commit whoredom with them; 18. And tookest thy brodered garments, and coveredst them; and thou hast set mine oil and mine incense before them. 19. My meat also which I gave thee, fine flour, and oil, and honey, wherewith I fed thee, thou hast even set it before them for a sweet savour: and thus it was, saith the Lord God. 20. Moreover, thou hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, whom thou hast borne unto me, and these hast thou sacrificed unto them to be devoured. Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter, 21. That thou hast slain my children, and delivered them to cause them to pass through the fire for them! 22. And in all thine abominations and thy whoredoms thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, when thou wast naked and bare, and wast polluted in thy blood. 23. And it came to pass, after all thy wickedness, (wo, wo unto thee! saith the Lord God,) 24. That thou hast also built unto thee an eminent place, and hast made thee a high place in every street. 25. Thou hast built thy high place at every head of the way, and hast made thy beauty to be abhorred, and hast opened thy feet to every one that passed by, and multiplied thy whoredoms. 26. Thou hast also committed fornication with the Egyptians thy neighbours, great of flesh; and hast increased thy whoredoms, to provoke me to anger. 27. Behold, therefore, I have stretched out my hand over thee, and have diminished thine ordinary food, and delivered thee unto the will of them that hate thee, the daughters of the Philistines, which are ashamed of thy lewd way. 28. Thou hast played the whore also with the Assyrians, because thou wast unsatisfiable; yea, thou hast played the harlot with them, and yet couldst not be satisfied. 29. Thou hast, moreover, multiplied thy fornication in the land of Canaan unto Chaldea, and yet thou wast not satisfied herewith. 30. How weak is thy heart, saith the Lord God, seeing thou dost all these things, the work of an impecunious whorswo man; 31. In that thou buildest thine eminent place in the head of every way, and makest thy high place in every street; and hast not been as a harlot, in that thou scornest hire; 32. But as a wife that committeth adultery, which taketh strangers instead of her husband! 33. They give gifts to all whores; but thou givest thy gifts to all thy lovers, and hirest them, that they may come unto thee on every side for thy whoredom. 34. And the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms, whereas none foloweth thee to commit whoredoms: and in that thou givest a reward, and no reward is given unto thee; therefore thou art contrary.

In these verses we have an account of the great wickedness of the people of Israel, especially in worshipping idols, notwithstanding the great favours that God had conferred upon them, by which, one would think, they should have been far more engaged to him. This wickedness of theirs is here represented by the lowd and scandalous conversation of that beautiful maid which was rescued from ruin, brought up and well provided for by a kind Friend and Benefactor, that had been in all respects as a Father and a Husband to her.

1. Their idolatry was the great provoking sin that they gave themselves up to, even as it is in the latter end of Solomon's time, (for from Samuel's till then I do not remember that we read any thing of it,) and from thence continued more or less the crying sin of that nation till the captivity; and though it now and then met with some check from the reformation kings, yet it was never totally suppressed, and for the most part appeared to have a degree of impudence and boldness in it which could not but alarm the true God by images, as the ten tribes by the calves at Dan and Bethel, but they worshipped false gods, Baal and Moloch, and all the senseless rabble of the pagan deities.

11. This is that which is here all along represented (as often elsewhere) under the similitude of whoredom and adultery. 1. Because it is the violation of a marriage-covenant with God, forsaking him, and embracing the bosom of a stranger; it is giving that affection and that service to his rivals, which are due to him alone. 2. Because it is the corrupting and defiling of the mind, and the enslaving of the spiritual part of the man, and subjecting it to the power and dominion of sense, as whoredom is. 3. Because it debuches the conscience, and being them a portion of those idolatries dishouse the divine nature, and change the truth of God into a lie, and his glory into shame, God justly punishes by giving them over to a reproudbate mind to dishouse the natural human with vile affections, Rom. i. 23, 28. It is a besetting, bewitching sin; and when men are given up to it, they seldom recover themselves out of the snare. 4. Because it is a shameful, scandalous sin, for those that have joined themselves to the Lord, to join themselves to an idol. Now observe here,

(1) What were the causes of this sin; how came the people of God to be driven away to the service of idols? How came a virgin so well taught, so well educated, to be debauched? Who would have thought it? But, [1.] They grew proud; (v. 15.)

"Thou trustedst to thy beauty, and didst expect that that should make thee an interest, and didst play the harlot because of thy renown." They thought, because they were so admired and so complimented by their neighbours, that, further to in gratitate themselves with them, and to receive their compliments, they must join with them in their worship, and confound themselves to their usages. Solomon admitted idolatry to gratify his wives and their relations. Note, Abundance of young people are ruined by pride, and particularly pride in their beauty. Rara est concordia forma atque facultas — Beauty and chastity are seldom associated. (2.) They forget their beginnings; (v. 22.) "Thou hast remembered all the ways of thy youth, how poor and mean and despicable thou wast, and what great things God did for thee, and what lasting obligations he laid upon thee thereof." Note, It would be an effectual check to our pride and sensuality, to consider what we are, and how much we are beholden to the free grace of God. (3.) They were weak in understanding and in resolution; (v. 30.) "How weak is thy heart, seeing thou dost all these things." Note, The strength of men's lusts is an evidence of the weakness of their hearts; they have no acquaintance with themselves, nor government of themselves. She is weak, and yet an impecunious, whorswo woman. Note, Those that are most foolish are commonly most impecunious, and think themselves fit to have all things, yet they are far from being able to manage themselves.

[1.] They worshipped all the idols that came in their way; all that they were ever courted to the worship of; they were at the beck of all their neighbours; (v. 15.) Then poured out thy fornications on every one that passed by, by its ills. They took their delight in every kind of idolatry, this kind, though ever so absurd. No foreign idol could be imported, no new god invented, but they were ready to catch at it; as a common strumpet that prostitutes herself to all new comers, and multiplies her whoredoms, v. 23. Thus some common drunkards will be company for every one that puts up the finger to them; how weak are the hearts of sin!

[2.] They adorned their idol-temples, and groves, and high places, with the fine, rich clothing that God had given them; (v. 16. 18.) Thou deckedst thy high places with divers colours, with the coats of divers colours, like Joseph's, which God had given them as particular marks of his favour, and hast played the harlot, worshipped idols thereupon; of this he saith, The like things shall not come; neither shall it be so; this is a thing by no means to be suffered; I will never endure such practices as these without showing my retenments."

[3.] They made images for worship of the jewels which God had given them; (v. 17.) the jewels of my gold and my silver, which I had given thee. Note, It is God that gives us our gold and our silver; God is the producer of every thing. It is he that gives us as much gold, as much silver, as we can make use of. Should we make our silver and gold, our plate, money, jewels, the matter of our pride and contention, our covetousness and prodigality, if we duly considered that it is God's silver and his gold? The Israelites began betimes to turn their jewels into idols, when Aaron made the golden calf of their ear-rings.

which God gave them for their own use, and to serve him; (v. 18.) "Thou hast set mine oil and fine flour, and hast adorned them upon their altars, as perfumes to these dunghill daughters; and so thy honour is not: for they are whoredoms of thy devil, and they have insisted upon the sacrifice of their children, and in the service of the true and living God.

6. They had sacrificed their children to their idols. This is insisted upon here, and often elsewhere, as one of the worst instances of their idolatry, as indeed was none in which the devil triumphed so much over the children of men, both their natural reason and their natural affections, as in this; (see Jer. vii. 31.—xxx. 35.—xxxv. 33.) Thon hast taken thy sons and thy daughters, and not only made them to pass through the fire, or between two fires, of their own making, like the Moabites, but hast also sacrificed them to be devoured, v. 20. Never was there such an instance of the degenerating of the paternal authority into the most barbarous tyranny as this was. Yet that was not the worst of it; it was an irreparable wrong to God himself, who challenged a special property in their children more than in their gold and silver, and their meats; They are my children, (v. 21.) the sons and daughters which thou hast borne unto me, v. 20. He is the Father of spirits, and rational souls are in a particular manner his; and therefore the taking away of life, human life, unjustly, is a high affront to the God of life. But the children of Israelites were his by a farther right; they were the children of the covenant, born in God’s house. He had said to Abraham, I will be a God to thee and to thy seed; they had sealed the seal of their union in their flesh from eight days old: they were, to hear God’s name, and keep up his church; to murder them was in the highest degree inhuman, but to murder them in honour of an idol was in the highest degree impious.

One cannot think of it without the utmost indignation: to see the pitiless hands of the parents shedding the guiltless blood of their own children, and by offering these pieces of themselves to the devil, for dying sacrifices, openly avowing the offering up of themselves to him for living sacrifices! How absurd was this, that the children which were born to God, should be sacrificed to devils! Note, The children of parents that are members of the visible church, are to be looked upon as born unto God, and his children; as such, and under that character, we are commanded to pray for them, not only for their spiritual, but also for their temporal deliverance, up for him, and, if he calls for them, cheerfully part with them to him; for may he be not what he will to thus his own? Upon this instance of their idolatry, which indeed ought not to pass without a particular brand, this remark is made, (v. 26.) Is this of thy whoredoms a small matter? Which intimates, that there were those who made a small matter of it, and put it below the notice of the men of God, so apparently heinous, which men of profane consciences will not make a mock at. But is whoredom, is spirituall whoredom, a small matter? Is it a small matter for men to make their children brutes, and the devil their god? It will be a great matter shortly.

6. They built temples in honour of their idols, that others might be invited to resort thither, and join with them in the worship of their idols; “After all thy wickedness of this kind committed in private, for which, so, unto thee,” (that comes in v. 19.) “the Lord God has done to thee, and your families, and the children, and the related condition, who are going on in sin, and giving them warning in time, if they would but take it,) “thou hast at length arrived at such a pitch of impudence as to proclaim it; thou hast long had a whore’s heart, but now thou art come to have a where’s forehead, and cannot but blush,” v. 20.—25. Thou hast build there an eminent place, a brothel-house; and the numbers of those who came to all such idol temples were. Thou hast made thee a high place, for one idol or other, in every street, and at every head of the way; and again, v. 31. They did all they could to seduce and debauch others, and to spread the contagion, by making the temptations to idolatry as strong as possibly they could; and hereby the ringleaders in idolatry did but make themselves vile, and even theirs that had courted them to it, finding themselves entangled by them, began to be surprised with the abundance and violence of their idolatries; Thou hast made thy beauty to be abhorred, even by those that had admired it. The Jewish nation, by leaving their own God, and doting on the gods of the nations round about them, had made themselves mean and despisable in the eyes even of their heathen masters. Many more was the beauty abhorred by all that were wise and good, and had any concern for the honour of God and religion. Note, Those shame themselves, that bring a reproach upon their profession. And justly will that beauty, that excellency, at length be made the object of the hatred of others, which men have made the matter of their own pride.

1. What were the aggravations of this sin.

1. There were found of the idols of those nations which had been their oppressors and persecutors. As, First, The Egyptians: they were a people notorious for idolatry, and for the most vicious, senseless idolatries; they had of old abused them by their barbarous dealings, and of late by their treacherous dealings we are always either cruel or false to them; and yet so infatuated were they, that they committed in devotion unto the Egyptians their neighbours, not only by joining with them in their idolatries, but by entering into leagues and alliances with them, and depending upon them for help in their straits, which was an adulterous departure from God. Secondly, The Assyrians: they had also been vexatious to Israel; “And yet thou hast played the whore with them;” (v. 28.) though they lived at a greater distance, yet then had entertained their idols and their superstitious usages, and so hast multiplied thy fornications unto Chaldea, hast borrowed images of gods, patterns of altars, rites of sacrificing, and one fooleyn or other of that kind, from that remote country, that enemy’s country, and hast imported them into the land of Canaan, enfranchised and established them there. Thus the king of Assyria was an instrumental agent in the propagation of idolatry amongst the Chaldeans, under whose name they were carried captive. This great architect of idolatry was, in short, George Herbert long since foretold, or feared at least.

That Seine shall swallow Tiber, and the Thames, By letting them both, pollute her streams.

2. They had been under the rebukes of Providence for their sins, and yet they persisted in them; (v. 27.) I have stretched out my hand over thee, to threaten and frighten thee; so did before this; and yet he had ruin promised upon them; and that is his usual method, to try to bring men to repentance first by lesser judgments; he did so here. Before he brought such a famine upon them as broke the staff of bread, he diminished their ordinary food, cut them short before he cut them off. When the exasper is abused, it is just with God to diminish that which is for necessity before he delivereth them to the Chaldeans to be destroyed, he delivered them to the daughters of the Philistines to be ridiculed, for their idolatries; for they hated them, and, though they were idolaters themselves, yet were ashamed of the lorn way of the Israelites, who were grown more profane in their idolatries than any of their neighbours; who changed their gods, whereas other nations did not change theirs; (Jer. ii. 10, 11.) for this they were justly chastised by the Philistines. 35. And it referred to the inroads which the Philistines made upon the south of Judah, in the reign of Ahaz, by which it was weakened and impoverished, and which was the beginning of sorrows to them; (2 Chron. xxviii. 18.) but they did not take warning by those judgments, and therefore were justly abandoned to ruin at last. Note, In the account which iniquitous sinners shall be called to, they will be told not only of the mercies for which they have been ungrateful, but of the afflictions under which they have been incorrigible, Amos iv. 11.

[3.] They were insatiable in their spiritual whoredom; Thou couldst not be satisfied, v. 28. and again, v. 29. When they had multiplied their idols and superstitions usages beyond measure, yet still would not be satisfied, but desired other and other fashions in worship. They that in sincerity join themselves to the true God, find enough in him for their satisfaction; and though they still desire more of God, yet they never desire more than God; but they that forsake this living Fountain for broken cisterns, will find themselves soon sated, but never satisfied; they have soon enough of the gods they have, and are still inquiring after more.

[3.] They were at great expense with their idolatry, and laid out a great deal of wealth in purchasing patterns of images and alters, and hiring priests to attend upon them from other countries. Harlots generally had their hires; but this impudent adulteress, instead of being hired to serve idols, hired idols to protect her, and accept her homage. This is much insisted on, (v. 31.—34.) "In this respect the contrary is in thee from other women in thy whoredoms: others are courted, but thou makest court to those that do not follow thee; art fond of making leagues and alliances with those heathen nations that despise thee: others have gifts given them, but thou givest thy gifts, the gifts which God had graciously given thee, to thine idols; herein like a harlot, other courtesans, not for gain, as harlots do, but entirely for the sake of the sin's sake." Note, Spiritual lusts, those of the mind, such as theirs after idols were, are often as strong and impatient as any carnal lusts are. And it is a great aggravation of sin when men are their own tempters, and, instead of proposing to themselves any worldly advantage by it, are at great expense with it; such are transgressors without cause, (Ps. xxv. 5.) wicked transgressors indeed.

And now is not Jerusalem in all this made to know her abominations? For what greater abominations could she be guilty of than these? Here we may see with wonder and horror what the corrupt nature of men is when God leaves them to themselves, yea, though they have the greatest advantages to be better, and do better. And the way of sin is downhill. Aházmur in vetibus.—He incline to the forbidden.

35. Wherefore, O harlot, hear the word of the Lord: 36. Thus saith the Lord God, Because thy filthiness was poured out, and thy nakedness discovered through thy whoredoms with thy lovers, and with all the idols of thine abominations, and by the blood of thy children, which thou didst give unto them: 37. Behold, therefore, I will gather all thy lovers, with whom thou hast taken pleasure, and all them that thou hast loved, with all them that thou hast hated, I will even gather them round about against thee, and will discover thy nakedness unto them, that they may see all thy nakedness. 38. And I will judge thee, as women that break wedlock, and shed blood, are judged: and I will give thee blood in fury and jealousy. 39. And I will also give thee into their hand, and they shall throw down thine eminent place, and shall break down thy high places: they shall strip thee also of thy clothes, and shall take thy fair jewels, and leave thee naked and bare. 40. They shall also bring up a company against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords. 41. And they shall burn thy houses with fire, and execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women: and I will cause thee to cease from playing the harlot, and thou shalt also give no lye any more. 42. So will I make my fury towards thee to rest, and my jealousy shall depart from thee, and I will be quiet, and will be no more angry. 43. Because thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, but hast fretted me in all these things; behold, therefore, I also will recompense thy way upon thy head, saith the Lord God; and thou shalt not commit this lewdness above all thine abominations.

Abstinence was by the law of Moses made a capital crime; this notorious adulteress, the criminal at the bar, being in the foregoing verses found guilty, here has sentence passed upon her. It is ushered in with solemnity, v. 35. The prophet, as the judge, in God's name calls to her, O harlot, hear the word of the Lord. Our Saviour preached to harlots for their conversion, to bring them into the kingdom of God, not as the prophet here, to expel them out of it. Note, An apostate church is a harlot; Jerusalem is so if she become idolatrous. Here is the faithful city become a harlot! Rome is so represented in the Revelation, when it is marked for ruin, as Jerusalem here; (Rev. xvii. 1.) Come, and I will show thee the judgments of the great whore. Those who will not hear the commanding word of the Lord and obey it, shall be made to hear the condemning word of the Lord and shall all tremble at it. Let us attend while judgment is given.

I. The crime is repeated, and the articles of the charge are summed up, (v. 36.) and (as is usual) with the attendant aggravations; (v. 43.) for when God speaks in wrath, he will be justified, and clear when he judges, clear when he is judged; and sinners, when they are condemned, shall aver their sins so set in order before them, that their mouth shall be stopped, and they shall not have a word to object against the equity of the sentence. The crimes which this harlot stands convicted of, and is now to be condemned for, are, 1. The violation of the two first commandments of the first table, by idolatry; which is here called her whoredoms with her lovers; so she called them, (Hos. ii. 12.) because she loved them as if they had been indeed her benefactors; that is, with all the idols of her abominations, the abominable idols which she served and worshipped. This was the sin which provoked God to jealousy. 2. The violation of the two first commandments of the second table, by the murder of their own innocent infants; the blood of thy children which thou hast got unto thine own heads. 3. A strange management of those that have cast off God and his fear, break through the strongest and most sacred bonds of natural affection.

The sins are aggravated from the consideration, (1.) Of the dishonour they had thereby done to themselves; "Hereby thy filthiness was poured out; the uncleanness that was in thy heart was hereby discovered and brought to light, and thy nakedness was made manifest to all that beheld thee and despised thee in contempt." God is displeased with his professing people for shaming themselves by their sins. (2.) Their base ingratitude is another aggravation of their sins; "Thou hast not remembered the days of thy youth, and the kindness that was done thee then, when otherwise thou hadst perished," v. 43. And, (3.) The vexation which their sins gave to God, whom they ought to have pleased; "Thou hast fretted me in all these things; not only angered me, but grieved me." It is a strange expression, and, one would think, enough to melt a heart of stone, that the great God, who cannot admit any unceasing, is pleased to speak of the sins and follies of his professing people as fretting him. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, in general; I will judge thee as women that break wedlock, and shed blood, are judged; (v. 36.) those two crimes were punished with death, with an ignominious death; "Thou hast shed blood, and therefore I will give thee blood; thou hast broken wedlock, and therefore I will give it thee, not only in justice, but in jealousy, not only as a righteous Judge, but as an injured and incensed Husband, who will not share in their vengeance," Prov. vi. 34, 35. He will recompense their way upon their head, v. 43. In all the judgments God executes upon sinners, we must see their own way recompensed upon their head; they are dealt with not only as they deserved, but as they procured; it is the end which their sin, as a way, had a direct tendency to. More particularly.

16. The warning should be very solemn (see Mal. ii. 11, alone in sinners exposed to public shame, v. 37.) Malafactors are not executed privately, but are made a spectacle to the world; care is here taken to bring spectators together; "All them whom thou hast loved, with whom thou hast taken pleasure, shall come to be witnesses of the execution, that they may take warning, and prevent their own like sin; and those also whom thou hast hated, with whom thou shalt suffer iniquity over the head, and triumph in the fall." Both ways the calamities of Jerusalem will be aggravated, that they will be the grief of her friends and the joy of her foes. These shall not only be gathered around her, but gathered against her; even those with whom she took unlawful pleasure, with whom she contracted unlawful leagues, the Egyptians and Assyrians, so they have sufficient to strip them of their virtue, shall see them strip, and perhaps help to strip them, of all their other ornaments; to see the nakedness of the land will they come. It is added, to the same purport, (v. 41.) I will execute judgments upon thee in the sight of many women; thou shalt be made an example of, in terrorem-that others may see and fear, and do no more presumption.

2. The criminal is condemned to die, for her sins are such as death is the wages of; (v. 40.) They shall bring up a company, a company shall be brought up against thee, and they shall stone thee with stones, and thrust thee through with their swords; so great a death, so many deaths in one, is this adulteress adjudged to. When the walls of Jerusalem were battered down with stones shot against them, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem were put to the sword, then this sentence was executed in the letter of it.

The estate of the criminal is confounded, and all that belong to her destroyed with her; (v. 39.) They shall throw down thine eminent place, and (v. 41.) they shall burn thine houses, as the habitations of bad women are destroyed, in detestation of their lewdness. Their high places, erected in honour of their idols, by which they thought to ingratiate themselves with their neighbours, shall be an offence to them, and even they shall break them down. It was long the complaint, even in some of the best reigns of the kings of Judah, that the high places were not taken away; but now the army of the Chaldeans, when they lay all waste, shall break them down. If iniquity be not taken away by the justice of the nation, it shall be taken away by the judgments of God upon the nation. The both the sin and the sinners shall be abolished together, and shall not be put to both: Thou shalt cease from playing the harlot; there shall be no remainders of idolatry in the land, because the inhabitants shall be wholly exterminated, and they shall give no more hire, because they have no more to give. Some that will not leave their sins, live till their sins leave them. When all that with which they honoured their idols is taken from them, they shall not live any more; (v. 44.) They shall not commit this lewdness of sacrificing thy children, which was a crime provoking above all thine abominations, for thy children shall all be cut off by the sword, or carried into captivity, so that thou shalt have none to sacrifice," v. 43. Or, it may be meant of the reformation of some of these that escape and survive the punishment; they shall all be brought home under the sword.

The captivity in Babylon made the people of Israel to cease for ever from playing the harlot, it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry; and then all shall be well, when this is the fruit, even the taking away of sin; then (v. 42.) my jealousy shall depart, I will be quiet, and no more angry. When we begin to be at war with sin, God will be at peace with us; for he continues the affliction no longer than till it has done its work. When sin departs, God's jealousy will soon depart, for he is never jealous but when we give him just cause to be so. Yet some understand this as a threatening of utter ruin, that God will make a full end, and the fire of his anger shall burn as long as there is any fuel for it. (Compare 2 Kings v. 27.) His fury shall rest upon them, and not remove. Compare with this the words of his adversaries, (John iii. 36.) The wrath of God abideth on them. They shall drink the dregs of the cup, and then God will be no more angry, for he is eased of his adversaries, (Isa. i. 24.) is satisfied in the aban-

25. nooning of them, and therefore will be no more angry, because there are no more for his anger to fasten upon. They had fretted him, when judgment and vengeance were in store; but now that judgment, and he will be in the eternal damnation of sinners, wherein he will be glorified, and therefore he will be satisfied.

44. Behold, every one that useth proverbs shall use this proverb against thee, saying, As is the mother, so is her daughter.
Observe, Thou art thy mother's daughter, that loathed her husband and her children; and thou art the sister of thy sisters, which loathed their husbands and their children: your mother was a Hittite, and your father an Amorite. 46. And thine elder sister is Samaria, she and her daughters that dwell at thy left hand: and thy younger sister, that dwelleth at thy right hand, is Sodom and her daughters.

47. Yet hast thou not walked after their ways, nor done after their abominations; but, as if that were a very little thing, thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways. 48. As I live, saith the Lord God, Sodom thy sister hath not done, she nor her daughters, as thou hast done, thou and thy daughters.

49. Behold, this was the iniquity of thy sister Sodom, pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness, was in her, and in her daughters, neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy. 50. And they were haughty, and committed abomination before me: therefore I took them away as I saw good. 51. Neither hath Samaria committed half of thy sins; but thou hast multiplied thy abominations more than they, and hast justified thy sisters in all thy abominations which thou hast done.

52. Thou also, which hast judged thy sisters, bear thine own shame, for thy sins that thou hast committed more abominable than they: they are more righteous than thou; yea, be thou confounded also, and bear thy shame, in that thou hast justified thy sisters. 53. When I shall bring again their captivity, the captivity of Sodom and her daughters, and the captivity of Samaria and her daughters, then will I bring again the captivity of the thy captives in the midst of them: 54. That thou mayest bear thine own shame, and mayest be confounded in all that thou hast done, in that thou art a comfort unto them. 55. When thy sisters, Sodom and her daughters, shall return to their former estate, and Samaria and her daughters shall return to their former estate, then thou and thy daughters shall return to your former estate. 56. For thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thy mouth in the day of thy pride. 57. Before thy wickedness was discovered, as at the time of thy reproof of the daughters of Syria, and all that are round about her, the daughters of the Philistines, which despise thee round about. 58. Thou hast borne thy lewdness and thine abominations, saith the Lord. 59. For thus saith the Lord God, I will even deal with thee as thou hast done, which hast despised the oath in breaking the covenant.

The prophecy here further shows Jerusalem her abominations, by comparing her with those places that had gone before her, and showing that she was worse than any of them; and therefore should, like them, be utterly and irreparably ruined. We are inquiring to judge of ourselves by comparison, and to imagine that we are sufficiently enlightened if we consider ourselves as good as such and such, who are thought passable; or that we are not dangerously bad, if we are no worse than such and such, who, though bad, are not of the worst. Now God by the prophet shows Jerusalem,

I. That she was as bad as her mother, as the accursed, devoted Canaanites that were the possessors of this land at the time. Thus God uses proverbs, as most people do, shall apply that word to Jerusalem. As is the mother, so is her daughter, v. 44. She is even her mother's own child; the Jews are as like the Canaanites in temper and inclination as if they had been their own children. The character of the mother was, that she loathed her husband and her children; she had all the marks of an adulteress; and that is the character of the daughter, she forsakes the Guide of her youth, and is barbarous to the children of her own bowels. When God brought Israel into Canaan, he particularly warned them not to do according to the abominations of the men of that land, who went before them, (for which it had spued them out, Lev. xviii. 27, 28.) the monuments of whose idolatry, with the remains of the idols themselves, were left, were constantly to tempt them: but they learned them the way they walked in their steps, and were as well affected to the idols of Canaan as ever they were, (Ps. cxi. 38.) and thus, in respect of imitation, it might truly be said that their mother was a Hittite, and their father an Amorite, (v. 45.) for they resembled them more than Abraham and Sarah.

II. That she was worse than her sisters Sodom and Samaria, that were adulteresses also, that loathed their husbands and their children, that were weary of the gods of their fathers, and were for introducing new gods, a-la-mode—quite in style, that came newly up, and new fashions in religion, and were given to change. On this comparison between Jerusalem and her sisters the prophet here enlarges, that he might either shame them into repentance, or justify God, that their destruction was just. Observe,

1. Who Jerusalem's sisters were. We must 45. Samaria and Sodom. Samaria is called the elder sister, or, rather, the greater, because it was a much larger city and kingdom, richer and more considerable, and more nearly allied to Israel. If Jerusalem look northward, this is partly on her left hand, this city of Samaria, and the towns and villages that were as daughters to that mother-city, these had been lately destroyed for their spiritual whoredom; Sodom, and the adjacent towns and villages that were her daughters, dwelt at Jerusalem's right hand, and was her lesser sister; less than Jerusalem, less than Samaria, and these were of old destroyed for their corporal whoredom, Jude 7.

2. Wherein Jerusalem's sins resembled her sisters', particularly Sodom's; (v. 49.) This was the iniquity of your mother, (it is implied, and this is thine iniquity too,) pride, fulness of bread, and abundance of idleness; their going after strange flesh, which was Sodom's most flagrant wickedness, is not mentioned, because notoriously known; but those sins which did not look so black, but opened the door and led the way to those more enormous crimes, and began to fill that measure of her sins, which was to fill up herself by their unnatural filthiness. Now these initiating sins were, (1.) Pride, in which the heart lifts itself above and against both God and man; pride was the first sin that turned angels into devils, and the garden of the Lord into a hell upon earth. It was the pride of the Sodomites, that they despised righteous Lot, and would not bear to be reproved by him; and this repined them for ruin.
(2.) Gluttony, here called fulness of bread. It was God's great mercy that they had plenty, but their great sin that they abused it, gluttonized themselves with it, ate to excess, and drank to excess, and made that the gratification of their lusts, which was given them to be the support of their lives. (3.) Idleness, and idleness of the very means of living. They were idle, and bestowed their time on the least of cases. Their country was fruitful, and the abundance they had they came easily by, which was a temptation to them to indulge themselves in sloth,
which disposed them to all that abominable filthiness which kindled their flames. Note, Idleness is an inlet to much sin; the men of Sodom, who were idle, were wicked, and sinners before the Lord, ex-ceczence. For there was, it seems, a regular connection between them; He was more abominable, and the sitting bird is the Fowler's mark.
When David rose from off his bed at evening, he saw Bathsheba. Quæritur, ægisti quis sit fuertus adulterus? In promtus causa est; desidiosus erat
—What made Aegisti an adulterer? Indulgence.
(4.) Oppression; neither did she strengthen the hands of the poor and needy; probably, it is implied
that she encouraged their hands and broke them more; however, it was had enough that, when she had so much wealth, and, consequently, power and interest and leisure, she did nothing for the relief of the poor,
in providing for whose wants those that themselves are full of bread may employ their time well, they need not be so abundantly idle, as too often they are.
These were the sins of the Sodomites, and these were Jerusalem's sins; their pride, the cause of their sin, by which they were hated; with the horrid effects of their sins, their abominations which they committed before God. Men arrive gradually at the height of impurity and wickedness; Nemo repertus fit turpissimus—No man reaches the height of vice at once. But where pride has got the ascendant in a man, he is in the high road to all abominations.
3. How much the sins of Jerusalem exceeded those of Sodom and Samaria: they were more hein-ious in the sight of God, either in themselves, or by reason of several aggravations: "Thou hast not only walked after their ways, and trod in their steps, but hast quite outdone them in wickedness," v. 47. Then thougest it a very little thing to do as they did;
didst laugh at them as sneaking sinners, and sily
cravenly and softly, and flatteringly, set down
damnful wickedness; wouldst triumph more boldly
over thy convictions, and bid more open defiance to God and religion; if a man will break, let him break for something; thus thou wast corrupted more than they in all thy ways." Jerusalem was more polite;
and therefore sinned with more wit, more art
and ingenuity, than Sodom and Samaria could. Jeruusalem had more wealth and power, and its govt more absolute and arbitrary; and therefore had the more opportunity of oppressing the poor, and shredding malignant influences around her, than Sodom and Samaria had. Jerusalem had the temple, and the ark, and the priesthood, and kings of the house of David; and therefore the wickedness of that holy city, that was so dignified, so near, so dear to God, and more weighty and firm to him, and its more government of Sodom and Samaria, that had not Jeru-selem's privileges and means of grace. Sodom has not done us as thou hast done, v. 48. This agrees with what Christ says, (Matt. xi. 24.) it shall be more tolerable for the land of Sodom in the day of judgment than for thee. The kingdom of the ten tribes had been very wicked; and yet Samaria has not committed such crimes as they are accused of here.
Shipped half so many idols, nor slain half so many prophets. It was bad enough that they of Jerusalem were guilty of Sodom's sins, sodomy itself not excepted, 1 Kings xiv. 24. 2 Kings xxviii. 7. And though the Dead sea, the standing monument of So-dom's sin and ruin, bordered upon their country, (Numb. xxxiv. 12.) and that sulphurous lake was always under their nose, (God having taken away Sodom and her daughters in such a way and manner
as he saw good, (as he says here, v. 50.) so that one thing should effectually make their overthrow enable to be more easily comprehended and believed of all. Pet. ii. 6.) yet they did not take warning, but exul-terified their abominations more than they; and, (1.)
By this they justified Sodom and Samaria, v. 51.
They pretended, in their haughtiness and supcriolousness, to judge them, and in the days of old, when they retained their integrity, they did judge them,
v. 52. But now they justify them comparatively;
though Sodom and Samaria are so wicked, Sodom and Samaria will rise up in judgment. (2.) For this they ought themselves to be greatly ashamed: "Thou
and I hast done thy pleasure; and therefore, by them,
now hear thine own shame, for thy sins which that committed, which, though of the same kind with theirs, yet, being committed by thee, are more abominable than theirs," v. 52. This may be taken either as foretelling their ruin, Thou shalt be ashamed, or as inviting them to repentance,
Be thou confounded, and bear thy shame, take the shame to thyself that is due to them; God hoped that sinners will forsake their sins when they begin to be heartily ashamed of them. And there fore they shall go into captivity, and there they shall lie, that they may be confounded in all that they have done; because they had been a comfort and encouragement to Sodom and Samaria, v. 54. Note,
There is nothing in sin which we have more reason to be ashamed of than this, that by our sin we have encouraged others in sin, and comforted them in that
for which they must be grieved, or they are undone.
Another reason why they must now be ashamed is, because in the day of their prosperity they had looked with so much disdain upon their neighbours;
Thy sister Sodom was not mentioned by thee in the day of thy pride, v. 56. They thought Sodom not worthy to be named the same day with Jerusalem, and therefore they did not deign to mention it, under a worse and more scandalous character than Sodom herself. Those that are high may perhaps come to stand upon a level with those they contemn.
Or, "Sodom was not mentioned, the warning designed to be given to thee by Sodom's ruin, was not regarded." If the Jews had but talked more frequently and seriously to one another, and to their children, concerning the wrath of God revealed from heaven against Sodom's uncleanness and wriggleousness, it might have kept them in awe, and prevented their treading in their steps; but they kept the thought of it at a distance, would not bear the mention of it, and (as the ancients say) put Isaiah to death for putting them in mind of it, when he called them sisters of Sodom and people of Gomorrah,
v. 58. Sodom and Gomorrah and the others were not putting off in mind of it, and preparing judgments
for themselves, that will not take notice of God's judgments upon others.
4. What desolations God had brought, and was bringing, upon Jerusalem, for these wickednesnesses wherein they had exceeded Sodom and Samaria.
(1.) She has already long ago been disgraced, and has fallen into contempt among her neighbours; (v.
2.) But her defilement was more upon her than she came to be so grossly and openly flagitious, she bore the just punishment of her secret and more concealed lewdness, when she fell under the reproach of the daughters of Syria, of the Philis.
times, who were said to despise her, and be ashamed of her, (v. 27.) and under the reproach of all that were round about her; which seems to refer to the descent made upon Judah by the Syrionians in the days of Alazao, and soon after another by the Philistines, * Chr. xviii. 5, 18. Note, Those that despise themselves by yielding to their lusts, will justly be brought into disgrace by being made to yield to their enemies; and it is observable, that before God brought potent enemies upon them, for their destruction, he brought enemies upon them that were less formidable, for their refreshments; if lesser judgments would do the work, God does not resort to greater. In this thou hast borne thy lewdness, v. 38. Those that will not cast off their sins by repentance and reformation, shall be made to bear their sins to their confusion.

(2.) She is now in captivity, or hastening into captivity, and therein is reckoned with, not only for her lewdness, (v. 38.) but for her perfidiousness and covenant-breaking; (v. 59.) "I will deal with thee as thou hast done; I will forsake thee as thou hast forsaken me, and cast thee off as thou hast cast me off, for thou hast despised the oath, in breaking the covenant." This seems to be meant of the covenant God made with their fathers, at mount Sinai, whereby he took them and theirs to be a peculiar people to himself. They flattered themselves with a conceit, that because God had hitherto continued his favour to them, standing up in their provocations, he would do so still. "No," says God, "you have broken covenant with me, have despised both the promises of the covenant, and the obligations of it, and therefore I will deal with thee as thou hast done." Note, Those that will not adhere to God as their God, have no reason to expect that he should continue to own them as his people. (5.) The captivity of the wicked, and their ruin, shall be as irrevocable as that of Sodom and Samaria. In this sense, as a threatening, most interpreters take v. 53, 55. When I shall bring again the captivity of Sodom and Samaria, and when they shall return to their former estate, then I will bring again the captivity of thy captives in the midst of them, and as it were for their sakes, and under their shadow and protection, because they are more righteous than thou, and then thou shalt return to thy former estate. But Sodom and Samaria were never brought back, nor ever returned to their former estate, and therefore let not Jerusalem expect it, that is, those who now remain there, whom God would deliver to be removed into all the kingdoms of the earth for their hurt, Jer. xxviii. 1, 10. Sooner shall the Sidonites arise out of the salt sea, and the Samaritans return out of the land of Assyria, than they enjoy their peace and prosperity again; for, to their shame be it spoken, it is a comfort to those of the ten tribes, who are dispersed and in captivity, to see these of the two tribes, who had been as bad as they, or worse, in like manner dispersed and in captivity; and therefore they shall live and die there, and not one of all the ones of both shall perish together, the good ones of both shall return together. Note, Those who do as the worst of sinners do, must expect to fare as they fare. * Let mine enemy be as the wicked.

60. Nevertheless, I will remember my covenant with thee in the days of thy youth, and I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant. 61. Then shalt thou remember thy ways, and be ashamed, when thou shalt receive thy sisters, thine elder and thy younger: and I will give them unto thee for daughters, but not by thy covenant.

And I will establish my covenant with thee, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. 63. That thou mayest remember, and be confounded, and never open thy mouth any more because of thy shame, when I am pacified toward thee for all that thou hast done, saith the Lord God.

Here, in the close of the chapter, after a most shameful conviction of sin, and a most dreadful denunciation of judgments, mercy is remembered, mercy is reserved, for those who shall come after, as was when God sware in his wrath concerning those who came out of Egypt, that they should not enter into the land, (Ex. xlvii. 7.) and God says, "your little ones shall," so here. And some think what that is said of the return of Sodom and Samaria, (v. 53, 55.) and of Jerusalem with them, is a promise; it may be understood so, if by Sodom we understand (as Grotsius and some of the Jewish writers do) the Moabites and Ammonites, the posterity of Lot, who once dwelt in Sodom; their captivity was returned, Jer. xxvii, 27, 28. (xlix.) as was that of many of the ten tribes, and Judah's with them. But these closing verses are, without doubt, a precious promise, which was in part fulfilled at the return of the penitent and reformed Jews out of Babylon, but was to have its full accomplishment in gospel-times, and in that repentance and that remission of sins which should then be preached with success to all nations, beginning at Jerusalem. Now observe here,

1. From whence this mercy should take rise, from God himself, and his remembering of his covenant with them; (v. 60.) Nevertheless, though they had been so provoking, and God has been so provoked, to that degree that one would think they could never be reconciled again, yet "I will remember my covenant with thee, that covenant which I made with thee in the days of thy youth, and will revive it again. Though thou hast broken the covenant, (v. 59.) I will remember it, and it shall flourish again." See how much it is our comfort and advantage that God is pleased to deal with us in a covenant-way, for thus the mercies of it come to be sure mercies and everlasting, (Is. l. 5.) and while the root stands in the garden of the Lord, though the tree, though it be cut down, that through the scent of water it will bud again. We do not find that they put him in mind of the covenant, but ex nero motto—from his own mere good pleasure, he remembers it as he had promised; (Lev. xxvi. 42.) Then will I remember my covenant, and will remember the land. He that bids us to be ever mindful of the covenant, no doubt will himself be ever mindful of it, the word which he commanded (and what he commands stands fast for ever) to a thousand generations.

2. How they should be prepared and qualified for this mercy; (v. 61.) "Thou shalt remember thy ways, thine evil ways; God will put thee in mind of them, and teach thee in fear before that thou mayest be ashamed of them." Note, God's good work in us commences and keeps pace with his good will towards us. When he remembers his covenant for us, that he may not remember our sins against us, he puts us upon remembering of our sins against ourselves. And if we will but be brought to remember our ways, how crooked and perverse they were in him, and how we have walked contrary to God in them, we cannot but be ashamed; and when we are so, we are best prepared to receive the honour and comfort of a sealed pardon and a settled peace.

3. What the mercy is, that God has in reserve for them. (1.) He will take them into covenant with himself; (v. 60.) I will establish unto thee an everlasting covenant; and again, (v. 62.) I will establish, re-establish, and establish more firmly than ever, my covenant with thee. That is to say, it is an unbreakable contract to all true repentants, that the covenant of grace is so well ordered in all things, that every transgression in the covenant does not throw us out of covenant, for that is inviolable. (2.) He will bring the Gentiles into church-communion with them; (v. 61.) Thou shalt receive thy sisters, the Gentile nations that are round about thee, thee elder and thy younger, greater than thee art, and lesser, ancient nations and moderns, and I will give them unto thee for daughters, they shall be founded, nursed, taught, and educated, by that gospel, that word of the Lord, which shall go forth from Zion and from Jerusalem; so that all the neighbours shall call Jerusalem mother, while the church continues there, and shall acknowledge the Jerusalem which is from above, and which is free, to be the mother of us all, Gal. iv. 28. They shall be thy daughters, but not by thy covenant, not by the covenant of peculiarity, not as being proselytes to the Jewish religion, and subjects to the yoke of the ceremonial law, but as being converts with thee to the Christian religion. Or, Not by thy covenant, may mean, "not upon such terms as thou shalt think fit to impose upon them as conquered nations, as captives and hominage to whom thou mayest give law at pleasure;" (such a conversion as the ancient nations of the nations; no, they shall be thy daughters by my covenant, the covenant of grace made with thee and them in concert, as an indenture triplicite. I will be a Father, a common Father, both to Jews and Gentiles, and so they shall become sisters to one another. And when thou shalt receive them, thou shalt be ashamed of thine own evil ways wherein thou wast confused to the face, remembering how much worse than the Gentiles thou wast in the day of thine apostacy."

4. What the fruit and effect of this will be.

(1.) God will hereby be glorified; (v. 62.) Thou shalt know that I am the Lord. It shall hereby be known that the God of Israel is Jehovah, a God of power, and faithful to his covenant; and thou shalt know it, who hast not lived and it, and didst not believe it. It had often been said in wrath, Ye shall know that I am the Lord, shall know it to thy cost; here it is said in mercy, Ye shall know it to your comfort; and it is one of the most precious promises of the new covenant which God has made with us, that all shall know him from the least to the greatest.

(2.) They shall hereby be more humbled and bashted for sin; (v. 63.) "That thou mayest be the more confounded at the remembrance of all that thou hast done amiss, mayest reproach thyself for it, and call thyself a thousand times unwise, unfruitful, ungrateful, and unlike what thou wast, and mayest never open thy mouth any more in contradiction to God, reflection on him, or complaints of him, but mayest be for ever silent and submissive, because of thy shame." Note, Those that rightly remember their sins, shall be truly ashamed of them: and those that are truly ashamed of their sins, will see great reason to be patient under their afflictions: to be dumb, and not open their mouths against what God does. But that which is most observable, is, that all this shall be when I am pacified toward thee, saith the Lord God. Note, It is the gracious ingenuousness of true repentants, that the clearer evidences and the fuller instances they have of God's being reconciled to them, the more grieved and ashamed they are that ever they have offended. God is in Jesus Christ pacified toward us; he is our Peace, and it is by his cross that we are reconciled, and in his gospel that God is reconciling the world to himself: now the consideration of this should be powerful to melt our hearts into a godly sorrow for sin.

This is repeating because the kingdom of heaven is at hand. The prodigal, after he had received the kiss which assured him that his father was pacified toward him, was ashamed and confounded, and said, Father, I have sinned against heaven and before thee. And the more our shame for sin is increased by the sense of pardoning mercy, the more will our comfort in God be increased.

CHAP. XVII.

God was, in the foregoing chapter, reckoning with the people of Judah and bringing ruin upon them, for their treachery and breaking covenants with the Lord. In this chapter he is reckoning with the king of Judah, for his treachery in breaking covenant with the king of Babylon; for when God came to contend with them, he found many ground of his controversy. The thing was now in doing; Zedekiah was practising with the king of Egypt underhand for assistance in a treacherous project he had formed to shake off the yoke of the king of Babylon, and violate the homage and fealty he had sworn to him. For this, God by the prophet here, 1. Threatens the ruin of him and his kingdom, by a parable of two eagles and a vine, (v. 1. 10.) and the explanation of that parable, v. 11. 24. 2. And in the parable, he speaks in favour to raise the royal family of Judah again, the house of David, in the Messiah and his kingdom, v. 22. 24. 1. And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, put forth a riddle, and speak a parable unto the house of Israel; 3. And say, Thus saith the Lord God, A great eagle with great wings, long-winged, full of feathers, which had divers colours, came unto Lebanon, and took the highest branch of the cedar: 4. He cropped off the top of his young twigs, and carried it into a land of traffic; he set it in a city of merchants. 5. He took also of the seed of the land, and planted it in a fruitful field; he placed it by great waters, and set it as a willow-tree; 6. And it grew, and became a spreading vine of low stature, whose branches turned toward him, and the roots thereof were under him: so it became a vine, and brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs. 7. There was also another great eagle with great wings and many feathers; and, behold, this vine did bend her roots toward him, and shot forth her branches toward him, that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation. 8. It was planted in a good soil by great waters, that it might bring forth branches, and that it might bear fruit, that it might be a goodly vine. 9. Say thou, Thus saith the Lord God, Shall it prosper? shall he not pull up the roots thereof, and cut off the fruit thereof, that it wither? it shall wither in all the leaves of her spring, even without great power, or many people to pluck it up by the roots thereof. 10. Yea, behold, being planted, shall it prosper? shall it not utterly wither when the east wind toucheth it? it shall wither in the furrows where it grew. 11. Moreover, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 12. Say now to the rebellious house, Know ye not what these things mean? tell them, Behold, the king of Babylon is come to Jerusalem, and hath taken the king thereof, and the princes thereof, and led them with him to Babylon; 13. And hath taken of the king's seed, and made a covenant with him, and hath taken an oath of him: he hath also taken of the mighty of the land: 14. That the kingdom might be base, that it might not lift itself up, but that by keeping of his covenant it might stand. 15. But he rebelled against him, in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people. Shall he prosper? shall he escape that doeth such things? or shall he break the covenant, and be delivered? 16. As I live, saith the Lord God, surely in the place where the king dwelleth that made him king, whose oath he despised, and whose covenant he brake, even with him, in the midst of Babylon, he shall die. 17. Neither shall Pharaoh with his mighty army and great company, make for him in the war, by casting up mounts, and building forts, to cut off many persons: 18. Seeing he despised the oath by breaking the covenant, when I, he had given his hand, and hath done all these things, he shall not escape. 19. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, As I live, surely mine oath that he hath despised, and my covenant that he hath broken, even it will I recompense upon his own head. 20. And I will spread my net upon him, and he shall be taken in my snare; and I will bring him to Babylon, and will plead with him there for his trespass that he hath trespassed against me. 21. And all his fugitives, with all his bands, shall fall by the sword, and they that remain shall be scattered towards all winds; and ye shall know that I the Lord have spoken it.

We must take all these verses together, that we may have the parable and the explanation of it at one view before us, because they will illustrate one another.

1. The prophet is appointed to put forth a riddle to the house of Israel; (v. 2.) not to puzzle them, as Samson's riddle was put forth to the Philistines, not to hide the mind of God from them in obscurity, or to leave them in uncertainty about it, one advancing one conjecture and another another, as is usual in expounding riddles; no, he is immediately to tell them the meaning of it. Let him that speaks in an unknown tongue, pray that he may interpret, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. But he must deliver his message in a riddle or parable, that they might take the more notice of it, might be the more affected with it themselves, and might the better remember it, and tell it to others. For these reasons God often used similitudes by his servants the prophets, and Christ himself opened his mouth in parables. Riddles and parables are used for an amusement to ourselves, and an entertainment to our friends; the prophet must make use of these, to see if in this dress the things of God might find acceptance, and instigate themselves into the minds of a careless people. Note, Ministers should study to find out acceptable words, and try various methods to do good; and, as far as they have reason to think will be for edification, should both bring that which is familiar into their preaching, and their preaching too into their familiar discourse; that there may not be so vast a dissimilarity as with some there is between what they say in the closet and what they say in the pulpit.

II. He is appointed to explain this riddle to the rebellious house; (v. 12.) though being rebellious, they might justly have been left in ignorance, to see and hear, and not perceive, yet the thing shall be explained to them: Know ye not what these things mean? They that knew the story, and what was now in agitation, might make a shrewd guess at the meaning of this riddle; but, that they might be left without excuse, he is to give it them in plain terms, stripped of the metaphor. But the enigma was first propounded for them to study on awhile, and to send to their friends at Jerusalem, that they might inquire after and expect the solution of it some time after.

Let us now see what the matter of this message is:

1. Nebuchadnezzar had some time ago carried off Jehoiachin, the same that was called Jeconiah, when he was but eighteen years of age, and had reigned in Jerusalem but three months, him and his princes and great men, and had brought them captives to Babylon, 2 Kings xiv. 12. This in the parable is represented by an eagle's cropping the top and tender branch of a cedar tree, and casting it into a land of traffic, a city of merchants, (v. 3, 4.) which is explained, v.12. The king of Babylon took the king of Jerusalem, who was no more able to resist him than a young twig of a tree is to contend with the strongest bird of prey, that easily crops it off, perhaps toward the making of her nest. Nebuchadnezzar, in Daniel's vision, is a king, the king of beasts; (Dan. vii. 4.) there he has eagle's wings, so swift were his motions, so speedy were his conquests. Here, in this parable, he is an eagle, the king of birds; a great eagle, that lives upon spoil and rapine, whose young ones suck up blood, Job xxxiii. 50. His dominion extends itself far and wide, like the great and long wings of an eagle; that people: he takes up the branch of a great cedar tree out of the court splendid, for it has divers colours, which look like embroiderying, as the word is. Jerusalem is Lebanon, a forest of houses, and very pleasant; the royal family is the cedar, Jehoiachin is the top branch, the top of the young twigs, which he crops off; Babylon is the land of traffic, and city of merchants where it is set. And the king of Judah, being of the house of David, will think himself much degraded and disgraced to be lodged among tradesmen; but he must make the best of it.

2. When he carried him to Babylon, he made his uncle Zedekiah king in his room, v. 5, 6. His name was Mattaniah—the gift of the Lord, which Nebuchadnezzar changed into Zedekiah—the justice of the Lord, to remind him, that he might be called his, for fear of his justice. This was one of the seed of the land, a native, not a foreigner, not one of his Babylonian princes; he was planted in a fruitful field, for so Jerusalem as yet was; he placed it by great waters, where it would be likely to grow, like a willow-tree, which grows quick, and grows best in moist ground, but is never designed or expected to be a stately tree. He set it with liberal circumspection; (so some read it;) he wisely provided that it might grow, but that it might not grow too big. He took of the king's seed, (so it is explained, v. 13.) and made a covenant with him, that he should have the kingdom, and enjoy the regal power and dignity, provided he held it as his vassal, dependent on him, and accountable to him. He took an oath of him, made him swear allegiance to him, swear by his own God, the God of Israel, that he would be a faithful tributary to him, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 13. He also took away the mighty of the land, the chief of the men of war, partly as hostages, partly to prevent them from finding a means of removing the king. The land being thereby weakened, the king might be the less able, and therefore the less in temptation, to break his league. What he designed we are told, v. 14. That the kingdom might be base, in respect both of honour and strength, might be neither a rival with its powerful neighbours, nor a terror to its feeble ones, as it had been, that it might not lift up itself against him. He also took down any of the petty states that were in subjection to it. But yet he designed that by keeping of this covenant it might stand, and continue a kingdom. Hereby the pride and ambition of that haughty potentate would be gratified, who aimed to be like the Most High, (Isa. xiv. 14.) to have all about him subject to him. Now see here,

(1.) How sad a change sin made with the royal family of Babylon, v. 14. The mighty men of the land were tributaries to that, now that has not only lost its dominion over other nations, but is itself become a tributary. How is the gold become dim! Nations by sin sell their liberty, and princes their dignity, and profane their crowns by casting them to the ground. (2.) How wisely Zedekiah did for himself in accepting these terms, though they were dishonourable, when necessity brought him to it. Men may live very comfortably and contentedly, though he cannot bear a part, and make a figure, as formerly. A kingdom may stand firm and safe, though it do not stand so high as it has sometimes done; and so may a family.

3. Zedekiah, while he continued faithful to the king of Babylon, did very well, and if he would have reformed his kingdom, and returned to God and his duty, he had done better, and by that means might soon have recovered his former dignity, v. 6. This plank grew, and though it was set as a willow-tree, and little account was made of it, yet it became a spreading vine of low stature, a great blessing to his own country, and his fruits making glad their hearts; and it is better to be a spreading vine of low stature than a lofty cedar of no use. Nebuchadnezzar had planted it, but the king of Babylon did not use it, and rested on him as the vine on the wall, and he had his share of the fruits of this vine; the roots thereof too were under him, and at his disposal. The Jews had reason to be pleased, for they sat under their own vine, which brought forth branches, and shot forth sprigs, and looked pleasant and promising. See how gradually the judgments of God came upon them, by provoking people; how God gave them up to their sins, and so gave them space to repent. He made their kingdom base, to try if that would humble them, before he made it no kingdom; yet left it easy for them, to try if that would win upon them to return to him, that the troubles threatened might be prevented.

4. Zedekiah knew not when he was well off; but grew more and more to experience of being a tributary to the king of Babylon, and, to get clear of it, entered into a private league with the king of Egypt. He had no reason to complain that the king of Babylon put any new hardships upon him, or improved his advantages against him, that he oppressed or impoverished his country, for, as the prophet had said before, (v. 6.) to aggravate his treachery, he shows again, (v. 8.) what a fair way he was in to be considered; He was planted in a good soil by great waters, his family was likely enough to be built up, and his exchequer to be filled, in a little time, so that, if he had dealt faithfully, he might have been a goodly vine. But there was another great eagle that he had an affection for, and put a confidence in, and that was the king of Egypt, v. 7. Those two great potentates, the kings of Babylon and Egypt, were but two eagles, birds of prey. This great eagle of Egypt is said to have great wings, but he was not the champion of Babylon, because, though the kingdom of Egypt was strong, yet it was not of such a vast extent as that of Babylon was. The great eagle is said to have many feathers, much wealth, and many soldiers, which he depended upon as a substantial defence, but which really were no more than so many feathers. Zedekiah, promising himself liberty, did include himself in a vassal to the king of Egypt, foolishly expecting ease by changing his master. Now this vine did secretly and undertake bend her roots toward the king of Egypt, that great eagle, and after a while did openly shoot forth her branches toward him, gave him an intimation how much she coveted an alliance with him, that he might water it by the furrows of her plantation, whereas it was planted by great waters, and did not need any assistance from him. Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon in sending his ambassadors into Egypt, that they might give him horses and much people, to enable him to contend with the king of Babylon. See what a change sin had made with the people of God! God promised that they should be a numerous people, as the sand of the sea; yet now, if their king had continued errors, he must send to Egypt for them, they being for sin minished and brought low, Ps. civ. 39. See also the folly of fretful, discontented spirits, that ruin themselves by striving to mend themselves, whereas they might be easy and happy enough if they would but make the best of that which is.

5. God here threatens Zedekiah with the utter destruction of him and his kingdom, and, in displeasure against him, passes that doom upon him for his treacherous revolt from the king of Babylon. This is represented in the parable, (v. 9, 10.) by the plucking up of this vine by the roots, the cutting off the fruit, and the withering of the leaves, the leaves of her spring, when they are in their greenness, (Job viii. 12.) before they begin in autumn to wither of themselves. The project shall be blasted, and what luxury of the son of man shall be turned into ashes, and the prince shall be ruined past recovery; as a vine when the east wind blasts it, so that it shall be fit for nothing but the fire, (as we had it in that parable, ch. xv. 4.) it shall wither even in the furrows where it grew, though they were ever so well watered. It shall be destroyed without great power or many people to pluck it up, for what need is there of raising the multitude to pluck up a vine? is it, God, can bring great things to pass without ado; he needs not great power and many people to effect his purposes, a handful will serve if he pleases. He can have with all difficulty ruin a sinful king and kingdom, and make no more of it than we do of rooting up a tree that cumbers the ground.

In the explanation of the parable the sentence is very largely paraphrased, Shall he prosper? (v. 13.) Can he expect to do ill, and fare well? Nay, shall he that does such wicked things escape? Shall he break the covenant, and be delivered from that vengeance which is the just punishment of his treachery? No, can he expect to do ill, and not suffer ill? Let him hear his doom:

(1.) It is ratified by the oath of God; (v. 15.) As I live, with the Lord God, he shall die for it. This intimates how highly God resented the crime, and how sure and severe the punishment of it would be.
God swears in his wrath, as he did, Ps. xcv. 11. Note, As God's promises are confirmed with an oath, for comfort to the saints, so are his threatenings, for terror to the wicked. As sure as God lives, and is happy, I may add, and long, so sure, so long, shall impenitent sinners die, and be miserable. (2.) It is justified by the heinousness of the crime he had been guilty of. [1.] He had been very ungrateful to his benefactor, who had made him king, and for aught that appeared, had made him a prisoner, when he might as easily have made him a prisoner. Note, It is a sin against God to be unkind to our friends, and to lift up the heel against those that have helped to raise us. [2.] He had been very false to him whom he had covenanted with; this is mostly insisted on. He despaired of the oath when his conscience or friends reminded him of it, he was brought to repentance, he should beulleted and broke it, v. 15, 16, 18, 19. He broke through it, and took a pride in making nothing of it, as a great tyrant in our own day, whose maxim (they say) it is, That princes ought not to be slaves to their word any farther than is for their interest. That which aggravated Zedekiah's perfidiousness was, that the oath by which he had bound himself to the king of Babylon, was, First, A solemn covenant; this his king, Nebuchadnezzar, had made with him, v. 19. When, he, he had given his hand, as a confederate with the king of Babylon, not only as his subject, but as his friend; the joining of hands being a token of the joining of hearts. Secondly, A sacred oath. God says, (v. 19.) It is mine oath that he has despised, and my covenant that he has broken. In every solemn oath God is appealed to as a Witness of the sincerity of him that swears, and as an invoker and Revenger of his treachery if he now swear falsely, or at any time hereafter break his oath. But the oath of allegiance to a prince is particularly called the oath of God, (Eccles. viii. 2.) as if that had something in it more sacred than another oath; for princes are ministers of God to us for good, Rom. xiii. 4. Now Zedekiah's breaking this oath and covenant is the sin which God will recompense upon his own head, (v. 19.) the treachery which he has trespassed against God, for which God will plead with him, v. 20. Note, Perjury is a heinous sin, and highly provoking to the God of heaven. It would not serve for an excuse, 1. That he who took this oath was a king, a king of the house of David, whose liberty and dignity might have set him above the obligation to the oath, he being a king, and kings are men to God, and not exempt from his law and judgment. The prince is doubly bound as firmly bound before God to the people by his coronation-oath, as the people to the prince by the oath of allegiance. 2. Nor that this oath was sworn to the king of Babylon, a heathen prince, worse than a heretic, with whom the church of Rome says, No faith is to be kept up, though Nebuchadnezzar was a worshipper of false gods, yet the true God will avenge this quarrel when one of his worshippers breaks his league with him; for truth is a debt owing to all men; and if the professors of the true religion deal perniciously with those of a false religion, their profession will be so far from excusing, much less justifying, them, that it aggravates their sin, and God will reward them accordingly. A breach of alliance by it they give occasion to the enemies of the Lord to blaspheme; as that Mahometan prince, who, when the Christians broke their league with him, cried out, O Jesus, are these thy Christians? 3. Nor would it justify him, that the oath was extorted from him by a conqueror, for the covenant was made upon a valuable consideration. He held his life and crown upon the true allegiance to the king of Babylon; and if he enjoy the benefit of his bargain, it is very unjust if he do not observe the terms. Let him know then that, having despised the oath, and broken the covenant, he shall not escape. And if the contempt and violation of such an oath, such a covenant as this, would be so punished, of how much sorer punishment shall they that he thought worthy, who break covenant with God, (when to, they had given their hand upon it, that they would be faithful,) who tread under foot the blood of that covenant as an unholy thing? (Deut. vii. 20.) It is a sin to break the covenant, and much more to break it with God, v. 20. (3.) It is particularized in divers instances, where the punishment is made to answer the sin. [1.] He had rebelled against the king of Babylon, and the king of Babylon should be his effectual conqueror: in the place where that king dwells, whose covenant he broke, even with him in the midst of Babylon he shall die, v. 16. He thinks to get out of his hands, but he shall fall, and be taken into his hands. God himself will now take part with the king of Babylon against him; I will spread my net upon him, v. 20. God has a net for those who deal perniciously, and think to escape his righteous judgments, in which they shall be taken and held, who would not be held by the hand of an oath and covenant. Zedekiah dreaded Babylon; he was afraid of being taken, and (v. 19.) they shall deal with him there. Man will justly be forced upon that calamity which they endeavour by sin to free from. [2.] He had relied upon the king of Egypt, and the king of Egypt should be his ineffectual helper. Pharaoh with his mighty army shall not make for him in the war, (v. 17.) shall do him no service, nor give any check to the progress of the Chaldean forces; he shall not assist him in the siege by casting up walls, and building forts, nor do battle by cutting off many persons. Note, Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be; and he commonly weakens and withers that arm of flesh which we trust in, and stay ourselves upon. Now was again fulfilled what was spoken on a former like occasion, (Isa. xxx. 7.) The Egyptians shall help in vain. They did set; for, though upon the approach of the Egyptian army, the Chaldeans withdrew from the siege of Jerusalem, upon their retreat they returned to it again, and took it. It should seem, the Egyptians were not hearty, had strength enough, but no good will to help Zedekiah. Note, Those who deal treacherously with those who put confidence in them, will justly be dealt treacherously with by those they put a confidence in. Yet the Egyptians were not the only states Zedekiah stayed himself upon; he had bands of his own, to stand by him; but those bands, though we may suppose they were veteran troops, and the best soldiers his kingdom afforded, shall become fugitives, shall quit their posts, and make the best of their way, and shall fall by the sword of the enemy; and the remains of them shall be scattered, v. 21. This was fulfilled when the enemies broke up, and all the forces of them fled, Jer. lii. 7. The prophet seems to say, that I the Lord have spoken it. Note, Sooner or later, God's word will prove itself; and those who will not believe, shall find by experience the reality and weight of it.

22. Thus saith the Lord God, I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar, and will set it; I will crop off from the top of his young twigs a tender one, and will plant it upon a high mountain and eminent: 23. In the mountain of the height of Israel will I plant it; and it shall bring forth boughs, and bear fruit, and he a goodies cedar; and under it shall dwell all fowl of every wing;
in the shadow of the branches thereof shall they dwell. 24. And all the trees of the field shall know that I the Lord have brought down the high tree, have exalted the low tree, have dried up the green tree, and have made the dry tree to flourish: I the Lord have spoken, and have done it.

When the royal family of Judah was brought to desolation by the captivity of Jehoiachin and Zedekiah, it might be asked, "What is now become of the covenant of royalty made with David, that his children should sit upon his throne for evermore? In the appointed species of Jews in which all promise to David was fulfilled, it is sufficient, for the silencing of the objectors, to answer, that the promise was conditional; if they will keep my covenant, then they shall continue, Ps. cxxxii. 12. But David's posterity broke the condition, and so forfeited the promise. But the unbelief of man shall not invalidate the promise of God. He will find out another Seed of David, in which it shall be accomplished; and that is promised in these verses.

1. The house of David shall again be magnified, and out of its ashes another phoenix shall arise. The metaphor of a tree, which was made use of in the threatening, is here presented in the promise, v. 22, 23. This promise had its accomplishment in part, when Zerubbabel, a branch of the house of David, was raised up to head the Jewish church; but that extension of the house of David, in which Nebuchadnezzar was the great eagle that had attempted the re-establishing of the house of David, in a dependence upon him, v. 5. But the attempt miscarried; his plantation withered, and was plucked up; "Well," says God, "the next shall be of my planting, I will also take of the highest branch of the high cedar, and I will set it." Note, As men have their designs, God also has his designs, but David's posterity, as Nebuchadnezzar prided himself in setting up kingdoms at his pleasure, Dan. v. 19. But those kingdoms soon had an end, whereas the God of heaven sets up a kingdom that shall never be destroyed, Dan. ii. 44.

2. The house of David is revived in a tender one cut off from the top of his young twigs; Zerubbabel was such; that which was hopeful in the time was but the day of small things, (Zech. iv. 10.) yet before him great mountains were made plain. Our Lord Jesus was the highest Branch of the high cedar, the firmest of all from the root; for, soon after he appeared, the house of David was all cut off and extinguished, but the nearest of all to heaven, for his kingdom was not of this world. He was taken from the top of the young twigs, Isa. xi. 1, where they fled in their distress, the Branch, a tender Plant, and a Root out of a dry ground, (Isa. lii. 2.) but a Branch of righteousness, the planting of the Lord, that he may be glorified.

3. This branch is planted in a high mountain, (v. 22.) in the mountain of the height of Israel; (v. 23.) thither he brought Zerubbabel in triumph, there he raised up his son Jesus, sent him to gather the lost sheep of the house of Israel that were scattered upon the mountains, set him his King upon his holy hill of Zion, sent forth the gospel from mount Zion, the word of the Lord from Jerusalem; there, in the height of Israel, a nation which all its neighbours had an eye upon as conspicuous and illustrious, was the Christian church first planted; the churches of Judea were the most primitive churches. The unbelieving Jews did what they could to prevent its being planted there; but who can pluck up what God will plant?

From thence it spreads far and wide. The Jewish state, though it began very low in Zerubbabel's time, was set as a tender branch, which might easily be plucked up, yet took root, spread strangely, and after some time became very considerable; those of other nations, foul of every wing, put themselves under the protection of it. The Christian church was at first like a grain of mustard seed, but became like this tender branch here, a great tree; its beginning small, but its latter end exceeding that of the cedar of Lebanon. Jesus was twisted from the holy tree, thrown into the church, then did the wolf of every wing (even the birds of prey, which those preyed upon, as the wolf and the lamb feeding together, Isa. xxi. 6.) come and dwell under the shadow of this goodly cedar. See Dan. iv. 21.

II. God himself will hereon be glorified, v. 24. The setting up of the Messiah's kingdom in the world shall discover more clearly than ever to the children of men that God is the King of all the earth, Ps. lxxvii. 7. Never was there a more full conviction given of this truth, that all things are governed by an infinitely wise and mighty Providence, than that which was given by the exaltation of Christ, and the establishment of his kingdom among men; for by that it appeared that God has all hearts in his hand, and the sovereign disposal of all affairs.

All the trees of the field shall know, 1. That the tree which God will have to be brought down, and dried up, shall be so, though it be ever so high and stately, ever so green and flourishing. Neither honour nor wealth, neither external advantages nor internal endowments, will secure men from humbling, withering providences. 2. That the tree of the Messiah also shall be exalted and to flourish, shall so be, shall do so, though ever so low, and ever so dry. The house of Nebuchadnezzar, that now makes so great a figure, shall be extirpated, and the house of David, that now makes so mean a figure, shall become famous again; and the Jewish nation, that is now desplicable, shall be considerable. The kingdom of Satan, that has borne so long, so strong a branch, shall be broken, and the kingdom of Christ, that was looked upon with contempt, shall be established. The Jews, who, in respect of church-privileges, had been high and green, shall be thrown out, and the Gentiles, who had been low and dry trees, shall be taken in their room, Isa. liv. 1. All the enemies of Christ shall be abased, and made his footstool, and his interests shall be confirmed and advanced; if the Lord have spoken, it is the decree, the declared decree, that Christ must be exalted, must be the Head-Stone of the corner, and I have done it, I will do it in due time, but it is as sure to be done as if it were done already; With men saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God. 'What he has spoken we may be sure that he will do, nor shall one be found among men that have been heard and be not done. For he is not a man, that he should lie, or the son of man, that he should repent either of his threatenings or of his promises.'

CHAP. XVIII.

Perhaps, in reading some of the chapters foregoing, we may have been tempted to think ourselves not much concerned with them, (though we should be exempted from our learning) but this chapter, at first view, appears highly and nearly to concern us all—very highly, very nearly; for without particular reference to Judah and Jerusalem, this answers the rule of judgment, that God will deal with the children of men in determining them to their everlasting state; and it agrees with that very ancient rule laid down, Gen. iv. 7. If thou dost
EZEKIEL, XVIII.

And the word of the Lord came unto me again, saying, 2. What mean ye, that ye use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge? 3. As I live, saith the Lord God, ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb in Israel. 4. Behold, all souls are mine; as the soul of the father, so also the soul of the son is mine: the soul that sinneth, it shall die. 5. But if a man be just, and do that which is lawful and right, 6. And hath not eaten upon the mountains, neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, neither hath defiled his neighbour's wife, neither hath come near to a menstruous woman, 7. And hath not oppressed any, but hath restored to the debtor his pledge, hath spoiled none by violence, hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment; 3. He that hath not given forth upon usury, neither hath taken any increase, that hath withdrawn his hand from iniquity, hath executed true judgment between man and man, 9. Hath walked in my statutes, and hath kept my judgments, to deal truly; he is just, he shall surely live, saith the Lord God.

Evil manners, we say, beget good laws; and in like manner sometimes unjust reflections occasion just vindications; evil proverbs beget good prophecies. Here is,

1. An evil proverb commonly used by the Jews in their captivity. We had one before, (ch. xii. 22.) and a reply to it; here we have another. That sets God's justice at defiance, The days are prolonged, and every vision fails. The threatenings are a jest. This charges him with injustice, as if the judgments executed were a wrong; "You use this proverb concerning the land of Israel, now that it is led captive, the judgment of God, saying, The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge," we are punished for the sins of our ancestors, which is as great an absurdity in the divine regimen, as if the children should have their teeth set on edge, or stuffed, by the fathers' eating sour grapes, whereas, in the order of natural causes, if men eat or drink any thing amiss, they only themselves shall suffer. No way, but it may be owned that there was some occasion given for this proverb. God had often said that he would visit the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, especially the sin of idolatry, intending thereby to express the evils of sin, or of that sin, his detestation of it, and just indignation against it, and the heavy punishments he would bring upon idolaters, and that parents might be required to bear the consequences of their affection to their children, and that children might not be drawn to sin by their reverence for their parents. He had likewise often declared by his prophets, that in bringing the present ruin upon Judah and Jerusalem he had an eye to the sins of Manasseh and other preceding kings; for looking upon the nation as a body politic, and punishing them with national judgments for national sins, and admitting the maxim in our law, that a corporation never dies, reckoning with them now for the iniquities of former ages, was but like making a man, when he is old, to possess the iniquities of his youth, Job xiii. 26. And there is no unrighteousness with God in doing so. But, 2. They intended it as a reflection upon others, and an instance drawn against him in his proceedings against them. Thus far is right, which is implied in this proverbial saying, That they who are guilty of wilful sin, eat sour grapes, they do that which they will feel from, sooner or later. The grapes may look well enough in the temptation, but they will be bitter as bitterness itself in the reflection. They will set the sinner's teeth on edge; when conscience is awakened, and sets the sin in order before them, it will spoil the relish of their comforts as when the teeth are set on edge. But they suggest it as unreasonable that the children should smart for the father's folly, and feel the pain of that which they never tasted the pleasure of, and that God was unrighteous in thus taking vengeance, and could not justify it. See how wicked the reflection is, how daring the impudence; yet see how witty it is, and how sly the comparison. Many that are impious in their jeers, are ingenuous in their jests; and thus the malice of hell against God and religion is insinuated and propagated. It is here put into a proverb, and that proverb used, commonly used, they had it up ever and anon. And though it was only a prosaical saying, yet they sheltered themselves under it as a shield against the imputation of downright blasphemy. Now by this it appears that they were unhumbled under the rod, for, instead of condemning themselves and justifying God, they condemned him and justified themselves; but wo to him that thus strives with his Maker.

1. A just reproof of, and reply to, this proverb; What mean ye to use it? That is the reproof; "Do you intend hereby to try it out with God? Or can you think any other than that you will hereby provoke him to be angry with you till he has consumed you? Is this the way to reconcile yourselves to him, and make your peace with him?" The reply follows, in which God tells them,

1. That the use of the proverb should be taken away. This is said, it is sworn; (v. 3.) Ye shall not have occasion any more to use this proverb; or, as it may be read, Ye shall not have the use of this parable. The taking away of this parable is made the matter of a promise, Jer. xxxi. 29. Here it is made the matter of a threatening; there it intimates that God will pass the judgment of them in ways of mercy; here it intimates that God will pass the judgment of them in ways of judgment. He will so punish them for this impudent saying, that they shall not dare to use it any more; as in another case Jer. xxiii. 34,
36. God will find out effectual ways to silence those cavillers. Or, God will so manifest both to themselves and others that they have wickedness of their own enough to bring all these desolating judgments upon them, that they shall no longer for shame lay it upon the sins of their fathers that they were thus dealt with; for their own consciences shall tell them that the Lord deals with them as he ought; 'but you yourselves have eaten the same sour grapes that your fathers ate before you, or else your teeth had not been set on edge.'

2. That really the saying itself was unjust, and a causeless reflection upon God's government. For, (1.) God does not punish the children for their father's sins, unless they tread in their steps, and fill up their measure of sin, and then have no reason to complain, for, whatever they suffer, it is less than their own sin has deserved. And when God speaks of visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, that is so far from putting any hardship upon children, to whom he only renders according to their works, that it accounts for God's patience with the parents, whom he therefore does not punish immediately, because he lays up their iniquity for their children, Job xxii. 19. (2.) It is only in temporal calamities that children (and sometimes innocent ones) fare the worse for their parents' wickedness, and God can alter the property of those calamities, and make them work for good to those that are visited with them; but as to spiritual and eternal misery, (and that is the case here spoken of,) the children shall be by no means spared for the parents' sins. This is here showed at large; and it is a wonderful piece of censernescence, that the great God is pleased to reason the case with such wicked and unreasonable men, that he did not immediately strike them dumb or dead, but vouchsafed to state the matter before them, that he may be clear when he is judged.

[1.] He asserts and maintains his own absolute and incontestable sovereignty; Behold, all souls are mine, v. 4. God here claims a property in all the souls of the children of men, one as well as another; First, Souls are his. He that is the Maker of all things, is in a particular manner the Father of spirits, for his image is stamped on the souls of men; it was so in the creation. It is so in their regeneration, for the spirit of life is given him within him, and is therefore called the God of the spirits of all flesh, of embedded spirits. Secondly, All souls are his, all created by him and for him, and accountable to him. As the soul of the father, so the soul of the son, is mine. Our earthly parents are only the fathers of our flesh, our souls are not theirs, God challenges them. Now from hence it follows, for the clearing of this matter, that God may certainly do what he pleases both with fathers and children, and none may say unto him, What dost thou! He that gave us our being does us no wrong if he takes it away again, much less when he only takes away some of the supports and comforts of it; it is as absurd to quarrel with him as for the thing formed to say to him that formed it, Why hast thou made me thus? That God as certainly hears a good will both to father and son, and will put no hardship upon either. We are sure that God hates nothing that he has made, and therefore (speaking of the adult who are capable of acting for themselves) he has such a kindness for all souls, that none die but through their own default. All souls are his, and therefore he is not partial to any one for how they like themselves. God's affections do not subscribe to his interest in us, and dominion over us. He says, All souls are mine; let us answer, "Lord, my soul is thine, I devote it to thee to be employed for thee, and made happy in thee." It is with good reason that God says, "My son, give me thy heart, for it is my own;" to which we must yield; "Father, take my heart, it is thy own."

[2.] Though God might justify himself, by insisting upon his sovereignty, yet he waves that, and lays down the equitable and unexceptionable rule of judgment, by which he will proceed as to particular persons; and it is, First, That he persists in sin shall certainly die, his iniquity shall be his ruin. The soul that sins, it shall die, shall die as a soul can die, shall be excluded from the favour of God, which is the life and bliss of the soul, and shall lie for ever under his wrath, which is its death and misery. Sin is the act of the soul, the body is but the instrument of unrighteousness, it is called the sin of the body, Rom. vi. 21. And therefore the punishment of sin is the tribulation and anguish of the soul, Rom. i. 9. Secondly, The righteous man that perseveres in his righteousness, shall certainly live. If a man be just, have a good principle, a good spirit and disposition, and, as an evidence of that, do judgment and justice, (v. 5.) he shall surely live, saith the Lord God, v. 9. He that makes conscience of conforming himself in every thing to the will of God, that makes it his business to serve God, and his aim to glorify God, he shall without fail be happy here, and for ever in the love and favour of God; and wherein he comes short of his duty, it shall be forgiven him, through a Mediator.

Now here is part of the character of this just man. He is capable of making himself clean from the pollutions of sin, and at a distance from all the appearances of evil.

(1.) From sins against the second commandment. In the matters of God's worship he is jealous, for he knows God is so. He has not only not sacrificed in the high places to the images there set up, but he has not so much as eaten upon the mountains, not even any communion with idolaters by eating that was sacrificed to idols, 1 Cor. x. 20. He would not only not kneel with them at their altars, but not sit with them at their tables in their high places. He detests not only the idols of the heathen, but the idols of the house of Israel, which were not only allowed of, but generally applauded and adored, by those that were accounted the professing people of God. He has not only not worshipped those idols, but he has not so much as lifted up his eyes to them; he has not given them a favourable look, has had no regard at all to them, neither desired their favour, nor dreaded their frowns. He has observed so many bewitched by them, that he has not dared so much as to look at them, lest he should be taken in the snare. The eyes of idolaters are said to go a-moor- ing, Ezek. vi. 9. See Duit. iv. 19.

(2.) From sins against the seventh commandment. He is careful to possess his vessel in sanctification and honour, and not in the lusts of uncleanness; and therefore he has not dared to defile his neighbour's wife, nor said or done any thing which had the least tendency to corrupt or debauch her, no, nor will he make any undue approaches to his own wife when she is not with force and arms spoilt any by violence; not spoiled them of their goods or estates, much less of their liberties and lives, v. 7. Oppression and violence were the sins of the old world, that brought the deluge, and are sins of which still God is, and will be, the Avenger. Nay, he is one that has not lent his money upon usury, nor taken increase; (v. 8.) though, being done by contract, it may seem free from injustice, (Volent non fit injuria—What is done to a person with his own consent, is no injury to him,) yet, as far as it is forbidden by the law, he dares not do it. A moderate usury they were allowed to receive from strangers, but not from their brethren. A just man will not take advantage at his neighbour's necessity to make a prey of him, nor indulge himself in ease and idleness, to live upon the sweat and toil of others, and therefore will not make increase from those who cannot make increase of what they lend them; nor be rigorous in exacting what was agreed for from those who by the will of God are disabled to pay it, though he is willing to share in less as well as profits. Quis sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus.—He who enjoys the benefit, should bear the burthen.

2. He makes conscience of doing the duties of his place. He has restored the pledge to the poor debtor, according to the law, (Exod. xxii. 26.) “If thou take thy neighbour's raiment for a pawn, the raiment that is for necessary use, thou shalt deliver it to him again, that he may sleep in his own bedclothes.” Nay, he has not only restored to the poor that which was their own, but has given his bread to the hungry. Observe, It is called his bread, because it is honestly come by; that which is given to some, is not unjustly taken from others; for God has said, I hate robbery for burnt-offerings. Worldly riches are upon them that oppress, and the poor man is楠邦, who therefore would not give it to David; (1 Sam. xxvii. 11.) yet let them know that it is not so their own but that they are bound to do good to others with it. Clothes are necessary as well as food, and therefore this just man is so charitable as to cover the naked also with a garment, v. 7. The coats which Dorcas had made for the poor were not misused as witnesses of her charity. Acts ix. 39. This just man has withdrawn his hands from iniquity, (v. 8.) if at any time he has been drawn in through inadvertency to that which afterward has appeared to him to be a wrong thing, he does not persist in it, because he has begun it, but withdraws his hand from that which he now perceives to be iniquity, for he executes true judgment between himself and his neighbour. As he was not guilty in doing it; as a judge, as a witness, as a juryman, as a referee, and in all commerce, is concerned that justice be done, that no man be wronged, that he who is wronged be righted, and that every man have his own, and is ready to interpose himself, and do any good office, in order hereunto. This is his character toward his neighbour; yet it will not suffice that he be just and true to his brother, to complete his character, he must be so to his God likewise, v. 9.

He has walked in my statutes, those which relate to the duties of his immediate worship, he has kept those and all his other judgments, has had respect to them all, has made it his constant care and endeavour to conform to and come up to them all, to deal truly, that so he may approve himself faithful to his covenant with God, and, having famed himself to God, may not treacherously depart from him, or dissemble with him; this is a just man, and living he shall live; he shall certainly live, shall have life, and shall have it more abundantly; shall live truly, live comfortably, live eternally. Keep the commandments, and thou shalt enter into life, Matth. xix. 17.

10. If he begot a son that is a robber, a shedder of blood, and that doeth the like to any one of these things, 11. And that doeth not any of those duties, but even hath eaten upon the mountains, and defiled his neighbour's wife, 12. Hath oppressed the poor and needy, hath spoiled by violence, hath not restored the pledge, and hath lifted up his eyes to the idols, hath committed abomination, 13. Hath given forth upon usury, and hath taken increase: shall he then live? he shall not live: he hath done all those abominations; he shall surely die, his blood shall be upon him. 14. Now, lo, if he beget a son that seeth all his father's sins which he hath done, and considereth, and doeth not such like, 15. That hath not eaten upon the mountains, neither hath lifted up his eyes to the idols of the house of Israel, hath not defiled his neighbour's wife, 16. Neither hath oppressed any, hath not withheld the pledge, neither hath spoiled by violence, but hath given his bread to the hungry, and hath covered the naked with a garment, 17. That hath taken off his hand from the poor, that hath not received usury nor increase, hath executed my judgments, hath walked in my statutes; he shall not die for the iniquity of his father, he shall surely live. 18. As for his father, because he cruelly oppressed, spoiled his brother by violence, and did that which is not good among his people, lo, even he shall die in his iniquity. 19. Yet say ye, Why? doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? When the son hath done that which is lawful and right, and hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them, he shall surely live. 20. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father, neither shall the father bear the iniquity of the son; the righteousness of the righteous shall be upon him, and the wickedness of the wicked shall be upon him.

God, having laid down the prophet the general rule of judgment, that he will render eternal life to them that patiently continue in well-doing, but ing dallation and wrath to them that do not obey the truth, but obey unrighteousness, (Rom. ii. 7, 8.) comes, in these verses, to show that men's parentage and relation shall not alter the case either one way or other.

I. He applies it largely, and particularly, both ways. As it was in the royal line of the kings of Judah, so it often happens in private families, that goodly parents have wicked children, and wicked parents have godly children. Now here he shows, 1. That a wicked man shall certainly perish in his iniquity, though he was the son of a pious father. If that righteous man before described beget a son whose character is the reverse of his father's, his condition will certainly be so too. (1.) It is supposed, as no uncommon case, but a very melancholy one, that the child of a very godly father, notwithstanding all the instructions given him, the good education he has had, and the needful rebukes that have been given him, and the restraints he has been laid under, after all the pains taken with him, and prayers put up for him, may yet prove notoriously wicked and vile, the grief of his father, the shame of his family, and the curse and plague of his generation. He is here supposed to allow himself in all his excesses and enormities which his father had carefully avoided, and to shake off all those gross duties which his father made conscience of and took satisfaction in; he endeavors all that his father did, and goes counter to his example in every thing. He is here described to be a highwayman, a robber, and a shredder of blood; an idolater, he has eaten upon the mountains, (v. 11.) and has lifted up his eyes to the south, and has come at length not only to feast with the idolatrous but to sacrifice with them, which is here called committing abomination, for the way of sin is downhill. He is a adulterer, he has defiled his neighbour's wife; an oppressor even of the poor and needy, he robs the spital, and squeezes those who, he knows, cannot right themselves, and takes a pride and pleasure in tripping upon the weak, and impover-ishing those that are poor already. He takes away from those to whom he should give. He has stolen by violence and open force, he has given for-thorn upon usury, and so spoiled by contract; and has not restored the pledge, but unjustly detained it, even when the debt was paid. Let those good parents that have wicked children, not look upon their case as singular; it is a case put here; and by it we see how great the sin is, and the necessity of special good; nor is the race always to the swift, or the battle to the strong, for then the children that are well taught would do well, but God will let us know that his grace is his own, and his Spirit a free Agent, and that though we are tied to give our children a good education, he is not tied to bless it. In this, as much as any thing, appear the true grace of God and the necessity of special grace. (2.) We are here assured that this wicked man shall perish for ever in his iniquity, notwithstanding this being the son of a good father. He may perhaps prosper awhile in the world, for the sake of the pity of his ancestors, but, having committed all these abominations, and never repented of them, he shall not live, he shall not be happy in the favour of God; though he may escape
the sword of men, he shall not escape the curse of God, he shall surely die, he shall be for ever miserable; his blood shall be upon him, he may thank himself, he is his own destroyer; and his relation to a good father will be so far from standing him in stead, that it will aggravate his sin and his condemnation. It made his sin the more heinous, nay, it made him really the more vile and profligate, and,
certainty, will make his misery hereafter the more tolerable.

2. That a righteous man shall be certainly happy, though he is the son of a wicked father.

Though the father did eat the sour grapes, if the children do not meddle with them, they shall fare ever the worse for that. Here, (1.) It is supposed, and, blessed be God, it is sometimes true, that the son of an ungodly father may be godly; that, observing how fatal his father's errors were, he may be so wise as to take warning, and not tread in his father's steps, v. 14.
Ordinarily, children partake of the parents' temper, and are drawn in to imitate their example; but here the son, instead of seeing his father's sins, and,
though he sees, does not like, sees them, and dreads doing the like. If God sometimes does not unroll the fruit of the body, or grant the forms, but God sometimes does: take a branch
from a wild olive, and grafts it into one good Wicked Ahaz begets a good Hezekiah, who sees all his father's sins which he has done, and, though he will not, like Ham, proclaim his father's shame, or make the worse of it, yet he loathes it, and blushes
at it, and thinks the worse of sin because it was the reproach and ruin of his own father. He considers, and does not such like; he considers how ill it be came his father to do such things, what offence it was to God and all good men, what a wondrous dishonour he gets by it, and, consequently, he brought into his family, and therefore he does not such like. Note. If we did but duly consider the ways of wicked men, we should all dread being associates with them, and followers of them. The particulars here are again enumerated almost in the same words with that character given of the just man, (v. 6, &c.) to whom guiltily were made weak in the day of his spirit, so as not to remember his sin. Thus described, he was, when he took care to avoid his father's sins, took care to imitate his grandfather's virtues; and if we look back, we shall find some examples for our imitation, as well as others for our admonition. This just man cannot only say, as the Pharisee, I am no adulterer, no extortioner, no oppressor, no usurer, no
idolater; but he has given his bread to the hungry,
and covered the naked; he has taken off his hand
from the poor; where he found his father had put hardships upon poor servants, tenants, neighbours, he eased their burthen; he did not say, "What my father has done I will abide by, and if it was a fault it was his, and not mine;" as Rechoboam, who continued the taxes his father had imposed: no,
he takes his hand off from the poor, and restores the property. Thus he has executed God's judgments, and walked in his statutes, not only done his duty for once,
but gone on in a course and way of obedience.

(2.) We are assured that the graceless father alone shall die in his iniquity, but his gracious son shall fare never the worse for it. As for his father,
(v. 18.) because he was a cruel oppressor, and did hurt, may, because, though he had wealth and power, he did not with it do good among his people;
no, even he, great as he is, shall die in his iniquity,
and be undone for ever; but he that kept his intei-guity shall surely live, shall be easy and happy, and he shall not die for the iniquity of his father.
Perhaps his father's wickedness has lessened his estate,
and weakened his interest, but it shall be no prejuicice at all to his acceptance with God and his eternal welfare.

II. He appeals to themselves then, whether they did not wrong God with their pravert. Thus plain the case is, and yet we say, Does not the son bear the iniquity of the father? No, he does not; he shall not if he will himself do that which is lawful and right, v. 19. But this people that bare the iniquity of their fathers, had not done that which is lawful and right, and therefore must answer for their own sin, and had no reason to complain of God's proceedings against them as at all unjust, though they had reason to complain of the bad example their fathers had left them as very unkind. Our fathers have sinned, and are not, and we have borne their iniquity, Lam. v. 7. It is true that there is a curse entailed upon wicked Families, but this is true only as it appears from the consequence and reform; let the impenitent and un-reformed therefore thank themselves if they fall under it. The settled rule of judgment is therefore repeated; (v. 20.) The soul that sinneth, it shall die, and not another for it. What direction God has given to earthly judges, (Deut. xxiv. 16.) he will himself pursue; The son shall not die, not die eternally, for the iniquity of his father, but shall be in the steps of it, nor the father for the iniquity of the son, if he endeavour to do his duty for the preventing of it. In the day of the revelation of the righteous judgment of God, which is 'now clouded'
and eclipsed, the righteousness of the righteous shall appear before all the world, to be upon him to his everlasting comfort and honour, upon him as a robe, upon him as a crown; and the wickedness of
21. But if the wicked will turn from all his sins that he hath committed, and keep all my statutes, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall surely live; he shall not die. 22. All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him: in his righteousness that he hath done, he shall live. 23. Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? saith the Lord God; and not that he should return from his ways, and live? 24. But when the righteous turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and doeth according to all the abominations that the wicked man doeth, shall he live? All his righteousness that he hath done shall not be mentioned: in his trespass, that he hath trespassed, and in his sin that he hath sinned, in them shall he die. 25. Yet ye say, 'The way of the Lord is not equal.' Hear now, O house of Israel, is not my way equal? are not your ways unequal? 26. When a righteous man turneth away from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, and dieth in them; for his iniquity that he hath done, he shall die. 27. Again, when the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness that he hath committed, and doeth that which is lawful and right, he shall save his soul alive. 28. Because he considereth, and turneth away from all his transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live, he shall not die. 29. Yet saith the house of Israel, The way of the Lord is not equal. O house of Israel, are not my ways equal? are not your ways unequal?

We have here another rule of judgment which God will go by in dealing with us, by which is farther demonstrated the equity of his government. The former showed that God will reward or punish according to the change made in the family or succession, for the better or for the worse; here it shows that he will reward or punish according to the change made in the persons, whether for the better or for the worse. While we live in this world, we are in a state of probation; the time of trial lasts as long as the time of life, and according as we are found at last, it will be with us to eternity.

Now see here,

1. The case fairly stated, much of it had been before; (ch. iii. 18, &c.) and here it is laid down once, v. 21—25, and again, v. 26—28, because it is a matter of very importance, a matter of life and death, of life and death eternal. Here we have,

a. A fair invitation given to wicked people, to turn from their wickedness. Assurance is here given us, that if the wicked will turn, he shall surely live, v. 21, 27. Observe, (1.) What is required to denominate a man a true convert; how he must be qualified, that he may be entitled to this act of indemnity. (2.) The first step toward conversion is consideration; (v. 28.) Because he considers, and turns. The reason why sinners go on in their evil ways is, because they do not consider what will be in the end thereof; but if the prophet once come to himself, if he looketh down, and consider a little how bad his state is, and how easily it may be turned, he will soon return to his father, (Luke xv. 17.) and the adulteress to her first husband, when she considers that then it was better with her than now, Hos. ii. 7. (2.) This consideration must produce an aversion to sin. When he considers he must turn away from his wickedness, that denotes a change in the heart; he must turn from his sin, that denotes a change in the life; he must break off from all his evil courses, and, wherein he has done iniquity, must resolve to do so no more, and this from a principle of hatred to sin. What have I to do any more with idols? (3.) This aversion to sin must be universal; he must turn from all his sins and all his transgressions, without a reserve for any Deliah, any house of Rimmon. We cannot rightly turn from sin, unless we truly hate it, and we do not truly hate sin, as sin, if we do not hate all sin. (4.) This must be accompanied with a conversion to God and duty; he must keep all God's statutes, (for the obedience, if it be sincere, will be universal,) and must do that which is lawful and right, which agrees with the word and will of God, which we must turn to, and live by, and not the wills of the flesh, and the way of the world.

2. What is promised to those that do thus turn from sin to God. (1.) They shall save their souls alive, v. 27. They shall surely live, they shall not die, (v. 21.) and again, (v. 28.) whereas it was said, The soul that sineth shall die, yet let not those that have sinned despair but the threatened death be prevented, if they will but turn from sin in time. When David penitently acknowledges, I have sinned, he is immediately assured of his pardon; "The Lord has taken away the sin, thou shalt not die, (2 Sam. xii. 13.) then shall not die eternally." He shall surely live; he shall be restored to the favour of God, which is the life of the soul, and shall not lie under his wrath, which is as messengers of death to the soul. (2.) The sins they have repented of, and forsaken, shall not rise up in judgment against them, nor shall they be so much as upbraided with them; All his transgressions that he has committed, though numerous, though heinous, though very provoking to God, and redeeming very much to his dishonour, yet they are not mentioned against him, (v. 22.) not mentioned against him; not only they must not be imputed to him to ruin him, but in the great day they shall not be remembered against him to grieve or shame him; they shall be covered, shall be sought for, and not found. This speaks the fulness of pardoning mercy; when sin is forgiven, it is blot out, it is remembered no more. (3.) In their righteousness, as if that were the principal object of their promise, and bliss, and an atonement for their sins, but in their righteousness, which qualifies them for all the blessings purchased by the Mediator, and is itself one of those blessings.

3. What encouragement a repenting, returning sinner has to hope for pardon and life according to all that was promised, his confidence that his obedience for the future can never be a vain and empty compensation for his former disobedience; but he has this to support himself with, that God's nature, property, and delight, is to have mercy and to forgive, for he has said, (v. 23.) Have I any pleasure at all that the wicked should die? No, by means, you never had any cause given you to think so. It is true, God has determined to punish sinners, his justice calls for it, and, pursuant to that,
impeccant sinners will lie for ever under a wrath and curse; that is the will of his decree; his consequent will, but it is not his antecedent will, the will of his delight; though the righteousness of his government requires that sinners die, yet the goodness of his nature objects against it; How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? It is spoken here comparatively; he has no pleasure in the ruin of sinners, for he would rather they should turn from their ways and live, for he contends that his mercy is glorified in their salvation, than when his justice is glorified in their damnation.

2. A warning given to righteous people, not to turn from their righteousness, v. 24.-26. Here is, (1.) The character of an apostate, that turns away from his righteousness; he never was in sincerity a righteous man, (as appears by that of the apostate, (1 John ii. 19.) If they had been men, they would, no doubt, have continued with us;) but he passed for a righteous man, had the denomination and all the external marks of a righteous man, he thought himself one, and others thought him one, but he throws off his profession, leaves his first love, disowns and forsakes the truth and ways of God, and so turns away from his righteousness as one sick, and wastes and ruins himself. (2.) The doom of an apostate; Shall he live because he was once a righteous man? No, Factum non dictur good non perseveret—That which does not abide, is not said to be done. In his trespass, (v. 24.) and for his iniquity, (that is the meritorious cause of his ruin,) for the iniquity that he has done, he shall die, shall die eternally, v. 26. The backslider in heart shall be filled with his own ways. But will not his former professions and performances stand him in some stead—will they not avail at least to mitigate his punishment? No, All his righteousness that he has done, though ever so much applauded by men, shall not be mentioned so as to be either a credit or a comfort to him; the righteousness of an apostate is forgotten, as the wind吹 about a lamp, and it is extinguished. Under the law, the Nazarite was polluted he lost all his foregoing days of his separation, (Numb. vi. 12;) so that those who have begun in the spirit and end in the flesh, may reckon all their past services and sufferings in vain; (Gal. iii. 3, 4;) unless we persevere we lose what we have gained, 2 John viii.

II. An appeal to the conscience of every one of the house of Israel, through very proper warnings; concerning God's equity in all these proceedings; for he will be justified, as well as sinners judged, out of their own mouths. 1. The charge they drew up against God is blasphemous, v. 25, 29. The house of Israel has the impudence to say, The way of the Lord is not equal; than which nothing could be more absurd as well as impious. He that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that fashioneth the heart, shall he not understand? Under the law the external rule of good and evil, right and wrong? Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? No doubt, he shall; he cannot do otherwise. 2. God's reasonings with them are very gracious and condescending, for even these blasphemies God would rather have convinced and saved than condemned. One would have expected that God should have imprecated a greater punishment on the man of his own house, making those that imprecated it eternal monuments of it. Must these be suffered to draw another breath, that have once breathed out such wickedness as this? Shall that tongue ever speak again and threaten sinners, or be in hell, that has once said, The ways of the Lord are not equal? Yes, because this is the day of God's patience, he vouchsafes to give them up, and he requires them to own it, for it is so plain, that they cannot deny, (1.) The equity of his ways; Are not my ways equal? No doubt they are. He never lays upon man more than is right. In the present punishments of sinners and the afflictions of his own people, yes, and in the eternal damnation of the impenitent, The ways of the Lord are not equal. (2.) The iniquity of their ways; Are not your ways unequal? It is plain that they are, and the troubles you are in you have brought upon your own heads. God does you no wrong, but you have wronged yourselves. The foolishness of man perverts his way, makes that unequal, and then his heart frets against the Lord, as if his ways were unequal, Prov. xix. 3. In all our disputes with God, in all his controversies with us, it will be found that his ways are equal, but ours are unequal, that he is in the right, and we are in the wrong.

30. Therefore I will judge you, O house of Israel, every one according to his ways, saith the Lord God. Repent, and turn yourselves from all your transgressions; so iniquity shall not be your ruin. 31. Cast away from you all your transgressions, whereby ye have transgressed; and make you a new heart and a new spirit: for why will ye die, O house of Israel? 32. For I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God: wherefore turn yourselves, and live ye.

We have here the conclusion and application of this whole matter. After a fair trial at the bar of right reason, the verdict is brought in on God's side, it appears that his ways are equal; judgment therefore is next to be given; and one would think it should be a judgment of condemnation, nothing short of Go, ye cursed, into everlasting fire; but behold a miracle of mercy; the day of grace and divine patience is yet lengthened out; and therefore, though God will at last judge every one according to his own ways, yet he will not cast away the soul that is gracious, and closes all with a call to repentance, and a promise of pardon upon repentance.

1. Here are four necessary duties that we are called to; all amounting to the same. (1.) We must repent; we must change our mind, and change our ways; we must be sorry for what we have done amiss, and ashamed of it, and go as far as we can toward the putting it away again. (2.) We must turn ourselves from all our transgressions, (v. 30.) and again, v. 32. Turn yourselves, face about; turn from sin, may, turn against it as the enemy you hate, turn to God as the Friend you love. (3.) We must cast away from us all our transgressions, we must abandon and forsake them with a resolution never to return to them again; give sin a bill of divorce, break all the leagues we have made with it, throw it overboard, as the mariners did Jonah, for it has raised the storm; cast it out of the soul, and crucify it, as a malefactor. (4.) We must make us a new heart, and a new spirit. This was the matter of a promise, ch. xi. 19. here it is the matter of a precept; we must do our endeavour, and then God will not be wanting to us to give us his grace. So must well explain this precept: Because thou jument non impossibile, sed jubendo monet et facere good fossis, et petere good non fossis—God does not exjoin impossibilities, but by his commands admonishes
Here are,

1. Orders given to the prophet to bewail the fall of the royal family, which had long made so great a figure by virtue of a covenant of royalty made with David and his seed, so that the eclipsing and extinguishing of it are justly lamented by all who know what value to put upon the covenant of our God:

Then I went and sat down in a plain place; and, behold, one stood by me, as the appearance of meat, and it said to me, What seest thou? And I answered him, I see a thing: a bullock which eateth grass; and an oxide of iron, which watereth it. Then said he to me, What meanest thou by this bullock which eateth grass? So I answered, What be these, my lord? Then he said unto me, These also be the bullocks which sow the field, and gather the food thereof. And he said, What meanest thou by this stone, which I see? And I answered, What be these, my lord? Then said he unto me, These are the heads of the mountains which shall be given unto thee for the bullocks. And he said, What be they that are come hither to thee? I answered, They be they that come down from the north with the voice of singing to prophesy in the temple. Then said he unto me, What seest thou? And I answered, I see two baskets standing before the temple; the one full of fresh bread, and the other empty. Then said he unto me, Whose are these, the one full and the other empty? And I said, They be the Lord's. And he said, The word of the Lord unto Zerubbabel, saying, Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts. The cities of the south shall be full of the wealth of the cities of the north, and the wealth of the south shall be filled with the wealth of the south. Thus saith the Lord of hosts, as he hath spoken concerning me; saying, Behold, the man whose house is the sanctuary, and shall come to me as a people that do righteousness; and as a people that seek me with all their heart; and as to walk in my statutes, and to keep my judgments, and to do them. And ye have broken the yoke of my百姓, and have cast off the yoke of my servants.

II. Instructive application may be thus:

1. He must compare the kingdom of Judah to a lioness; so wretchedly degenerated was it from what it had been formerly, when it sat as a queen among the nations, v. 2. What is thy mother? Thine, O king? We read of Solomon's crown wherewith his mother crowned him, his people, Cant. iii. 11. Thine, O Judah! The royal family is as a mother to the kingdom, a mother of its whelps, fierce, and cruel, and ravenous. When they had left their divinity, they soon lost their humanity too; and when they feared not God, neither did they regard man. She lay down among lions; God had said, The people shall dwell alone, but they mingled themselves with the nations, and learned their works. She nourished her whelps among young lions, taught the young princes the way of tyrants, which was then used by the arbitrary kings of the east, filled their heads betimes with notions of their absolute, despotic power, and possessed them with a belief that they had a right to enslave their subjects, that their liberty and property lay at their mercy: thus she nourished her whelps among young lions.

2. He must compare the kings of Judah to lions' whelps, v. 3. For he had compared withal, the weak and the desolate house of David, to a lion's whelp, for its being strong and formidable to its enemies abroad; (Gen. xliv. 9.) He is an old lion, who shall stir him up? And if they had adhered to the divine law and promise, God had preserved to them the high, and majesty, and dominion of a lion; and does it in Christ, the Lion of the tribe of Judah; but these lions' whelps have been weak and tender, cruel and oppressive to them, preyed upon their estates and liberties; and when they thus by their tyrannism made themselves a terror to these whom they ought to have protected, it was just with God to make those a terror to them, whom otherwise they might have subdued. Here is lamented.

1. The sin and fall of Jehovah, one of the whelps of this lioness. He became a young lion, EZEKIEL, XIX.

v. 3.) he was made king, and thought he was made so that he might do what he pleased, and gratify his own ambition, conceit, and revenge, as he had a mind; and so he was soon master of all the arts of tyranny, he learned to catch the prey, and devour men; when he got power in his hand, all that had before in any thing disobliged him were made to feel his resentments, and become a sacrifice to his rage. But what were the effects of his wickedness and pride in the land? the nations heard of him, (v. 4.) heard how furiously he drove, at his first coming to the crown, how he trampled upon all that is just and sacred, and violated all his engagements, so that they looked upon him as a dangerous neighbour, and prosecuted him accordingly, as a multitude of shepherds is called forth against a lion roaring on his prey, Isa. xxvi. 5. And he was taken, as a beast of prey, in the forest. His own subjects durst not stand up in defence of their own liberties, but God raised up a foreign power that soon put an end to his tyranny, and brought him in chains to the land of Egypt. Thither Jehoahaz was carried captive, and never heard of more.

(2.) The like sin and fall of his successor Jehoiakim. The kingdom of Judah for some time exercised a certain authority over Egypt, but a length despaired of it, and then took another of the lion's whelps, and made him a young lion, v. 5. And he, instead of taking warning by his brother's fate to use his power with equity and moderation, and to seek the good of his people, trod in his brother's steps: he went up and down among the lions, v. 6. He consulted and conversed with those that were base and luxurious; he enriched himself, and took his measures from them, as Rehoboam took the advice of the rash and hot-headed young men; and so he soon learned to catch the prey, and he devoured men, (v. 6.) he seized his subjects' estates, fined and imprisoned them, filled his treasury by rapine and injustice, sequestrations and confiscations, fines and forfeitures, and swallowed up all that stood in his way; he had got the art of discovering what effects men had, that lay concealed, and where the treasures were, which they had hoarded up; he knew their desolate places, (v. 7.) where they hid their money, and sometimes hid themselves; he knew where to find both out; and by his oppression he laid waste their cities, depopulated them by forcing the inhabitants to remove their families; he reduced the country to desolation, and the country villages were deserted; and though there was great plenty, and a fulness of all good things, yet people quitted it all for fear of the voice of his roaring. He took a pride in making all his subjects afraid of him, as the lion makes all the beasts of the field to tremble, (Amos iii. 8.) and by his terrible roaring so astonished them, that they fell down for fear, and did not stir or venture to make their escape, became an easy prey to him, as they say the lions do. He hector'd, and threatened, and talked big, and bullied people out of what they had. Thus he thought to have established his own power, but it had a contrary effect, it did but hasten his own ruin; (v. 8.) The nations set against him on every side, to restrain and reduce his exorbitant powers to some place of safety. He made his people so afraid of him, that they longed for a change, and would fain have gone out of his land, and made their common safety; and they spread their net over him, formed designs against him. God brought against Jehoiakim bands of the Syrians, Moabites, and Ammonites, with the Chaldees, (2 Kings xxiv. 2.) and he was taken in their pit. Nebuchadnezzar bound him in fetters to carry him to Babylon, 2 Chron. xxxvi. 6. They put this lion within grates, bound him with a chain, and carried him all the way to Babylon, v. 9. What became of him we know not, but his voice was no where heard roaring upon the mountains of Israel. There was an end of his tyranny; he was buried with the burial of an ass, (Jer. xxii. 19.) though he had been as a lion, the terror of the mighty in the land of the living. Note, The righteousness of God is to be acknowledged when those who have terrified and enslaved others are themselves terrified and enslaved; when those who by the abuse of their power to destruction which was given them for education, make themselves wild beasts, as roaring lions and ravenous beasts, (Gen. xlix.,) Solomon says a mankind are over the poor people, Prov. xxviii. 15.) are treated as such; when those who, like Ishmael, have taken hand against every man, come at last to have every man's hand against them. It was long since observed that bloody tyrants seldom die in peace, but have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy.

Ad generum Semitis sine cæde et singulino pædi—

Descendit reges et aetae morte tyrannorum—

How few of all the beautiful men, that reign,

Descend in peace to Pluto's dark domain!—Jev.

10. Thy mother is like a vine in thy blood, planted by the waters; she was fruitful, and full of branches, by reason of many waters.

11. And she had strong rods for the sceptres of them that bare rule, and her stature was exalted among the thick branches, and she appeared in her height with the multitude of her branches. 12. But she was plucked up in fury, she was cast down to the ground, and the east wind dried up her fruit; her strong rods were broken and withered, the fire consumed them. 13. And now she is planted in the wilderness, in a dry and thirsty ground. 14. And fire is gone out of a rod of her branches, which hath devoured her fruit, so that she hath no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule. This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation.

Jerusalem, the mother-city, is here represented by another similitude; she is a vine, and the princes are her branches. This comparison we had before, ch. xxv.

1. Jerusalem is as a vine; the Jewish nation is so; like a vine in the blood, (v. 10.) the blood royal; like a vine in the blood royal; and so the vine which contributes very much to the flourishing and fruitfulness of vines, as if the blood which had been shed had been designed for the fattening and improving of the soil; in such plenty it was shed: and for a time it seemed to have that effect, for she was fruitful and full of branches, by reason of the waters, the many waters near which she was planted. But branches of great wickedness may prosper for a while, and a vine set in blood may be full of branches. Jerusalem was full of able magistrates, men of sense, men of learning and experience, that were strong rods, branches of this vine, of uncommon bulk and strength; or, poles for the support of this vine; for such magistrates are. The boughs of this vine were grown to such maturity, that they were fit to make use of, and to depend for the support of them that bare rule, v. 11. And they are strong rods only that are fit for sceptres, men of strong judgments and strong resolutions, that are fit for magistrates. When the royal family of Judah was numerous, and the courts of justice filled with men of sense and probity, then Jerusalem's stature was exalted among thick branches; when the government is in able hands, a nation is thereby made considerable. Then she was not taken for a weak and lowly vine, but she appeared in her height, a distinguished city, with the multitude of her branched; Tannum lenta solert inter vithuna cu-

pressii—Midst humble withthes the cyrusssoars.
In thy quietness; so some read that, vi. 10. which we translate, in thy blood, thou wast such a vine as this.
This Zebediah was quiet and easy under the king of Babylon's yoke, his kingdom flourished thus.
See how slow God is to anger, how he defers
his judgments, and waits to be gracious.
This was the golden days of Nebuchadnezzar—being highly provoked by Zebediah's treachery, plucked it up in fury, (v. 12.) ruined the city and kingdom, and cut off all the branches of the royal family that fell in his way.
The vine was cut off close to the ground, though not plucked up by the roots; the east and dried up the fruit that was blasted, the young people fell by the sword, or were carried into captivity. The aspect of it had nothing that was pleasing, the prospect nothing that was promising. Her strong rods were broken and withered, her great men were cut off, judges and magistrates deposed; the vine itself is planted in the wilderness, v. 13. Babylon was as a wilderness to these of the people that were carried captives thither; the land of Judah as was a wilderness wherein he said that the Chaldeans ravaged and laid waste by the Chaldean army; a fruitless land turned into barrenness. It is burnt with fire, (Ps. lxxx. 16.) and that fire is gone out of a rod of her branches; (v. 14.) the king himself, by rebelling against the king of Babylon, has given occasion to all this mischief; she may thank herself for the fire that consumes her; she may thank herself, in some respects, made herself like tinder to the sparks of God's wrath, so that her own branches serve as fuel for her own consumption; in them the fire is kindled, which devoured the fruit, the sins of the elder being the judgments which destroy the younger; her fruit is burned with her own branches, so that she has no strong rod to be a sceptre to rule, none to be found now that are fit for the government, or dare take this ruind under their hand, as the context implies; (Isa. iii. 6, 7.) none of the house of David left, that have a right to rule, no wise men, or men of sense, that are able to rule. It goes ill with any state, and is like to go worse, when it is thus deprived of the blessings of government, and has no strong rods for scepters. 'Who unto thee, O land, when the king is gone in for it is all gone in; when it has no rod, nor a strong rod. Those strong rods, we have reason to fear, had been instruments of oppression, assistant to the king in catching the prey, and devouring men, and now they are destroyed with him. Tyranny is the inlet to anarchy; and when the red of government is turned into the serpent of oppression, it is just with God to say, "There shall be no strong rod to be an acceptance to rule; but let men be as the fishes of the sea, where the greater devour the lesser." Note, This is a lamentation, and shall be for a lamentation. The prophet was bidden, (v. 1.) to take up a lamentation; and having done so, he leaves it to be made use of by others. "It is a lamentation to us of this age, and, the desolations continuing long; it shall be for a lamentation to those that shall come after; the child nuborn will see the destruction made of Judah and Jerusalem by the present judgments. They were a great while in coming, the bow was long in the drawing; but now that they are come, they will continue, and the sad effects of them will be entailed upon posterity." Note, Those who fill up the measure of their fathers' sins, are laying up in store for their children's sorrows, and furnishing them with matter for lamentation; and nothing is more than the overthrow of government.

CHAP. XX.
In this chapter, 1. The prophet is consulted by some of the elders of Israel, v. 1. 11. He is instructed by his God what answer to give them. He must, 1. Signify God's displeasure against them, v. 2, 3. And, 2. He must show them what just cause he had for that displeasure; by giving them a history of God's grateful dealings with their fathers, and their treacherous dealings with God, (1.) In Egypt; v. 5—9. (2.) In the wilderness, v. 10—26, (3.) In Canaan, v. 27—32. (4.) He must dem-ounce the judgments of God against them, v. 33—38. (5.) He must show them like to that mercy God had in store for them, when he would bring a remnant of them to repentance, re-establish them in their own land, and set up his sanctuary among them again, v. 37—44. (6.) Here is another word dropped toward Jerusalem, which is explained and enlarged upon in the next chapter, v. 45—49.

1. AND it came to pass in the seventh year, in the fifth month, the tenth day of the month, that certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the Lord, and sat before me. 2. Then came the word of the Lord unto me, saying, 3. Son of man, speak unto the elders of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Are ye come to inquire of me? As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you. 4. Wilt thou judge them, son of man? wilt thou judge them? cause them to know the abominations of their fathers.

Here is, 1. The occasion of the message which we have in this chapter. That section which we had, ch. xviii., was occasioned by their presumptuous reflections upon God; this was occasioned by their hypocritical inquiries after him. God shall have his own. This prophecy is exactly dated in the seventh year of the captivity, about two years after Ezekiel began to prophesy. God would have them to keep count how long their captivity lasted, that they might see how the years went on toward their deliverance, though very slowly. Certain of the elders of Israel came to inquire of the Lord, not statedly. (as these, ch. xiii. 1.) but, as it should seem, occasionally, and upon a particular emergence. Whether they were of those that were now in captivity, or elders lately come from Jerusalem upon business to Babylon, is not certain; but by what the prophet says to them, (v. 32.) it should seem, their inquiry was, whether now that they were captives in Babylon, at a distance from their country, they would be allowed no temple, but no synagogue, for the worship of God, it was not lawful for them, that they might ingratiate themselves with their lords and masters, to join with them in their worship, and do as the families of these countries do, that serve wood and stone. This matter was palliated as well as it would bear, like Nonius's intending with a bow to bow in the loc. Dr. Rimbault, in compliment to the king; but we have reason to suspect that their inquiry drove at this. Note, Those hearts are wretchedly hardened which ask God leave to go on in sin, and that when they are suffering for it. They came and saw very demurely, and with a show of devotion, before the prophet, ch. xxxiii. 31.

2. The substance of this chapter. (1.) They must be made to know that God is angry with them; he takes it as an affront that they are come to inquire of him, when they are resolved to go on still in their trespasses; As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you. v. 3. Their shows of devotion shall be neither acceptable to God nor advantageous to themselves. God will not take notice of their inquiries, nor give them any satisfactory answers. Note, A hypocritical attendance on God and his ordinances is so far from being pleasing to him, that it is provoking.
(2.) They must be made to know that God is justly angry with them; (v. 4.) "Will thou judge them, son of man, when the most righteous art given to the wicked? And therefore wilt thou not plead for them: as an intercessor with God; but surely thou wilt pass sentence on them as a judge for God. See, I have set thee over the nation; wilt thou not declare to them the judgments of the Lord? Cause them therefore to know the abominations of their fathers."

So the orders run now, as before, ch. xvi. 2. He must cause them to know their own abominations. Though their own abominations were sufficient to justify God in the severest of his proceedings against them, yet it would be of use for them to know the abominations of their fathers; that they might see what a righteous thing it was with God now at last to cut them off from being a people, who from the first were such a provoking people.

5. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, In the day when I chose Israel, and lifted up my hand unto the seed of the house of Jacob, and made myself known unto them in the land of Egypt, when I lifted up my hand unto them, saying, I am the Lord your God; 6. In the day that I lifted up my hand unto them, to bring them forth of the land of Egypt into a land that I had espied for them, flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands; 7. Then said I unto them, Cast ye away every man the abominations of his eyes, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt: I am the Lord your God. 8. But they rebelled against me, and would not hearken unto me: they did not every man cast away the abominations of their eyes, neither did they forsake the idols of Egypt: then said I, I will pour out my fury upon them, to accomplish mine anger against them in the midst of the land of Egypt.

9. But I wrought for my name's sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, among whom they were, in whose sight I made myself known unto them, in bringing them forth out of the land of Egypt.

The history of the ingratitude and rebellion of the people of Israel here begins as early as their beginning; so does the history of man's apostasy from his Maker. No sooner have we read the story of our first parents' creation, than we immediately meet with their rebellion; and we likewise find, (v. 1.) that the house of Jacob, a people designed to represent the body of mankind, both in their dealings with God, and his with them. Here is,

1. The gracious purposes of God's law concerning Israel in Egypt, where they were bond-slaves to Pharaoh. Be it spoken, be it written, to the immortal honour of free grace, that then and there, (1.) He chose Israel to be his name, to be the glory of his people, to be a gracious name, though their condition was bad, and their character worse, that he might have the honour of mending both. He therefore chose them, because they were the seed of the house of Jacob, the posterity of that prince with God, that he might keep the oath which he had sworn unto their fathers, Deut. vii. 8. (2.) He made himself known to them, by his name Jehovah, (a new name, Exod. vi. 3.;) when by reason of their servitude they had almost lost the knowledge of that name by which he was known to their fathers, God Almighty.

As for liberty, they was already in God's choosing us, so the first step was sure; he made himself known to us. And whatever distance we are at, whatever distress we are in, he that made himself known to Israel even in the land of Egypt, can find us out, and follow us with the gracious discoveries and manifestations of his favour. (3.) He made over himself to them as their judge in covering up my head against them, saying it, and confirming it with an oath, "I am the Lord your God, to whom you are to pay your homage, and from whom and in whom you are to expect your bliss." (4.) He promised to bring them out of Egypt; and made good what he promised. He lifted up his hand, that is, he swore unto them, that he would deliver them; and they being very unworthy, and their deliverance very unlikely, it was requisite that the promise of it should be confirmed by an oath. Or, He lifted up his hand, that is, he put forth his almighty power to do it; he did it with an outstretched arm, Ps. cxxxvi. 12. (5.) He assured them that he would put them in possession of the land of Canaan. He therefore brought them out of Egypt, that he might bring them into Egypt that he might bring them into a second garden of Eden, which was the glory of all lands; so he found it, the climate temperate, the soil fruitful, the situation pleasant, and every thing agreeable, Deut. viii. 7.—xi. 12. However, so he made it, by setting up his sanctuary in it.

2. The reasonable commands he gave them, and the easy conditions of his covenant with them at that time; having told them what they might expect from him, he next tells them what he was to expect from them; it was no more than this, (v. 7.) Cast ye away every man his images that he uses for worship, that are the adorations, but should be the abominations, of his eyes. Let him abominate them, and put them out of his sight, and defile not yourselves with the idols of Egypt. Of these, it seems, many of them were fond; the golden calf was one of them. It was just, and what might reasonably be expected, that, being delivered from the Egyptian slavery, they would quit the Egyptian idolatry; especially when God, at bringing them out, executed judgment upon the gods of Egypt. (Numb. xxxiii. 4.) and thereby showed himself above them. And whatever other idols they might have an inclination to, one would think they should be of the most easy to be cut off from. For, whatever the Egyptian's sake, which had been to them a house of bondage. Yet, it seems, they needed this caution, and it is backed with a good reason, I am the Lord your God, who neither need an assistant, nor will admit a rival.

3. Their unreasonable disobedience to these commands, for which God might justly have cut them off, as soon as he gave them their liberty. (v. 8.) They rebelled against God; not only refused to comply with his particular precepts, but shocked off their allegiance, and in effect told him that they would be at liberty to worship what god they pleased. And even then when God came down to deliver them, and sent Moses for that purpose, yet they would not forsake the idols of Egypt; which perhaps was his design, to prove the effects of his influence upon the Egyptians, (Numb. xi. 5.) for among other things the Egyptians worshipped an onion. It was strange that all the plagues of Egypt would not prevail to cure them of their affection to the idols of Egypt. For this, God said he would pour out his fury upon them, even while they were yet in the midst of the land of Egypt. Justly might he have said, "Let them die with the Egyptians." This magnifies the riches of God's goodness, that he was pleased to work so great a salvation for them, even then when he saw them ripe for ruin. Well might Moses tell them, It is not for your righteousness, Deut. ix. 4, 5.

4. The wonderful deliverance which God wrought for them, notwithstanding. Though they forfeited the favour while it was in the bestowing, and when God would have healed them, then their unfaith was discovered, (Hos. vii. 1.) yet mercy refrained against judgment, and God did what he designed, purely for his own name’s sake, ver. 9. When nothing in us will furnish him with a reason for his favours, he furnishes himself with one. God made himself known to them in the sight of the heathen, when he ordered Moses publicly to say to Pharaoh, Israel is my son, my first-born, let them go, that they may serve me. Now if it chance we have led them to perish for their wickedness as they deserved, the Egyptians would have reflected upon him for it, and his name would have been polluted, which ought to be sanctified, and shall be so. Note, The church is secured, even when it is corrupt, because God will secure his own honour.

10. Wherefore I caused them to go forth out of the land of Egypt, and brought them into the wilderness: 11. And I gave them my statutes, and shewed them my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them. 12. Moreover also, I gave them my sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them. 13. But the house of Israel rebelled against me in the wilderness: they walked not in my statutes, and they despised my judgments, which if a man do, he shall even live in them; and my sabbaths they greatly polluted: then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them in the wilderness, to consume them. 14. But I wrought for my name’s sake, that it should not be polluted before the heathen, in whose sight I brought them out. 15. Yet also I lift up my hand unto them in the wilderness, that I would not bring them into the land which I had given them, flowing with milk and honey, which is the glory of all lands; 16. Because they despised my judgments, and walked not in my statutes, but polluted my sabbaths: for their hearts were after their idols. 17. Nevertheless mine eye spared them from destroying them, neither did I make an end of them in the wilderness. 18. But I said unto their children in the wilderness, Walk ye not in the statutes of your fathers, neither observe their judgments, nor defile yourselves with their idols. 19. I am the Lord your God; walk in my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; 20. And hallow my sabbaths: and they shall be a sign between me and you, that ye may know that I am the Lord your God. 21. Notwithstanding the children rebelled against me: they walked not in my statutes, neither kept my judgments to do them, which if a man do, he shall even live in them; they polluted my sabbaths: then I said, I would pour out my fury upon them, to accomplish mine anger against them in the wilderness. 22. Nevertheless I withdrew my hand, and wrought for my name’s sake, that it should not be polluted in the sight of the heathen, in whose sight I brought them forth. 23. I lifted up my hand unto them also in the wilderness, that I would scatter them among the heathen, and disperse them through the countries; 24. Because they had not executed my judgments, but had despised my statutes, and had polluted my sabbaths, and their eyes were after their fathers’ idols. 25. Wherefore I gave them also statutes that were not good, and judgments whereby they should not live: 26. And I polluted them in their own gifts, in that they caused to pass through the fire all that opened the womb, that I might make them desolate, to the end that they might know that I am the Lord. The history of the struggle between the sins of Israel, by which they endeavoured to ruin themselves, and the mercies of God, by which he endeavoured to save them and make them happy, as here continued: and the instances of that struggle in these verses have reference to what passed between God and them in the wilderness, in which God honoured himself, and they shamefully defiled. The story of Israel in the wilderness is referred to in the New Testament, (1 Cor. x. and Heb. iii.) as well as often in the Old, for warning to us Christians; and therefore we are particularly concerned in these verses. Observe, 1. The great things God did for them, which he puts them in mind of, not as grudging them his favours, but to show how ungrateful they had been. And we say, If you call a man ungrateful, you can call him no worse. It was a great favour, (1.) That God brought them forth out of Egypt; (ver. 14.) that he would follow, and bring them into the wilderness, and not into Canaan immediately. It is better to be at liberty in a wilderness than bondslaves in a land of plenty; to enjoy God and ourselves in solitude, than to lose both in a crowd: yet there were many of them who had such base, servile spirits as not to understand this, but, when they met with the difficulties of a desert, wished themselves in Egypt again. (2.) That he gave them the law upon Mount Sinai; (ver. 11.) not only (as the apostle has it,) but more and more added them concerning good and evil, but by his authority bound them from the evil and to the good. He gave them his statutes, and a valuable gift it was. Moses commanded them a law that was the inheritance of the congregation of Israel, Deut. xxxxi. 4. God made them to know his judgments; not only enacted laws against them, but gave them the principles and equity of those laws; with what judgment they were formed. The laws he gave them they were encouraged to observe and obey; for if a man do them, he shall even live in them; in keeping of God’s commandments there is abundance of comfort, and a great reward. Christ says, If thou wilt enter into life, and enjoy it, keep the commandments. Though they who are the most strict in their obedience, are thus far unprofitable servants, that they do no more than is their duty to do, yet it is thus richly recom-
which have tempted me these ten times, shall never see the land which I sware unto their fathers, Numb. xiv. 22, 23. Ps. cv. 11. By their contempt of God's laws, and particularly of his sabbaths, they used to keep a bar in their own door; and that which was at the bottom of their disobedience to God, and their neglect of his institutions, was, a secret affection to the gods of Egypt: Their heart went after their idols. Note, The bias of the mind toward the world and the flesh, the money and the belly, those two great objects of spiritual idolatry, is the root of bitterness, from which springs all disobedience to the divine law; the heart that goes after those idles despises God's judgments.

4. The reservation of a seed that should be admitted upon a new trial, and the instructions given to that seed, v. 17. Though they thus deserved ruin, and were doomed to it, yet mine eye spared them. When he looked upon them he had compassion on them, and did not make an end of them, but reprevented till a new generation was created. Note, It is owing purely to the mercy of God, that he has not long ago made an end of us. This new generation is well educated; Moses in Deuteronomy reported and enforced the laws which had been given to those that came out of Egypt, that their children might have them as it were sounding in their ears a fresh when they entered Canaan; (v. 18.) "I said unto your children in the wilderness, the plan of the end of God, and walk not in the statutes of your fathers; do not imitate their superstitious usages, nor retain their foolish, wicked customs; away with their vain conversation, which has nothing else to say for itself, but that it was received by the tradition of your fathers, 1 Pet. i. 18. Defile not yourselves with their idols, for you see how odious they rendered them to God, and their sabbaths, and their feasts, and their sabbaths, and their feasts, judgments, and hallow my sabbaths," v. 19, 20. Note, If parents be careless, and do not give their children good instructions as they ought, the children ought to make up the want by studying the word of God so much the more carefully and diligently themselves when they grow up. And the bad examples of parents must be made use of by their children for instruction, and not for copying.

5. The revolt of the next generation from God, by which they also made themselves obnoxious to the wrath of God; (v. 21.) The children rebelled against me too. And the same that was said of the fathers' rebellion is here said of the children's, for they were a seed of evil-doers; Moses told them that he knew their rebellion and their stiff neck, Deut. xxvi. 27. And Deut. ix. 24. You have been rebellions against the Lord from the day that I knew you. They walked not in my statutes, v. 21. Nay, They despised my statutes, v. 24. They who disobey God's statutes, despise them, they show that they have a mean opinion of them, and of him whose statutes they are. They polluted God's sabbaths, as their fathers. Note, The profusion of the sabbaths is a blot to the Jewish nation, as the whole holy time will keep nothing pure. It was said of the fathers, (v. 16.) that their heart went after their idols; they worshipped idols because they had an affection for them. It is said of the children, (v. 24.) that their eyes went after their fathers' idols; they were grown atheistical, and had no affection for any gods at all, but they worshipped their parents' idols because they were their fathers', and the kept them before their eyes; they were used to them: and if they must have gods, they would have such as they could see, such as they could manage. And that which aggravated their disobedience to God's statutes was, that if they had done them they might have lived in them, (v. 21.) might have been a happy, thriving people. Note, They that go... contrary to their duty, go contrary to their interest; they will not obey, will not come to Christ, that they may have life and peace. And it is therefore just that they who will not live and flourish as they might in their obedience, should die and perish in their disobedience. Now the great instance of this generation's rebellion and inclination to idolatry, was the iniquity of Peor, as that of their fathers was the golden calf; then the anger of the Lord was kindled again, Numb. xxv. 1-12. There was a plague in the congregation of the Lord, which, if it had not been seasonably stayed by Phinehas's zeal, had cut them all off; and yet they owned, in Joshua's time, We are not cleansed from that iniquity unto this day, Josh. xxxii. 17. Ps. cxvii. 29.

Then it was that God said he would pour out his fury upon them, (v. 21.) that he lifted up his hand into them in the wilderness, when they were a second time just ready to enter Canaan, that he would scatter them among the heathen. This very thing he said to them by Moses in his parting song, Deut. xxxii. 20. Because they provoked him to jealousy with strange gods, he said, I will hide my face from them; and, v. 26. 27. he said, I would scatter them into corners, were it not that I feared the wrath of the heavens for this thing. (Deut. xxv. 22.) I would pour out my fury upon them, but I with-drew my hand for my name's sake. Note, When the corruptions of the visible church are such, and so provoking, that we have reason to fear its total extirpation, yet then we may be confident of this, to our comfort, that God will secure his own honour, by making good his purpose, that while the world stands, there shall be a church in it.

6. The judgments of God upon them for their rebellion. They would not regard the statutes and judgments by which God prescribed them their duty, but despised them, and therefore God gave them statutes and judgments which were not good, and by which they should not live, v. 25. By which we may understand the several ways by which God punished them while they were in the wilderness—the plague that broke in upon them, the fiery ser-pents, and the like; which, in allusion to the law they had broken, are called judgments, because in-flicted by the justice of God, and statutes, because he gave orders concerning them, and commanded desolations, as sometimes he had commanded deliveries, and afflicted Israel's plagues, as he had done in Egypt. When, (Deut. xxxii. 21.) he said, I would consume them in a moment, (Numb. xvi. 21.) when he said, Take the heads of the people, and hang them up, (Numb. xxv. 4.) when he threatened them with the curse, and obliged them to say, Amen to every curse, (Deut. xxv. 27.) then he gave them judgments by which they should not live; more is implied than is express; they are judgments by which they should die. They that will not be bound by the precepts of the law, shall be bound by the sentence of it; for one way or other the world of God will take hold of men, Zech. i. 6.

Spiritual judgments are the most dreadful; and these God punished them with; the statutes and judgments which the heathen observed in the worship of their idols, were not judged in nature; they were not evil, as such, but they were sin, and such sin as was heathen to be punished; they made his sin to be their punishment; gave them up to a reproachful mind, as he did the Gentile idolaters, (Rom. i. 24, 26.) gave them up to their own hearts' lust, (Ps. lxxxix. 12.) punished them for those superstitions customs which were against the written law, by giving them up to them as wicked, and the very light and law of nature; he left them to themselves to be guilty of the most impure idolatries, as in the worship of Baal-peor; (he polluted them, he permitted them to pollute themselves, in their own gifts, v. 26.) and of the most barbarous idolatries, as in the worship of Moloch, when they caused their children, especially the first-born, (which God had challenged a special property in, The first-born of thy sons shalt thou give unto me,) to pass through the fire, to be sacrificed to their idols; that thus he might make them desolate, not only that he might justly do it, but that he might do it by their own hands; for this must needs be a great weakening to their families, and a diminution of the number and strength of their country. Note, God sometimes makes sin to be its own punish-ment, and yet is not the Author of sin; and there needs no more to make men miserable than to give them up to their own vile appetites and passions. Let them be put into the hand of their own counsels, and they will ruin themselves, and make themselves desolate. And thus God makes them know that he is the Lord, and that he is a righteous God, and that they themselves will be compell'd to own, when they see how much their willful transgressions con-trIBUTE to their own desolations. Note, Those who will not acknowledge God as the Lord their Ruler, shall be made to acknowledge him as the Lord their Judge when it is too late.

27. Therefore, son of man, speak unto the house of Israel, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Ye in this your fathers have blasphemed me, in that they have committed a trespass against me. 28. For when I had brought them into the land, for which I lifted up my hand to give it to them, then they saw every high hill, and all the thick trees, and they offered there their sacrifices, and there they presented the provocation of their offering; there also they made their sweet savour, and poured out there their drink-offerings. 29. Then I said unto them, What is the high place whereunto ye go? And the name thereof is called Bamah unto this day. 30. Wherefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers, and commit ye whoredom after their abominations? 31. For when ye offer your gifts, when ye make your sons to pass through the fire, ye pollute yourselves with all your idols, even unto this day: and shall I be inquired of by you, O house of Israel? As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you. 32. And that which cometh into your mind shall not be at all, that ye say, We will be as the heathen, as the families of the countries, to serve wood and stone.

Here the prophet goes on with the story of their rebellions, for their further humiliation, and shows, 1. That they that had persisted in them after they were settled in the land of Canaan. Though God had so many times testified his displeasure against their wicked courses, Yet in this, in the very same thing, your fathers have blasphemed me, continued to affront me, that they also have transgressed a tres-pass against me, v. 27. Note, It is a great aggravation of sin, when men will not take warning by the mischievous consequences of sin in those that have gone before them; this is blaspheming God, it is speaking reproachfully of his judgments, as if they were of no significance, and were not worth regarding.

(1.) God had made good his promise; I brought them into the land that I had sworn to give them. Though their unbelief and disobedience had made the performance slow, and much retarded it, yet it did not make the promise of no effect. They were often very near being cut off in the wilderness, but a step between them and ruin, and yet they came to Canaan at last. Note, Even God's Israel get to heaven by hell-gates; so many are their transgressions, and so strong their corruption, that it is a mercy of mercy when they are happy at last, as hypocrites go to hell by heaven-gates. *The righteous scarcely are saved. Per tota discretionis rerum ten

(2.) They had broken his precept by their abominable idolatries. God had appointed them to destroy all the monuments of idolatry; that they might not be tempted to desert his sanctuary; but, instead of defacing them, they fell in love with them, and when they saw every high hill whence they had the most delightful prospects, and all the thick trees where they had the most delightful shades, the former to show forth their pompous idolatries, the latter to conceal their shameful ones, they offered their sacrifices, and made their sweet savour, which showed the deceit of their hearts. There they presented the provocation of their offering, (v. 28.) their offerings, which, instead of pacifying God, or pleasing him, were highly provoking; sacrifices, which, though costly, yet, being misplaced, were an abomination to the Lord.

(3.) They obstinately persisted herein, notwithstanding all the admonitions that were given them; (v. 29.) Then I told them, by my servants the prophets, told them where the high place was, to which they went not, I put them upon considering it, and asking their own consciences concerning it, by putting this question to them, Which is the high place wherein unto you go? What do you find there so inviting, that you will leave God's altars, where he requires your attendance, to frequent such places as he has forbidden you to worship in? Do you not know that those high places are of a heathenish and idolatrous nature? God by his servants sacrificed they sacrificed to devils, and not to God? Did not Moses tell you so? Deut. xxiii. 17. And will you have fellowship with devils? What is that high place to which you go when you turn your back on God's altars? O foolish Israelites, who or what has bewitched you, that you will forsake the Fountain of life for broken cisterns, that worship which God appoints, and will accept, for his, he forbids, which he abhors, and which he will punish?* And yet the same is called Bemah unto this day; they will have their way, let God and his prophets say what they please to the contrary; they are wedded to their high places; even in the best reigns those were not taken away: you could not prevail to take away the name of Bemah, the high place, out of their mouths, but still they would have their high places. The sin and the sinner are with difficulty parted.

2. That generation, after they were unsettled, continued under the dominion of the same corrupt inclinations to idolatry, v. 30. He must say to the present house of Israel, some of whose elders were now sitting before him, Are ye polluted after the manner of your fathers? After all that God has said against them by a succession of prophets, only done against you by a series of judgments, yet will you take no warning? Will you still be as bad as your fathers were, and commit the same abominations that they committed? I see you will; you are bent upon returning to the old abominations; you offer your gifts in the high places, and you make your sons to pass through the fire, either you actually do it, or you do it in purpose and imagination, so that your fathers did. Now the elders seem now to have been projecting a coalition with the heathen; their hearts they will reserve for the God of Israel, but their knees they will be at liberty to bow to the gods of the nations among whom they live, that they may have the more respect and the fairer quarter among them. Now the prophet here orders to tell these who are forming the scheme, to this end, regarding the matter between God and Israel, that they should have no comfort nor benefit from either. (1.) They should have no benefit by their consulting in private with the prophets of the Lord; for, because they were hearkening after idols, God would have nothing to do with them; (v. 31.) *As I live, saith the Lord God, I will not be inquired of by you; what he had said before, (v. 5.) having largely showed how just it was, he here repeats, as that which he would abide by. Let them not think that they honoured him by their inquiries, nor expect an answer of peace from him, as long as they continued in love and league with their idols. Note, Those reap no benefit by their religion, that are not entire and sincere in it; nor can we have any comfortable communion with God in ordinances of worship unless we be inward and upright with him. We make nothing of our profession, if it be but a profession. Nay, (2.) They should have no benefit from their conforming in public to the practice of their neighbours; (v. 32.) That which comes into your mind as a piece of refined politics in the present difficult juncture, and which you would be advised to for your own preservation, and that you may not by being singular expose yourselves, and those whom you have occasioned to be exposed to no account to you. You say, We will be as the heathen, we will join with them in worshipping their gods, though at the same time we do not believe them to be gods, but wood and stone, and then we should be taken as the families of the countries, they will not know, or in a little while will have forgotten, that we are Jews, and will allow us the same privileges with their own citizens. Tell them, said God, that this project shall never prosper. Either their neighbours will not admit them to join with them in their worship, or, if they do, will think never the better, but the worse, of them for it, and will look upon them as dissolvers, and not fit to be trusted, who are thus false to their God, and put a cheat upon their neighbours. Note, There is nothing yet by sinful compliances; and the carnal projects of hypocrites will stand them in no stead. It is only integrity and uprightness that will preserve men, and recommend them to God and man.

33. As I live, saith the Lord God, surely with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over you; 34. And I will bring you out from the people, and will gather you out of the countries wherein ye are scattered, with a mighty hand, and with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out; 35. And I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you face to face. 36. Like as I pleaded with your fathers in the wilderness of the land of Egypt, so will I plead with you, saith the Lord God. 37. And I will cause you to pass under the red; and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant: 33. And I will purge out from among you the rebels, and them that transgress against me: I will bring them forth out of the country where they sojourn, and they shall not enter into the land of Israel; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 39. As for you, O house of Israel, thus saith the Lord God, Go ye, serve ye every one his idols, and hereafter also, if ye will not hearken unto me: but pollute ye my holy name no more with your gifts, and with your idols. 40. For in my holy mountain, in the mountain of the height of Israel, saith the Lord God, there shall all the house of Israel, all of them in the land, serve me: there will I accept them, and there will I require your offerings, and the first-fruits of your oblations, with all your holy things. 41. I will accept you with your sweet savour, when I bring you out from the people, and gather you out of the countries wherein ye have been scattered; and I will be sanctified in you before the heathen. 42. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall bring you into the land of Israel, into the country for the which I lifted up my hand to give it to your fathers. 43. And there shall ye remember your ways, and all your doings, wherein ye have been defiled; and ye shall loathe yourselves in your own sight, for all your evils that ye have committed. 44. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have wrought with you for my name’s sake, not according to your wicked ways, nor according to your corrupt doings, O ye house of Israel, saith the Lord God. The design which was now on foot among the elders of Israel was, that the people of Israel, being scattered among the nations, should lay aside all their peculiarities, and conform to those among whom they lived; but God had told them that the design should not take effect, v. 32. Now, in these verses, he shows particularly how it should be frustrated. They aimed at the mingling of the families of Israel with the families of the countries; but it will prove in the issue, That the wicked Israelites, notwithstanding their compliances, shall not mingle with them in their prosperity; but shall be distinguished from them for destruction; for idolatrous Israelites, that are apostate from God, shall be sooner and more sorely punished than idolatrous Babylonians that never knew the way of righteousness. Read and tremble at the doom here passed upon them: it is backed with an oath not to be reversed; As I live, saith the Lord God, thus and thus will I deal with you. They think to make both Jerusalem and Babylon their friends by uniting between two; but God threatens that neither of them shall serve for a rest or refuge for them.

1. Babylon shall not protect them, nor any of the countries of the heathen; for God will cast them out of his protection; and then what prince, what people, what place, can serve to be a sanctuary to them? God was Israel’s King of old, and had they continued his loyal subjects, he would have ruled over them with care and tenderness for their good, but now with a stretched-out arm, and with fury poured out, will I rule over them, v. 33. That power which should have been exercised for their protection, shall be exerted for their destruction. Note, There is no shaking off God’s dominion, rule he will, either with the golden sceptre or with the iron rod; and once that will not yield to the power of his grace, shall be made to sink under the power of his wrath. Now when God is angry with them, though they may think that they shall be lost in the crowd of the heathen among whom they are scattered, they will be disappointed; for (v. 34.) I will gather you out of the countries wherein you are scattered; and when the rebels are dispersed in battle, those that have been among the scattered, and brought together out of all the places whether they were scattered, to be punished by the sword of justice. They shall be brought into the wilderness of the people, (v. 35.) either into Babylon, which is called a wilderness, (ch. xix. 13.) and the desert of the sea, (Isa. xxi. 1.) or into some place, which, though full of people, shall be to them as the wilderness of Egypt to Israel; a place where God will plead with them face to face, as he pleaded with their fathers in the wilderness of Egypt; (v. 36.) where their cases shall fall, and where he will swear concerning them, that they shall never return to Canaan, as he swore concerning their fathers, that they should never return from Canaan; whereby he will avenge the breach of his law with as much terror as he gave it in the wilderness of Sinai. Note, God has a good action against apostates, and will find not only time, but a proper place to plead with them in upon that action, a wilderness even in the midst of the people for that purpose.

2. Israel shall be no more able to protect them than Babylon could; nor shall their relations to God; people stand them in any more stead for the other world, than their compliance with idolaters shall for this world; nor shall they stand in the congrega- tion of the righteous any more than in the congregation of evil-doers; for there will come a distinguishing day, when God will separate between the precious and the vile: he will cause them, as the shepherd doth his sheep, to separate the flocks from the goats, when he tithes them, (Lev. xxvii. 32.) that he may mark which is for God. God will take particular notice of each of them, one by one, as sheep are counted, and he will bring them into the bond of the covenant, (v. 37.) he will try them, and judge of them, according to the tenour of the covenant, and the difference made between some and others by the blessings and curses of the covenant. Or, it may refer to those among them that repented and reformed; he will cause them to pass under the rod of affliction, and, having done them good by it, he will bring them again into the bond of the covenant, will be to them a God in covenant, and use them again as heirs of promise.

He will purge out the wicked from among them; (v. 38.) I will purge out among you the rebels, who have been a grief and scandal to you, and who have by their rebellions brought all these calamities upon you. The judgments of God shall find them out, and their naming of the name of Israel shall be no shelter to them. They shall be brought out of the countries where they sojourn, and shall not have that rest in them which they promised themselves. But they shall not enter into the land of Israel, nor enjoy the benefit of that rest which God has promised to his people. Note, Though godly people may share with wicked in the calamities of the world, yet wicked people shall have no share with the godly in the heavenly Ca-more we shall see of the odious nature of sin. There ye shall bathe yourselves in your own sight.

Note, Ingenious evangelical repentance makes people believe the God of their salvation,

6. (5.) He will give them the knowledge of himself; They shall know by experience, that he is the Lord; that he is a God of almighty power and in exhaustible goodness; kind to his people, and faith ful to his covenant with them. Note, All the favours we receive from God should lead us to a more intimate acquaintance with him. (6.) He will do all this for his own sake, without standing their undeserving and ill-deserving; (v. 44.) he has wrought with them, wrought for them, wrought in favour of them, wrought in concurrence with them, they doing their endeavour, he has wrought with them purely for his name's sake.

His reasons were all fetched from himself. Had he dealt with them according to their wicked ways and their corrupt doings, though they were the better and sounder part of the house of Israel, he had left them to be scattered and lost with the rest; but he recovered and restored them for the sake of his own name, not only that it might not be polluted, (v. 14.) but that he might be sanctified in them before the heathen, (v. 41.) that he might sanctify himself so the word is, and think of him by his own name. He will do well for his people, that he may have the glory of it; that he may manifest himself to be a God pardoning sin, and so keeping promise; that his people may praise him, and that their neighbours may likewise take notice of him, as they did when God turned again their captivity, Ps. cxvii.

5. Then said they among the heathen, The Lord has done great things for them.

45. Moreover, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 46. Son of man, set the face toward the south, and drop thy word toward the south, and prophesy against the forest of the south field; 47. And say to the forest of the south, Hear the word of the Lord, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will kindle a fire in thee, and it shall devour every green tree in thee, and every dry tree; the flaming flame shall not be quenched, and all faces from the south to the north shall be burned therein. 48. And all flesh shall see that I the Lord have kindled it; it shall not be quenched.

49. Then said I, Ah Lord God! they say of me, Dost he not speak parables?

We have here a prophecy of wrath against Judah and Jerusalem, which should more fitly have begun in the next chapter, but we are to conclude that God has no dependence on what goes before, but that which follows in the beginning of the next chapter is the explication of it, when the people complained that this was a parable which they understood not. In this parable,

1. It is a forest that is prophesied against, the forest of the south field, Judah and Jerusalem.

The very next chapter, than have concluded this, and has no dependence on what goes before, but that which follows in the beginning of the next chapter is the explication of it, when the people complained that this was a parable which they understood not. In this parable,

1. It is a forest that is prophesied against, the forest of the south field, Judah and Jerusalem.
the earth by the river of God, which drops upon the pastures of the wilderness, (Ps. lxxv. 12.) and which is south land more especially calls for, Josh. xv. 19. Judah and Jerusalem are called forests, not only because they had been full of people, as a wood of trees, but because they had been empty of fruit, for fruit-trees grow not in a forest; and a forest is put in opposition to a fruitful field, Isa. xxxii. 15. Those that should have been as the garden of the Lord, and his vineyard, were become like a forest, all overgrown with briers and thorns; and those that are so, that bring not forth the fruits of righteousness, God's word prophesies against.

2. It is a fire kindled in his forest, that is prophesied of a judgment, wherein all sinners are consumed; and which consumed both the city and the country, sword, famine, pestilence, and captivity, are signified by this fire. (1.) It is a fire of God's own kindling; I will kindle a fire in thee, the breath of the Lord is not as a drop, but as a stream of brimstone to set it on fire, Isa. xxxx. 33. He that had been himself a protecting Fire about Jerusalem, is now a Consuming Fire in it. All flesh shall see by the fury of this fire, and the desolations it shall make, especially when they compare it with the sins which had made them fuel for this fire, that it is the Lord that has kindled it, (v. 48.) as a just Avenger of his own injured honour. (2.) This conflagration shall be general; all orders and degrees of men shall be devoured by it: young and old, rich and poor, high and humble, of whatever nation, which does not repent, shall easily upon, shall be devoured by this fire; even good people shall some of them be involved in these calamities; and if this be done in the green trees, what shall be done in the dry? The dry trees shall be as tinder and touchwood to this fire. All houses, all that covers the face of the earth, from the north to the south, and from Lebanon to the land of Dam, shall be burnt therein. (3.) The fire shall not be quenched, no attempts to give check to the dissolusion shall prevail. When God will rain a nation, who or what can save it?

Now observe, [1.] The people's reflection upon the prophet, on occasion of this discourse. They said, Dost he not speak parables? This was the language of the people of Babylon, (Isa. xi. 1.) who had been ignorant of the just, of plain truths were always parables to them,) or of their malice and ill will to the prophet. Note, It is common for those who will not be wrought upon by the word, to pick quarrels with it; it is either too plain, or too obscure; too fine, or too homely; too common, or too singular; something or other is amiss in it. [2.] The prophet's complaint to God; Oh Lord God! they say so and so of me. Note, It is a comfort to us, when people speak ill of us unjustly, that we have a God to complain to.

CHAP. XXI.

In this chapter, we have, 1. An exposition of the prophecy in the close of the foregoing chapter concerning the fire which should come upon the land, by which all shall be laid waste; and this expressed very emphatically. v. 8.-17. III. A prospect given of the king of Babylon's approach to Jerusalem, and how he was disappointed by division of it. v. 18-24. IV. Sentence passed upon Zedekiah king of Judah, v. 25.-27. V. The destruction of the Ammonites by the sword foretold, v. 28.-32. Thus is this chapter all threatening.

1. AND the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, set thy face toward Jerusalem, and drop thy word toward the holy places, and propheesy against the land of Israel. 3. And say to the land of Israel. Thus saith the Lord, Behold, I am against thee, and will draw forth my sword out of his sheath, and will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked. 4. Seeing then that I will cut off from thee the righteous and the wicked, therefore shall my sword go forth out of his sheath against all flesh from the south to the north; 5. That all flesh may know that I the Lord have drawn forth my sword out of his sheath: it shall not return any more. 6. Sigh, therefore, thou son of man, with the breaking of thy jaws; and with bitterness shall the sight before their eyes. 7. And it shall be, when they say unto thee, Whereforeighest thou? that thou shalt answer. For the tidings, because it cometh: and every heart shall melt, and all hands shall be feeble, and every spirit shall faint, and all knees shall be weak as water: behold, it cometh, and shall be brought to pass, saith the Lord God.

The prophet had faithfully delivered the message he was intrusted with in the close of the foregoing chapter, in the terms wherein he received it, not daring to add his own comment upon it; but when he complained that the people found fault with him for speaking parables, the word of the Lord came to him again, and gave him a key to that figurative discourse, with that he might let the people into the meaning of it, and so silence that objection. For all men shall be rendered inexcusable at God's bar, and every mouth shall be stopped. Note, He that speaks with tongues, should pray that he may interpret, 1 Cor. xiv. 13. When we speak to people about their souls, we should study plainness, and express ourselves as we may be best understood.

Christ expounded his parables to his disciples, Mark iv. 10. The prophet is here more plainly directed against whom to level the arrow of this prophecy He must drop his word toward the holy places, (v. 2.) toward Cæsarea the holy land, Jerusalem the holy city, the temple, the holy house. These were highly dignified above other places; but when they polluted them, that word which used to drop in the holy places, shall now drop against them; Prophecy against the land of Israel. It was the honour of Israel, that it had prophets and prophecy; but these, being despised by them, are turned against them. And justly is Zion battered with her own artillery, which used to be employed against her adversaries, seeing she knew not how to value it.

2. He is instructed, and is to instruct the people in the necessity of the fire; for the fire was threatened to consume the forest of the south; it signified a sword drawn, the sword of war which should make the land desolate; (v. 5.) Behold, I am against thee, O land of Israel. There needs no more to make a people miserable than to have God against them; for as, if he be for us, we need not fear, whoever are against us; so if he be against us, we cannot hope, whoever are for us. And God's professing people, when they revolt from him, set him against them, who used to be for them. Was the fire there of God's kindling? The sword here is his sword, which he has prepared, and which he will give commission to; it is he that will draw it out of its sheath, where it had lain hid, and threatened no harm. Note, When the sword is unsheathed among the nations, God's hand must be eyed and owned in it. Did the fire devour every green tree and every dry tree? The sword in like manner shall cut off the right hand of them which have offended in the common calamities of the nation; the righteous were cut off from the land of Israel, when they were sent captives in Babylon, though perhaps few or none of them were cut off from the land of the living; and it was a threatening omen to the land of Israel, that in the beginning of its troubles such excellent men as Daniel and his fellows, and Ezekiel, the very Last, must answer God, and Babylon. But though the sword cut off the righteous and the wicked, (for it devours one as well as another, 2 Sam. xi. 25.) yet far be it from us to think that the righteous are as the wicked, Gen. xviii. 25. No, God's graces and comforts make a great difference when his providence seem to make none. The good figs are sent into Babylon for their good, Jer. xxiv. 5, 6. It is only in outward appearance that there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked, Eccl. ix. 2. But it speaks the greatness of God's displeasure against the land of Israel. Well might it be said, His eye shall not spare, when it shall not spare, no, not the righteous in it. Since there are not righteous men sufficient to save the land, to make the justice of God the more illustrious, the few that are, shall suffer with it, and God's name shall not be said to come off gloriously. Did the fire burn up all the faces from the south to the north? The sword shall go forth against all flesh from the south to the north; shall go forth, as God's sword, with a commission that cannot be contested, with a force that cannot be resisted. Were all flesh made to know that God kindled the fire? They shall be made to know that he has drawn forth that sword, v. 3. And, lastly, Shall the fire that is kindled never be quenched? So when this sword of the Lord is drawn against Judah and Jerusalem, the scabbard is thrown away, and it shall never be sheathed; it shall not return any more, till it has made a full end.

3. The prophet is ordered, by expressions of his own grief and concern for these calamities that were coming on, to try to make impressions of the like upon the people. When he has delivered his message, he must sigh, (v. 6.) must fetch many deep sighs, with the breaking of his heart; he must sigh as if his heart would burst, sigh with bitterness, with other expressions of bitter sorrow, and this publicly, in the sight of those to whom he delivered the foregoing message, that this might be a sermon to their eyes, as that was to the people of Judah; and it will be well if both would work upon them. The prophet must sigh, though it was painful to himself, and made his breast sore; and though it is probable that the refrain among the people would ridicule him for it, and call him a whining, canting preacher. But if we be beside ourselves, it is to God; and if this be to be vile, we will be yet more so. Note, Ministers, if they would affect others with the things they have to say, they must speak earnestly and sincerely in the greatest sincerity affected with them, and must submit to that which may create uneasiness to themselves, so that it will promote the ends of their ministry. The people, observing the prophet to sigh so much, and seeing no visible occasion for it, would ask, Wherefore sighst thou? These sighs have some mystical meaning; let us know what it is that makes the prophet sigh. Upon the tidings, the heavy tidings, that we shall hear shortly; the tidings come, the judgments come, which we hear the tidings of, they come; and then you will all sigh: nay, that will not serve, every heart shall melt, and every spirit fail; your courage will all be gone, and you will have no animating considerations to support yourselves with; and when heart and spirit fail, it will follow of course, that all hands will be feeble and unable to fight, and all knees will be weak as water and unable to flee, or to stand their ground. Those who have God, and when they have them, when flesh and heart fail, have him to be the Strength of their heart; but those who have God against them, have no cordial for a fainting spirit, but are as Belshazzar when his thoughts troubled him, Dan. v. 6. But some people are worse frightened than hurt; may not the case be so here, and the event prove better than likely? No, behold, it is the sword, and shall be brought to pass. It is not a bugbear that they are frightened with, but according to the fear so is the wrath, and more grievous than is feared.

3. Again, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 9. Son of man, prophesy, and say, Thus saith the Lord; Say, A sword, a sword is sharpened, and also furnished: 10. It is sharpened to make a sore slaughter: it is furnished that it may glister; should we then make mirth? it containeth the rod of my son, as every tree. 11. And he hath given it to be furnished, that it may be handled: this sword is sharpened, and it is furnished, to give it into the hand of the slayer. 12. Cry and howl, son of man; for it shall be upon my people, it shall be upon all the princes of Israel: terrors, by reason of the sword, shall be upon my people: smite therefore upon thy thigh. 13. Because it is a trial, and what if the sword contemn even the rod? it shall be no more, saith the Lord God. 14. Thou, therefore, son of man, prophesy, and smite thy hands together, and let the sword be doubled the third time, the sword of the slain: it is the sword of the great men that are slain, which entereth into their privy chambers. 15. I have set the point of the sword against all their gates, that their heart may faint, and their reins be multiplied. Ah! it is made bright, it is wrapt up for the slaughter. 16. Go thee one way or other, either on the right hand, or on the left, whithersoever thy face is set. 17. I will also smite thy hands together, and I will cause my fury to rest: I the Lord have said it.

Here is another prophecy of the sword, which is delivered in a very affecting manner; the expressions here used are somewhat intricate, and perplex the interpretation. And yet this may be found in the forgoing verses, here it is fitted up to do execution, which the prophet is commanded to lament. Observe, 1. How the sword is here described. (1.) It is sharpened, that it may cut and wound and make a sore slaughter. The wrath of God will put an edge upon it; and whatever instruments God shall please to use, in executing his judgments, he will fill them with strength, courage, and fury, according to the service they are employed in. Out of the mouth of Christ goes a sharp sword, Rev. xix. 15. (2.) It is furnished, that it may glister, to the terror of those against whom it is drawn. It shall be a kind of flaming sword. If it have rested in the scabbard for want of use, it shall be rubbed and brightened; for though the glory of God's justice may seem to have been eclipsed for awhile, during the day of his patience, and the delay of his judgments, yet it will shine out again, and be made to glitter. (3.) It is a victorious sword, nothing shall stand before it; (v. 16.) It containeth the rod of my son as every tree. Israel, said God once, is my son, my firstborn. The government of that people was called the rod, Isa. xi. 2. He is righteous in all his judgments. \\

1. How the sword is directed, and against whom it is set; (v. 12.) It shall be upon my people, and shall fill by this sword; it is repeated again, as that which is scarcely credible, that the sword of the heathen shall be upon God's own people. Nay, it shall be upon all the princes of Israel; their dignity and power as princes shall be no more their security than their profession of religion as princes of Israel. But if the sword be at any time upon God's people, or the church of God, it is not sufficient to arm them against every thing in it that is frightful? Yes, they have, while they conduct themselves as becomes his people; but these had not done so, and therefore terrors, by reason of the sword, shall be upon those that call themselves my people. Note, While good men are quiet, not only from evil, but from the fear of it, wicked men are disturbed not only with the sword, but with the terrors of it. Though they have furnished themselves with places of retirement, places of concealment, where they flatter themselves with hopes that they shall be safe, they will find that the sword will enter into their secret chambers, and find them out there, as the frogs, when they were one of Egypt's plagues, found admission into the chambers of their kings. The sword, the breath of God's mouth, is directed against their gates, against all their gates, (v. 13.) against all those things with which they thought to keep it out, and fortify themselves against it. Note, The strongest gates, though they be gates of brass, ever so well barred, ever so well guarded, are no fence against the point of the sword of God's judgments. But when that is pointed against sinners, (1.) They are ready to fear the worst; their hearts faint, so that they are not able to make any resistance. (2.) The worst comes; whatever resistance they make, it is to no purpose, but they are ruined, and their ruins are multiplied. But what need have we to observe the particular directions of this sword, when it has been so uniformly directed? It is a running warrant; (v. 16.) "Go thee, one way or other, which way thou wilt, turn to the right hand, or to the left, thou wilt find those that are obnoxious, for there are none free from guilt; and then hast authority against them, for there are none exempt from punishment; and therefore, whithersoever thy sword is set, that wherein thou proceed, and, like a running sword, from the blood of the slain, from the fat of the mighty, thou shalt never return empty." 2 Sam. i. 22. Note, So full is the world of wicked people, that, which way soever God's judgments go forth, they will find work, will find matter to work upon. That fire will never go out on this earth for want of fuel. And such various methods God has taken and will still take for using and employing that sword. It is still as it was at first, when it flamed in the hand of the cherubims, it turns every way, Gen. iii. 24.

4. What is the nature of this sword, and what are the intentions and limitations of it as to the people of God, v. 13. It is a correction; it is designed to be so; the sword to others is a rod to them. This is a comfortable word which comes in at the midst of a great murrain, and is a rod to them, a comfort to them, that is as eyes of comfort, when they are in a state of utter darkness. \\

5. Here the prophet and the people must show themselves affected with these judgments threaten-
The word of the Lord came unto me again, saying, 19. Also, thou son of man, appoint thee two ways, that the sword of the king of Babylon may come: both twain shall come forth out of one land; and choose thou a place, choose it at the head of the way to the city. 20. Appoint a way, that the sword may come to Rabbath of the Ammonites, and to Judah in Jerusalem the defenced. 21. For the king of Babylon stood at the parting of the way, at the head of the two ways, to use divination: he made his arrows bright, he consulted with images, he looked in the liver. 22. At his right hand was the divination for Jerusalem, to appoint captains, to open the mouth in the slaughter, to lift up the voice with shouting, to appoint battering rams against the gates, to cast a mount, and to build a fort. 23. And it shall be unto them as a false divination in their sight, to them that have sworn oaths: but he will call to remembrance the iniquity, that they may be taken. 24. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because ye have made your iniquity to be remembered, in that your transgressions are discovered, so that in all your doings your sins do appear; because, I say, that ye are come to remembrance, ye shall be taken with the hand. 25. And thou, profane wicked prince of Israel, whose day is come, when iniquity shall have an end; 26. Thus saith the Lord God, Remove the diadem, and take off the crown; this shall not be the same: exalt him that is low, and abase him that is high. 27. I will overturn, overturn, overturn it; and it shall be no more, until he come whose right it is; and I will give it him. The prophet, in the verses before, had showed them the sword coming; he here shows them that sword coming against them, that they might not flatter themselves that by some means or other it should be diverted a contrary way. 1. He must see and show the Chaldean army coming against Jerusalem, and determined by a supreme power so to do. The prophet must appoint him two ways, he must put a paper draw out two roads, (v. 19) as sometimes is done in maps: and he must say, appointing the one of them to Babylon, and placing the roads for, there they will make a stand. They both come out of the same land, but when they come to the place where one road leads to Rabbah, the head city of the Ammonites, and the other to Jerusalem, he makes a pause; for though he is resolved to be the ruin of both, yet he is not determined which to attack first; here his politics and his policy leaves him at a loss. The sword must go either to Rabbah, or to Judah in Jerusalem. Many of the inhabitants of Judah had now taken shelter in Jerusalem, and all the interests of the country were bound up in the safety of the city, and therefore it is called Judah in Jerusalem the defended; so strongly fortified was it, both by nature and art, that it was thought impregnable, Lam. iv. 11. The prophet must describe these things, viz. the king of Babylon is at; (v. 21) for the king of Babylon stood: he shall stand considering what course to take, at the head of the two ways. Though he was a prince of great foresight and great resolution, yet, it seems, he knew neither his own interest nor his own mind. Let not the wise man then glory in his wisdom nor the mighty man in his arbitrary power, for even those that may do what they will, seldom know what to do for the best. Now observe, 1. The method he took to come to a resolution; he and divination, applied him to a higher and insubstantial power, perhaps to the determination of Providence by a lot, in order to which he made his arrows bright, that were to be drawn for the lots, in honour of the solemnity. Perhaps Jerusalem was written on one arrow, and Rabbah on the other, and that which was first drawn out of the quiver he determined to attack first. Or, he applied himself to the direction of some pretended oracle; he consulted with images or Teraphim, expecting to receive audible answers from them. Or, to the observations which the augurs made upon the entrails of the sacrifices, he looked in the liver, whether the position of that pretended good or ill luck. Note, It is a mortification to the pride of the wise men of the earth, that in difficult cases they have been glad to make the sacrifice of a few of their arrows, that they may have such ridiculous ways of doing it; when in cases proper for an appeal to Providence, it is sufficient that the lot be cast into the lap, with that prayer, Give a perfect lot, and a firm belief that the disposal thereof is not fortuitous, but of the Lord, Prov. xvi. 33. 2. The resolution he was hereby brought to. Every one of these suitors perhaps served his own purposes, and directed him to go to Jerusalem, v. 22. The divination for Jerusalem happened to be at his right hand, which, according to the rules of divination, determined him that way. Note, What services God designs men for, he will be sure in his providence to lead them to, though perhaps they themselves are not aware what guidance the Divine Providence, being the mark it up, the campaign is presently opened with the siege of that important place. Captains are appointed for the command of the forces to be employed in the siege, who must open the mouth in the slaughter, must give directions to the soldiers what to do, and make speeches to animate them. Orders are given to provide every thing necessary for carrying on the siege with vigour; batteries must be prepared, and forts built. Of what pains, what cost, are men at to destroy one another!

II. He must show both the people and the prince that they bring this destruction upon themselves by their own sin.

1. The people do so, v. 23, 24. They slight the notices that are given them of the judgment coming. It is prophesied to them a false divination; they are sent to or weakened to repentance. When they hear that Nebuchadnezzar by his divisions is directed to Jerusalem, and assured of success in that enterprize, they laugh at it, and continue secure, calling it a false divination; because they have sworn oaths, they have joined in a solemn league with the Egyptians, and they depend upon the promise they have made them to raise up, or upon the assurance which the false prophets have given them, that it shall be raised. Or, it may refer to the oaths of allegiance they had sworn to the king of Babylon, but had violated; for which treachery of theirs God had given them up to a judicial blindness, so that the fairest warnings given them were slighted by them as false divinations. Note, It is not strange if those who make a jest of the signs, sacred oaths, can make a jest likewise of the most sacred oracles: for where will a profane mind stop? But shall their unbelief invalidate the counsel of God? Are they safe because they are secure? By no means; nay, the contempt they put upon divine warnings is a sin that brings to remembrance their other sins, and they may thank themselves if they be not remembered against them. (1. ) Their present wickedness is discovered. Now that God is contending with them, so perverse and obstinate are they, that, whatever they offer in their own defence, docs but add to their offences; they never conducted themselves so ill as they did now that they had the loudest call given them to repent and reform; so that in all your doings your sins do appear. Turn you which way you will you show a black side. This is too true of every one of us; for not only there is none that lives and sins not, but there is not a just man upon earth that does good and sins not. Our best services have such iahis of weakness, and folly, and imperfection, and so much evil is present with us, that even when we do good, we must be accounted with sorrow and shame. In all our doings, and in all our sayings too, our sins do appear, and witness against us, so that if we were under the law we were undone. (2. ) This brings to mind their former wickedness; "You have made your iniquity to be remembered, not by yourselves but it might be repented of; but a just cause for punishment is now made to be reckoned for." Your sins make them the targets of your fathers to be remembered against you, which otherwise you should never have smarted for." Note, God remembers former iniquities against those only who by the present discoveries of their wickedness show that they do not repent of them. (3. ) That they may suffer for all together, they are surrounded, or hemmed in, to the destruction, that they may be taken; (v. 25. ) "Ye shall be taken with the hand that God had appointed to seize you and to hold you, and out of which you cannot escape." Men are said to be God's hand, when they are made use of as the ministers of his justice, Ps. xvii. 4. Note, Those who will not be taken with the word of God's grace, shall at last be taken by the hand of his wrath.

2. As some of the princes, had yet had grace himself. Zedekiah is the prince of Israel, to whom the prophet here, in God's name, addresses himself; and if he had not spoken in God's name, he would not have spoken so boldly, so bluntly; for is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? (1. ) He gives him his character, v. 25. Thou profane and wicked prince of Israel! He was not so much a prince as a prince, because he had so many predecessors, lid yet had had grace himself. Zedekiah is the prince of Israel, to whom the prophet here, in God's name, addresses himself; and if he had not spoken in God's name, he would not have spoken so boldly, so bluntly; for is it fit to say to a king, Thou art wicked? (2. ) He renders him his doom. His iniquity has an end, the measure of it is full, and therefore his day is come, the day of his punishment, the day of divine vengeance. Note, Though they who are wicked and profane may flourish awhile, yet their day will come to full. The sentence here passed is, (1. ) That Zedekiah shall be defended; he has forfeited his crown, and he shall no longer wear it; he has by his professedness profaned his crown, and it shall be cast to the ground; (v. 26. ) Remove the diadem. Crowns and diadems are laceable things; it is only in the other world that there is a crown of glory that fades not away; a kingdom that cannot be removed. The Chaldee Paraphrase expands it thus, Take away the crown from Zedekiah the chief-built, and I will take away the crown from Zedekiah the king; neither this nor that shall abide in his place, but shall be removed. This shall not be the same; not the same he has been; this not this; so the word is. Profane and wicked perhaps he is as he has been, but not prince of Israel as he has been. Note, Men lose their dignity by their iniquity. Their profaneness and wickedness remove their diadem, and take off their crown, and make them the reverse of what they were. (2. ) That great confusion and disorder in the state shall follow hereupon; every thing shall be turned upside down. The conqueror shall take a pride in excelling him that is low, and abusing him that is high, preserving some, and degrading others, at his pleasure, without any regard either to right or merit. [3.] Attempts to re-establish the government shall be blasted, and come to nothing; Gedaliah's, particularly, and Ishmael's, who was of the seed-royal, (to which the Chaldean Paraphrase refers this,) neither of them shall be able to make any thing of it. I will overturn, overturn, overturn first one project, and then another; for who can build up what God will throw down? [4.] This monarchy will never be restored, till it is fixed for perpetuity in the hands of the Messiah. There shall be no more kings of the house of David after Zedekiah, till Christ comes, whose right the kingdom is, and of David, no prince was to have its full accomplishment, and I will give it him. He shall have the throne of his father David, Luke i. 32. Immediately before the coming of Christ there was a long eclipse of the royal dignity, as there was also a failing of the spirit of prophecy, that his shining forth in the fulness of time both as King and Prophet might appear the more illustrious. Note, Christ has an inconceivable title to the dominion and sovereignty both in the church and in the world; the kingdom is his right. And having the right, he shall in due time have the possession; I will give it him; and there shall be a general overturning of all, rather than he shall come short of his right; and a certain overturning of all the opposition that stands in his way, to make room for him, Dan. iv. 35. This is mentioned here for the comfort of those who feared that the promise made in David would fail for evermore. "No," says God, "that promise is sure, for the Messiah's kingdom shall last for ever."

23. And thou, son of man, prophesy, and say, Thus saith the Lord God concerning the Ammonites, and concerning their reproach; even say thou, The sword, the sword is drawn; for the slaughter it is furnished, to consume because of the glittering; 29. While they see vanity unto thee, while they divine a lie unto thee, to bring thee upon the necks of them that are slain, of the wicked, whose day is come, when their iniquity shall have an end. 30. Shall I cause it to return into his sheath? I will judge thee in the place where thou wast created, in the land of thy nativity. 31. And I will pour out mine indignation upon thee; I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath; I will burn up the fire of my wrath against thee, it shall burn with the utmost vehemence. Then shalt thou be fuel to this fire, v. 32. Note, With the sword men make themselves a terror; but God's wrath they are very confirmed by it, and it is inflamed by them. (2.) It shall be effected by the sword of war; to them he must cry, as before to Israel, because they had triumphed in Israel's overthrow. The sword, the sword is drawn; v. 28. (compare v. 9, 10,) it is drawn to consume because of the glittering, because it is brandished and glitters, and is to be made use of. Gods executions will answer his preparations. This sword, when it is drawn, shall not return into its sheath (v. 50,) till it has done the work for which it was drawn. When the sword is drawn, it does not return till God causes it to return, and he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Who can change his purpose? (3.) The persons employed in it are brutish men, and skilful to destroy. Men of bad judgment as this have the wit of men to do the work of wild beasts; human reason, which makes them skilful, but no human compassion, which makes them skilful only to destroy; though they are the scandal of mankind, yet sometimes they are made use of to serve God's purposes; God delivers the Ammonites into the hands of such, and justly, for they themselves were brutish, and delighted in the destruction of God's people. We have reason to pray, as Paul desired to be prayed for, that we may be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men, (2 Thess. iii. 2,) men that seem made for doing mischief. (4.) The place where they should thus be reckoned with; "I will judge thee there where thou wast created, where thou wast put upon themselves when they hearkened to their false prophets, (for such it seems there were among them as well as among the Jews,) who pretended to foretell their perpetual safety in the midst of the desolations that were made of the countries round about them; "They see vanity unto thee, and divine a lie, v. 28. They flatter thee with promises of peace, and the truth shall not be imposed upon them, and to encourage them therein by giving credit to them." Note, These that fed themselves with a self-conceit in the day of their prosperity, prepare matter for a self-reproach in the day of their calamity. (2.) The reproach they put upon the Israel of God, when they triumphed in their afflictions, and thereby added affliction to their people, was not without reason, but it was for the glory of God, and the instruction and encouragement of his people. For the reproach of the people of God resteth upon them when their iniquity had an end, when the measure of it was full; we shall meet with this again, ch. xxv. 3, &c. Note, These are repining apace for misery, who trample upon the people of God in their distress, whereas they ought to tremble when judgment begins at the house of God. The utmost triumphs of the Ammonites threateneth. For the reproach cast on the church by her neighbours will be returned into their own bosom, Ps. lxxix. 12. Let us see how terrible the threatening is, and the destruction will be. (1.) It shall come from the wrath of God, who resents the indignities and injuries done to his people as done to himself; (v. 21,) I will pour out my indignation upon them. I will bring upon them fire of bruised and humbled upon them; the least drop of divine indignation and wrath will create tribulation and anguish enough to the soul of man that doth evil; what then would a full stream of that indignation and wrath do? "I will blow against thee in the fire of my wrath; I will blow up the fire of my wrath against thee, it shall burn with the utmost vehemence." Then shalt thou be fuel to this fire, v. 32. Note, With the sword men make themselves a terror; but God's wrath they are very confirmed by it, and it is inflamed by them. (2.) It shall be effected by the sword of war; to them he must cry, as before to Israel, because they had triumphed in Israel's overthrow. The sword, the sword is drawn; v. 28. (compare v. 9, 10,) it is drawn to consume because of the glittering, because it is brandished and glitters, and is to be made use of. Gods executions will answer his preparations. This sword, when it is drawn, shall not return into its sheath (v. 50,) till it has done the work for which it was drawn. When the sword is drawn, it does not return till God causes it to return, and he is in one mind, and who can turn him? Who can change his purpose? (3.) The persons employed in it are brutish men, and skilful to destroy. Men of bad judgment as this have the wit of men to do the work of wild beasts; human reason, which makes them skilful, but no human compassion, which makes them skilful only to destroy; though they are the scandal of mankind, yet sometimes they are made use of to serve God's purposes; God delivers the Ammonites into the hands of such, and justly, for they themselves were brutish, and delighted in the destruction of God's people. We have reason to pray, as Paul desired to be prayed for, that we may be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men, (2 Thess. iii. 2,) men that seem made for doing mischief. (4.) The place where they should thus be reckoned with; "I will judge thee there where thou wast created, where thou wast first formed into a people, and where thou hast been settled ever since, and therefore where thou seest to have taken root: the land of thy nativity shall be the land of thy destruction.” Note, God can bring ruin upon us there where we are most secure; and turn us out of that land which we thought we had a title to not to be disputed, and a possession of not to be disturbed; Thy blood shall be shed not only in thy borders, but in the midst of thy land. Lastly, it shall be an irreparable ruin: “Though thou mayest think to recover thyself, it is in vain to think of it, thou shalt be no more remembered with any respect,” Ps. ix. 6. Justly is their name blotted out, who would have Israel’s name for ever lost.

CHAP. XXII.

Here are three several messages which God inflicts the prophet to deliver concerning Judah and Jerusalem, and all to the same purport, to show them their sins, and the judgments that were coming upon them for these sins. 1. Here is a catalogue of their sins, by which they had exposed themselves to shame, and for which God would bring them to ruin, v. 1. 16. II. They are here compared to dross, and are condemned as dross to the fire, v. 17. 22. III. All orders and degrees of men among them are here found guilty of the neglect of the duty of their place, and of having contributed to the national guilt, which therefore, since none appeared as intercessors, they must all expect to share in the punishment of, v. 23. 31.

1. MOREOVER, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Now, thou son of man, wilt thou judge, wilt thou judge the bloody city? yea, thou shalt shew her all her abominations. 3. Then say thou, Thus saith the Lord God, The city sheddeth blood in the midst of it, that her time may come; and maketh idols against herself to defile herself. 4. Thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed; and hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made; and thou hast caused thy days to draw near, and art come even unto thy years: therefore have I made thee a reproach unto the heathen, and a mocking to all countries. 5. Those that be near, and those that be far from thee, shall mock thee, which art infamous and much vexed. 6. Behold, the princes of Israel, every one were in thee to their power to shed blood. 7. In thee have they set light by father and mother; in the midst of thee have they dealt by oppression with the stranger; in thee have they vexed the fatherless and the widow. 8. Thou hast despised my holy things, and hast profaned my sabbaths. 9. In thee are men that carry tales to shed blood; and in thee they eat upon the mountains; in the midst of thee they commit lewdness; 10. In thee have they discovered their father’s nakedness; in thee have they humbled her that was set apart for pollution. 11. And one hath committed abomination with his neighbour’s wife; and another hath lewdly defiled his daughter-in-law; and another in thee hath humbled his sister, his father’s daughter. 12. In thee have they taken gifts to shed blood; thou hast taken usury and increase, and thou hast greedily gained of thy neighbours by extortion, and hast forgotten me, saith the Lord God. 13. Behold, therefore, I have smitten my hand at thy dishonest gain which thou hast made, and at thy blood which hath been in the midst of thee. 14. Can thy heart endure, or can thy hands be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee? I the Lord have spoken it, and will do it. 15. And I will scatter thee among the heathen, and disperse thee in the countries, and will consume thy filthiness out of thee. 16. And thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself in the sight of the heathen, and thou shalt know that I am the Lord.

In these verses, the prophet by a commission from Heaven is set as a judge upon the bench, and Jerusalem is made to hold up her hand as a prisoner at the bar; and if prophets were set over other nations, much more over God’s nation, Jer. i. 10. This prophet is authorized to judge the bloody city; the city of blood. Jerusalem is so called, not only because she had been guilty of the general sin of bloodshed, but because her crimes in general were bloody crimes, (ch. vii. 23.) such as polluted her in her blood, and for which she deserved to have blood given her to drink. Now the business of a judge with a malefactor is to convict him of his crimes, and then to pass sentence upon him for them. These two things Ezekiel is to do to Jerusalem; 1. He is to find Jerusalem guilty of many heinous crimes here enumerated in a long bill of indictment, and it is billa vera—a true bill; so he writes upon it, whose judgment, we are sure, is according to truth. He must show her all her abominations, (v. 2.) that God may be justified in all the desolations brought upon her. Let us take a view of all the particular sins which Jerusalem here stands charged with; and they are all exceedingly abominable.

1. Murder: The city shedeth blood, not only in the suburbs, where the strangers dwell, but in the midst of it, where, one would think, the magistrates would, if any where, be vigilant. Even there people were murdered either in duels or by secret assassinations and poisonings, or in the courts of justice under colour of law, and there was no care taken to discover and punish the murderers, according to the law. (Gen. ix. 6.) no, nor so much as the ceremony used to expiate an uncertain murder, (Deut. xxii. 1.) and so the guilt and pollution remains upon the city. Thus thou art become guilty in thy blood that thou hast shed, v. 4. This crime is insisted most upon, for it was Jerusalem’s mea- sure, the filling sin, which is said to be that which the Lord would not pardon, 2 Kings xxiv. 4. (1.) The princes of Israel, who should have been the protectors of injured innocence, every one were to their power to shed blood, v. 6. They thirsted for it, and delighted in it, and whoever came within their power were sure to feel it; whoever lay at their mercy were sure to find none. (2.) There were those who carried tales to shed blood, v. 9. They told lies of men to the princes, to whom they knew it would be pleasing, to excite them against them; or betrayed what passed in private conversation, to make mischief among neighbours, and set them together by the ears, to bite, and devour, and worry one another, even to death. Note, Those who, by giving injudicious characters, and telling ill-natured stories of their neighbours, sow discord among brethren, will be accountable for all the mischief that follows upon it; as he that kindles a fire will be for all the hurt it does. (3.) There were those who took gifts to shed blood, (v. 12.) who were hired with money to swear a man out of his life, or, if they were upon a jury, would be bribed to give a false verdict. While this monstrous, bloody work of this kind was done in Jerusalem, we may well conclude, [1.] That men's consciences were become so wickedly profligate and scared, and their hearts hardened; for they would stick at no wickedness, which would not stick at this. [2.] That abundance of quiet, harmless, good people were made away with, whereby as the guilt of the city is increased, so the number of the temple should have stood, if they had, to turn away the wrath of God, was diminished. 2. Idiocy; She makes idols against herself to destroy herself, v. 3. And again, (v. 4.) Thou hast defiled thyself in thine idols which thou hast made. Note, Those who make idols for themselves will be found to have made them against themselves, for idolaters put a cheat upon themselves, and prepare destruction for themselves; besides that thereby they pollute themselves, they render themselves odious in the eyes of the just and jealous God, and even their mind and conscience are defiled, so that to them nothing is pure. Those who did not make idols themselves, were not found guilty of eating upon the mountains, or high places, (v. 9.) in honour of the idols, and in communion with idolaters. 3. Disobedience to parents; (v. 7.) In thee have the children set light by their father and mother, mocked them, cursed them, and despised to obey them, which was a sign of a more than ordinary corruption of nature as well as manners, and a disposition to all manner of disorder. Isa. iii. 5. They that set light by their parents, are in the high way to all wickedness. God had made many wholesome laws for the support of the paternal authority, but no care was taken to put them in execution; whereas, those who defied them, or opposed them, were both subject to the civil law, and bound to observe the laws of the land. 4. Oppression and extortion. To enrich themselves, they wronged the poor; (v. 7.) They dealt by oppression and deceit with the stranger, taking away his land, and defrauding him of his wages. They dealt contrary to those laws and customs of the country. In Jerusalem, that should have been a sanctuary to the oppressed, they vexed the fatherless and widows by unreasonable demands and impositions, and troublesome law-suits, in which might prevail against right; Thou hast taken usury and increase; (v. 12.) not only there are those in thee that do it, but thou hast done it. It was an act of the city or community, the public money, which had been employed in public charity, is put out to usury, with extortion. Thou hast greedily gained of the neighbours by violence and wrong. For neighbours to gain by one another in a way of fair trading is well, but those who are greedy of gain will not be held within the rules of equity. 5. Profanation of the Sabbath. This commonly goes along with the other sins for which they here stand indicted; (v. 8.) Thou hast despised mine holy days, holy oracles, holy ordinances, the rites which God appointed were thought too plain, too ordinary, they despised them, and therefore were found of the customs of the heathen. Note, Impurity and dishonesty are commonly found joined together; who are religious in the worship of God, Thou hast profaned not sabaths. There was not in Jerusalem that face of sabhath-sacriligion that one would have expected in the holy city. Sabbath-breaking is an iniquity that is an inlet to all iniquity. Many have owned it to contribute as much to their own ruin as any thing. 6. Uncleanliness and all manner of seventh-commandment sins, fruits of these vile affections to which God in a way of righteous judgment gives up men, to punish them for their idolatry and profaneness. (v. 13.) They have not abhorred his word, but now in the midst of it they commit lewdness; (v. 9.) it goes barfaced, though in the most scandalous instances; as that of a man's having his father's wife, which is the discovery of the father's nakedness, (v. 10.) and is a sin not to be named among Christians without the utmost detestation, (2 Cor. v. 1.) and was made a capital crime by the Levitical law. Those who are now the time to refrain from embracing has not been observed, Ex. fcir iii. 6. For they have humbled her that was set apart for her pollution. They made nothing of committing lewdness with a neighbour's wife, with a daughter-in-law, or a sister, v. 11. and shall not God visit for these things? 7. Unmindfulness of God was at the bottom of all this wickedness; (v. 12.) Thou hast forgotten me, else thou wouldst not have done thus. Note, Sinners do that which provokes God, because they forget him; they forget their descent from him, dependence on him, and obligations to him; they forget how valuable his favour is, which they make themselves unfit for; and how formidable his wrath, which they make themselves obnoxious to. That they forget their ways, forget the Lord their God, Jer. iii. 21. II. He is to pass sentence upon Jerusalem for these crimes. 1. Let her know that she has filled up the measure of her iniquity, and that her sins are such as forbid delays, and call for speedy vengeance. She has made her time to come, (v. 3.) her days to draw near; and she is come to her years of maturity for punishment, (v. 4.) as an heir that is come to age, and is ready for his inheritance. God would have been longer with them, but they were arrived at such a pitch of impudence in sin, that God could not in honour give them a further day. Note, Abused patience will at last be weary of forbearing. And when sinners (as Solomon speaks) grow overmuch wicked, they die before their time, (Ex. vii. 17.) and are cut off in their unprofitable lives. 2. Let her know that she has exposed herself, and therefore God has justly exposed her, to the contempt and scorn of all her neighbours; (v. 4.) I have made thee a reproach to the heathen, both they who are near, who are eye-witnesses of Jerusalem apostacy and degeneracy; and those afar off, who, though at a distance, will think it worth taking notice of, (v. 5.) inasmuch as they shall all mock thee. While they were reproached by their neighbours for their adherence to God, it was their honour, and they might be sure that God would roll away their reproach. But now that they are laughed at for their revolt from God, they must lie down in their shame, and must say, The Lord is righteous. They make a mock at Jerusalem, both because her sins had been very great, and because she was profaned in name, and has quite lost her credit; and because her punishment is very grievous, she is much vexed, and frets without measure at her troubles. Note, Those who vex most at their troubles, have commonly those about them who will be so much the more apt to make a jest of them. 3. Let her know that God is displeased, highly displeased especially with the city and does and will witness against it; (v. 13.) I have smitten my hand at thy dishonest gain. God, both by his precepts, and by his providence, revealed his wrath from heaven against their ungodliness and unrighteous-
Note, the oppressions they were guilty of, though they got by them, and their murders, the blood which has been in the midst of thee; and all their other sins. Note, God has sufficiently discovered how great a part of his people; and that they may not say that they have not had fair warning, he strikes his hands against the sin before he lays his hand upon the sinner. And this is a good reason why we should despise dishonest gain, even the gain of oppression, and shake our hands from holding of bribes, because these are sins against God, which God shakes his hands from, Isa. xxxviii. 15.

Let us know the wickedness of our sin, and as shew she is no match for God's judgments, v. 14. (1.) She is assured that the destruction she has deserved will come; The Lord have spoken it, and will do it. He that is true to his promises, will be true to his threatenings too, for he is not a man that he should repent. (2.) It is supposed that she thinks herself able to contend with God, and to stand a siege against his judgments; she bode defiance to the day of the Lord, Isa. v. 19. But, (3.) She is convinced of her utter inability to make her part good with him; Can thine heart endure, or can thine hand be strong, in the days that I shall deal with thee? Thou thinkest thou hast to do only with men like thyself, but shalt be made to know thou art as dust in the balance, living God. Observe here, [1.] There is a day coming when God will deal with them in the midst of their day of visitation. He deals with some, to bring them to repentance, and there is no resisting the force of convictions when he sets them on; he deals with others, to bring them to ruin; he deals with sinners in this life, when he brings upon them his sore judgments. But the day of eternity are especially the day of God; and God will deal with them then; when the full vials of God's wrath will be poured out without mixture. [2.] The wrath of God against sinners, when he comes to deal with them, will be found both intolerable and irresistible. There is no heart stout enough to endure it; it is none of the ordinances which the spirit of a man will sustain; damned sinners can neither forget nor despise their torments, nor have they any thing wherewith to cover their eyes, and bind them up like samsons. There are no hands strong enough either to ward off the strokes of God's wrath, or to break the chains with which sinners are bound over to the day of wrath. Who knows the power of God's anger?

Let her know that, since she has walked in the way of the heathen, and learned their ways; that therefore she shall have enough of them; (v. 15.) "I will not only send thee among the heathen, out of thine own land, but I will scatter thee among them, and disperse thee in the countries, to be abused and insulted by strangers." And since her filthiness and filthy ones continued in her, notwithstanding all the methods God had taken to refine her, (she was a vessel of clay,) he turns her into dross; thus his judgments contaminate her filthiness out of her; he will destroy those that were incurably bad, and reform those that were inclined to be good.

6. Let her know that God has disowned her, and cast her off; he had been her Heritage and Portion; but now, (v. 16.) "Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself, and shift for thyself, make the best haste thou canst to take away what there was of thine inheritance, that I may take it out of thy hands." Note, Those that give themselves to be ruled by their lusts, will justly be given up to be portioned by them. They that resolve to be their own masters, let them expect no other comfort and happiness than what their own hands can furnish them with, and a miserable portion it will prove; Verily, I say unto you, They have their reward. Thou in thy lifetime receivest the good things. These are the same with this, Thou shalt take thine inheritance in thyself, and when it is too late; and own it in the sight of the heathen, that I am the Lord, who alone am a portion sufficient for my people." Note, Those that have lost their interest in God, will know how to value it.

17. And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 18. Son of man, the house of Israel is to me become dross: all they are brass, and tin, and iron, and lead, in the midst of the furnace; they are even the dross of silver. 19. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because ye are all become dross, behold, therefore, I will gather you into the midst of Jerusalem. 20. As they gather silver, and brass, and iron, and lead, and tin, into the midst of the furnace, to blow the fire upon it, to melt it; so will I gather you in mine anger and in my fury, and I will leave you there, and melt you. 21. Yea, I will gather you, and blow upon you in the fire of my wrath, and ye shall be melted in the midst thereof. 22. As silver is melted in the midst of the furnace, so shall ye be melted in the midst thereof; and ye shall know that I the Lord have poured out my fury upon you.

The same melancholy string is still harped upon; and various turns given to it, to make it affecting, that it may be influencing. The prophet must here show, or at least it is here shown, that the whole house of Israel is become as dross, and that as dross they shall be consumed. What David has said concerning the wicked ones of the world, is here said concerning the wicked ones of the church, now that it is corrupt and degenerate; (Ps. cxix. 119.) Thou forgavest all the wicked of the earth like dross.

1. See here how the wretched degeneracy of the house of Israel is described. That state, in David's and Solomon's time, had been a head of gold; when the kingdoms were divided, it was as the arms of silver. But now, (1.) It is degenerated into baser metal, of no value in comparison with what it formerly was. They are all brass, and tin, and iron, and lead; which some make to signify divers classes of sinners among them; their being brass denotes the impudence of some in their wickedness, they are brass-faced, and cannot blush; their shells had been iron and brass, (Deut. xxxiii. 25.) but now their brow is so, (Isa. xlvii. 4.) Their being tin denotes the hypocritical profession of piety, with which many of them are covered; their being iron denotes the most cruel disposition of some, and their delight in war, according to the character of the iron age. Their being lead denotes their dulness, softness, and stupidity; though soft and pliable to evil, yet heavy and not moveable to good. How is the gold become dross? How is the most fine gold changed? (Isa. lxiv. 9.) Jerusalem's degeneracy bewailed, Lam. iv. 1. Yet this is not the worst; these metals, though of less value, are yet of good use. But, (2.) The house of Israel is become dross to me. So she is in God's account, whatever she is in her own and her neighbours' account. They were silver, but now they are even the dross of silver; the word signifies all the dirt, and rubbish, and worthless stuff; that are separated from the silver in the washing, melting, and refining of it. Note, Simmers, and especially degenerate professors, are in God's account as dross; vile, and contemptible, and of no account, as the evil figs which could not be eaten, they were so evil. They are useless and fit for nothing; of no consistency with themselves, and no service to man.

25. There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey: they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things; they have made her many widows in the midst thereof. 26. Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they shewed difference between the unclean and the clean, and have hid their eyes from my sabbaths, and I am profaned among them. 27. Her princes in the midst thereof are like wolves ravening the prey, to shed blood, and to destroy souls, to get dishonest gain. 28. And her prophets have daubed them with untempered mortar, seeing vanity, and divining lies unto them, saying, Thus saith the Lord God, when the Lord hath not spoken. 29. The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery, and have vexed the poor and needy: yea, they have oppressed the stranger wrongfully. 30. And I sought for a man among them, that should make up the hedge, and stand in the gap before me for the land, that I should not destroy it; but I found none. 31. Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them; I have consumed them with the fire of my wrath: their own way have I recompensed upon their heads, saith the Lord God.

Here is,

1. A general idea given of the land of Israel, how well it deserved the judgments coming to destroy it, and how much it needed these judgments to re-store it. Let us prophesy that plainly. 'Thou art the land that is not cleansed, not refined as metal is, and therefore needest to be again put into the furnace; means and methods of reformation have been ineffectual; thou art not rained upon in the day of indignation.' This was one of the judgments which God brought upon them in the day of his wrath, he withheld the rain from them, Jer. xxi. 4. "When thou art under the tokens of God's displeasure, even in the day of indignation thou art not rained upon; thou hast not received instruction by the prophets, whose doctrine is said to descend as the rain." Or, "When thou art corrected, thou art not cleansed, thy filth is not carried away as that in the streets is by a sweeping rain. Nay, though it be a day of indignation with thee, yet thy filthiness, which should be done away, is become more offensive, as that of a city is in dry weather, when it is not rained upon." Or, "Thou hast nothing to refresh and comfort thyself with in the day of indignation; thou art not rained upon by divine consolations." So the rich man in torment had not a drop of water, or rain, to cool his tongue.

II. A particular charge drawn up against the several orders and degrees of men among them, which shows that they had all helped to fill the measure of the nation's guilt, but none had done any thing toward the emptying of it; they are therefore all alike.

1. They have every one corrupted his way, and those who should have been the brightest examples of virtue, were ringleaders in iniquity and patterns of vice.

23. And the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 24. Son of man, say unto her, Thou art the land that is not cleansed, nor rained upon in the day of indignation. 25. There is a conspiracy of her prophets in the midst thereof, like a roaring lion ravening the prey: they have devoured souls; they have taken the treasure and precious things; they have made her many widows in the midst thereof. 26. Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they shewed difference between the unclean and the clean, and have hid their eyes from my sabbaths, and I am profaned among them.
which is found among pretenders to infallibility, and which they so much boast of, is only the result of a secret conspiracy against the truth. Satan is not divided against himself. The prophets are in conspiracy with the murderers and oppressors, to patronize and protect them in their wickedness, and justify what they did with their false prophecies, provided they may conceal their names. For the war is like a roaring lion ravishing the prey; they thunder out threats against them whose ruin is aimed at, terrify them, or make them odious to the people, and so make themselves masters. Note, They was a difference, their pretensions were so far from being acknowledged by the people, as they imagined. [1.] Of their lives; They have devoured souls, have been accessory to the shedding of the blood of many an innocent person, and so have made many to become sorrowful widows, and forsakeable wives. They have persecuted those to death, who witnessed against their pretensions to prophecy, and would not be imposed upon by their counterfeit commission. Or, They devoured souls by flattering sinners into a false peace and a vain hope, and seducing them into the paths of sin, which would be their eternal ruin. Note, Those who drew men to wickedness, and encouraged them in it, and so were the means of their destruction, would be accursed, both as to soul and body. [2.] Of their estates; when Nabath is slain, they take possession of his vineyard; They have seized the treasure and precious things, as forfeited; some ways or other they had of devouring the widows' houses, as the Pharisees, Matt. xxviii. 14. Or, They got this treasure, and all these precious things, as fees for false and flattering prophecies; for they were used, as says Mic. iii. 5. It was sad with Jerusalem, when such men as these passed for prophets.

(2.) The priests, who were teachers by office, and the custodians of the sacred things, and should have called the false prophets to account, were as bad as they. v. 26. [1.] They violated the law of God, which they should have observed, and taught others to observe; they made no conscience of the law of the priesthood, but openly brake it, and with contempt, as Hophni and Phinehas. They did what they had a mind, with an express non obstante— notwithstanding, to the word of God. And how should they teach the people their duty, who lived in contradiction to their own? [2.] They profaned God's holy things, about which they were to minister, and which were set apart for the service of God, from the profanation of. They suffered those to eat of the holy things, who were unqualified by the law, the table of the Lord was contempibie with them; by dealing in holy things with such unhallowed hands they did themselves profane them. [3.] They did not themselves put a difference, nor did they show the people how to put a difference, between the holy and profane, the clean and unclean, according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts who were excluded by the law, nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common; but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. [4.] They hid their eyes from God's ban and the unclean, according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts who were excluded by the law, nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common; but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. [5.] They hid their eyes from God's ban and the unclean, according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts who were excluded by the law, nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common; but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. [6.] They hid their eyes from God's ban and the unclean, according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts who were excluded by the law, nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common; but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too. [7.] They hid their eyes from God's ban and the unclean, according to the directions and distinctions of the law. They did not exclude those from God's courts who were excluded by the law, nor teach the people to observe the difference the law had made between food clean and unclean, between times and places holy and common; but lived at large themselves, and encouraged the people to do so too.

(3.) The princes, who should have interposed with their authority to redress these grievances, were as daring transgressors of the law as any other; (v. 27.) They are like wolves ravishing the prey; for such is power without justice and goodness to direct it. All their business was to gratify, [1.] Their own pride and ambition, by making themselves princes and masters of the land. [2.] Their own malice, and revenge, by shedding blood, and devorinig souls, sacrificing to their cruelty all those that stood in their way, or had in any thing disoblige them. [3.] Their own avarice, all they aim at, is to get dishonest gain, by crushing and oppressing their subjects; Lucrè bonus est odor ex quæ qualibet. Rem, rem, quæcunque modo rem.—Sweat is the odour of gain, from whatever substance it ascends. Money, made by false and bloody means, is not the sweat of all. But though they had not power sufficient to carry them on in their oppressive courses, yet how could they answer it both to their credit and to their consciences? We are told how, (v. 28.) The prophets doubted them with untempered mortar; told them, in God's name, (horrid wickedness!) that there was no harm in what they did, they might make use of the laws and the blood, and they pleased, and could do no wrong; nay, that in prosecuting such and such whom they had marked out, they did God service; and thus they stopped the mouth of their consciences; they also justified what they did, to the people, nay, and magnified it as if it were all for the public good, and so saved their reputation, and kept their oppressed subjects from murmuring. Note, Doubting prophets are the great supporters of ravening princes, but will prove at last their great deceivers, for they deal with untempered mortar which will not hold, nor will the wall stand long, that is built up with it. They pretend to be seers, but they are vanity; they pretend to be diviners, but they divine lies; they pretend a warrant from Heaven for what they say, and all the while they were saying, Thus saith the Lord God, but it is all a sham, for the Lord has not spoken any such thing.

(4.) The people that had any power in their hands, learned of their princes to abuse it, (v. 29.) They that should have complained of the oppression of the subject, and have put in a claim of rights on behalf of the injured, that should have stood up for their own and their property, were themselves invaders of it; The people of the land have used oppression, and exercised robbery. The rich oppress the poor, masters their servants, landlords their tenants, and even parents their own children; nay, the buyers and sellers will find some way to oppress one another: this is such a sin as, when it is national, is indeed a national judgment, and is threatened as such; (Isa. iii. 5.) They shall go down and shall be found among the nations, each one by his neighbour. It is an aggravation of the sin, that they have vexed the poor and needy, whom they should have relieved, and have oppressed the stranger, and deprived him of his right, to whom they ought to have been not only just, but kind. Thus was the apostacy universal, and the disease epidemical.

2. There is none that appears as an intercessor for them, (v. 30.) I sought for a man among them, that should stand in the gap, but I found none. Note, (1.) Sin makes a gap in the hedge of protection that is about a people, at which good things run out from them, and evil things pour in upon them; a gap by which God enters to destroy them. (2.) There is a way of standing in the gap, and making up the breach against the judgments of God, by repentance, and prayer, and reformation. Moses stood in the gap when he made intercession for Israel to turn away the wrath of God, Ps. cxlv. 23. (3.) When God is coming forth against a sinful people to destroy them, he expects some to intercede, and make up the breach of his people, so that he sees; so much is it his desire and delight to show mercy. If there be but a man that stands in the gap, as Abraham for Sodom, he will discover him, and be well-pleased with him. (4.) It bodes ill to a people when judgments are breaking in upon them, and the spirit of prayer is restrained, so that not one is found, that will either give them a good word, or speak a good word for them. (5.) If it is so, what can be expected but utter ruin? (v. 31.) Therefore have I poured out mine indignation upon them, have given it full scope, that it may come upon them in a full stream; yet, whatever God's wrath inflicts upon a people, it is their own way that is therein recompensed upon their heads, and God deals with them no worse, but even much better, than their iniquity deserves.

CHAPTER XXIII.

This long chapter (as before, ch. 16. and 20.) is a history of the apostacies of God's people from him, and the agony and distress of the apostacies under them, both by the infidelity of whoredom and adultery. Here the kingdoms of Israel and Judah, the ten tribes and the two, with their capital cities, Samaria and Jerusalem, are considered distinctly. Here is, 1. The apostacy of the ten tribes from God, (v. 1-8.) and their ruin for it, v. 9. 10. II. The apostacy of Judah and Jerusalem from God, (v. 11. 21.) and sentence passed upon them, that they shall be destroyed as the wicked shall be destroyed, v. 9, 35. 11. The joint wickedness of them both together, (v. 36. 44.) and the joint ruin of them both, v. 45. 49. And all that is written for warning against the sins of idolatry, and confidence in an arm of flesh, and sinful leagues and confederacies with wicked people, (which are the sins here meant by committing whoredom,) is, that others may hear and fear, and not sin after the similitude of the transgressions of Israel and Judah.

1. THE word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, there were two women, the daughters of one mother; 3. And they committed whoredoms in Egypt; they committed whoredoms in their youth; there were their breasts pressed, and there they bruised the teats of their virginity. 4. And the names of them were Aholah the elder, and Aholibah her sister; and they were mine, and they bare sons and daughters. Thus were their names, Samaria is Aholah, and Jerusalem Aholibah. 5. And Aholah played the harlot when she was mine; and she sinned on her lovers, on the Assyrians her neighbours. 6. Which were clothed with blue, captains and rulers, all of them desirable young men, horsemen riding upon horses. 7. Thus she committed her whoredoms with them, with all them who were the chosen men of Assyria, and with all on whom she sinned; with all their idols she defiled herself. 8. Neither left she her whoredoms brought from Egypt: for in her youth they lay with her, and they bruised the breasts of her virginity, and poured their whoredom upon her. 9. Wherefore I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers, into the hand of the Assyrians, upon whom she sinned. 10. These discovered her nakedness; they took her sons and her daughters, and slew her with the sword; and she became famous among women; for they had executed judgment upon her.

God had often spoken to Ezekiel, and by him to the people, to this effect, but now his word comes again; for God speaks the same thing once, yea, twice, yea, many a time, and all little enough, and too little, for man perceives it not. Note, To convince sinners of the evil of sin, and of their misery and danger by it, there is need of a phrase after phrase, line after line, so that we are to know the worst of ourselves. The sinners that are here to be exposed, are, two women, two kingdoms, sister kingdoms, Israel and Judah, daughters of one mother, having been for a long time but one people. Solomon's kingdom was so large, so populous, that immediately after his death it divided into two. Observe, 1. The number of them when they were one; (v. 3.) They committed whoredoms in Egypt, for there they were guilty of idolatry, as we read before, ch. xx. 8. The representing of those sins which are most provoking to God and most ruining to a people, by the sin of whoredom, plainly intimates what an exceeding sinful sin uncleanliness is, how offensive how destructive. Doubtless it is itself one of the worst of sins, for the worst of other sins are compared to it here, and often elsewhere; which should increase our detestation and dread of all manner of fleshly lusts, all appearances of them, and approaches to them, as warring against the soul, intoxicating sinners, bewitching them, alienating their minds from God and all that is good, debauching conscience, rendering them odious in the eyes of the pure and holy God, and drowning them at last in destruction and perdition.

2. Their names when they became two, v. 4. The kingdom of Israel is called the elder sister, because that first made the breach, and separated from the family both of kings and priests that God had appointed; the greater sister, (so the word is,) for ten tribes belonged to that kingdom, and only two to the other. God says of them both, They were mine; that is, they were the seed of Abraham his friend, and of Jacob his chosen; they were in covenant with God, and carried about with them the sign of their circumcision, the seal of the covenant. They were mine; and therefore their apostasy was the highest injustice. It was alienating God's property, it was the basest ingratitude to the best of Benefactors, and a pernicious, treacherous violation of the most sacred engagements. Note, Those who have been, in profession, the people of God, but have revolted from him, have a great deal to answer for more than those who never made any such profession. They were mine, they were espoused to me, and to me they bare sons and daughters; there were many among them that were devoted to God's honour and employed in his service, and were the strength and glory of the church; but now theyREN with the names of Holy Tabernacle: because the places of worship which that kingdom had, were of their own devising, their own choosing, and the worship itself their own invention; God never owned it, her tabernacle to herself; (so some render it,) nor did he own it, her tabernacle to herself; it was her own, she did it for herself, not to please God. Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah bear the name of Aholah—my tabernacle is in her, because her temple was the place which God himself had chosen to put his name there. He acknowledged it to be his, and honoured them with the tokens of his presence in it. Note, Of those that stand in relation to God, and make profession of his name, some have greater privileges and advantages than others, and as those who have greater, are thereby rendered the more inexcusable if they revolt from God; so those who have lesser, will not thereby be rendered excusable.

3. The treacherous departure of the kingdom of Israel from God; (v. 5.) Aholah played the harlot when she was mine. Though the ten tribes had deserted the house of David, yet God owned them for his still; though Jeroboam, in setting up the golden calves, sinned, and made Israel to sin, yet, as long as they worshipped the God of Israel only, though by images, he did not quite cast them off. But the way of sin is down-hill. Aholah played the harlot, brought in the worship of Baal, (1 Kings xvi. 31.) set up that other god, that dung-hill-god, in competition with Jehovah, (1 Kings xviii. 21.) as a vile adulterous dotes on her lovers, because they are well dressed and make a figure, because they are young and handsome, (v. 6.) clothed with blue, captains and rulers, desirable young men, gentled, and that pass for men of honour. So she doted upon her neighbours, particularly the Assyrians, who had extended their conquests near them; she admired the splendour of their festivals, and the pomp of their courts and their military strength, and courted alliances with them upon any terms, as if their own God were not sufficient to be depended upon. We find one of the kings of Israel giving a thousand talents to the king of Assyria, to engage him in his interests, 2 Kings xv. 19. She doted on the Assyrians as the heathens do on their idols, and she was thus trusted and employed in the service of the state, (v. 7.) and on all their idols with which she defile herself. Note, Whatever creature we dote upon, pay homage to, and put a confidence in, we make an idol of that creature; and whatever we make an idol of, we defile ourselves with. And now again, the conviction looks back as far as the original of their nation; Neither left she her whoredoms which she brought from Egypt, v. 8. Their being idolaters in Egypt was a thing never to be forgotten; that they should be in love with Egypt's idols, even then when they were continually in fear of Egypt's tyrants and taskmasters! But (as some have observed) therefore, at that time, when Satan boasted of his having walked through the earth as all his own, and [danced] his pretensions, God did not say, Hast thou considered my people Israel in Egypt? (For they were become idolaters, and were not to be boasted of;) but, Hast thou considered my servant Job in the land of Uz? And this corrupt disposition in them, when they were first formed into a people, is an emblem of that original corruption which is born with us, and is woven into our constitutions; a strong temptation to the flesh, like that in the Israelites toward idolatry; it was bred in the bone with them, and was charged upon them long after, that they left not their whoredoms brought from Egypt; it would never be out of the flesh, though Egypt had been a house of bondage to them; thus the corrupt affections and inclinations which we brought into the world with us, we have not been able to get rid of; and though the iniquity we were born in was the source of all the calamities which human life is liable to.

4. The destruction of the kingdom of Israel for their apostacy from God. (v. 9, 10.) I have delivered her into the hand of her lovers. God first justly gave her up to her lust, (Ephraim is joined to idols, let him alone,) and then gave her up to her lovers. The neighbouring nations, whose idolatries she had conformed to, and whose friendship she had confided in, and in both had affronted God, are now made use of as the instruments of her destruction. The Assyrians, on whom she doted, soon spied out the nakedness of the land, discovered her blind side, in which to attack her, stripped her of all her armaments and all her defences, and so uncovered her, and made her naked and bare; carried her sons and daughters into captivity, slew her with the sword, and quite destroyed that kingdom, and put an end to it. We have the story at large, 2 Kings xvii. 6, &c. where the cause of the ruin of that once flourishing kingdom by the Assyrians is showed to be their forsaking of the God of Israel, fearing other gods, and walking in the statutes of the heathens; it was for this that God was very angry with them, and removed them out of his sight, v. 18. And that the Assyrians, whom they had been so fond of, should be employed in executing judgments upon them was very remarkable, and shows how God, in a way of righteous judgment, often makes that a scourge to sinners, which they have inordinately set their hearts upon. The devil will for ever be a tormentor to those impenitent sinners who now hearken to him and comply with him as a tempter.

Thus Samaria became famous among women, or infamous rather; she became a name; (so the word is.) not only she came to be the subject of discourse, and much talked of, as the desolations of cities and kingdoms may be, but she was thus ruined for her idolatries in terrorem—for warning to all people to take heed of doing likewise; as the public execution of notorious malefactors makes them such a name, such an ill name, as may serve to frighten others from those wicked courses which have brought them to a miserable and shameful end. Deut. xxxi. 21. All Israel shall hear and fear.

10. And when her sister Aholibah saw this, she was more corrupt in her inordinate love than she, and in her whoredoms more than her sister in her whoredoms. 12. She doted upon the Assyrians her neighbours, captains and rulers clothed most gorgeously, horsemen riding upon horses, all of them desirable young men. 13. Then I saw that she was defiled, that they took both one way; 14. And that she increased her whoredoms; for when she saw men pourtrayed upon the wall, the images of the Chaldeans pourtrayed with Vernon. 15. Girded with girdles upon their loins, exceeding in dyed attire upon their heads, all of them princes to look to, after the manner of the Babylonians of Chaldea, the land of their nativity.

16. And, as soon as she saw them with her eyes, she doted upon them, and sent messengers unto them into Chaldea. 17. And the Babylonians came to her into the bed of love, and they defiled her with their whoredoms; and she was polluted with them, and her mind was alienated from them. 18. So she discovered her whoredoms, and discovered her nakedness; then my mind was alienated from her, like as my mind was alienated from her sister. 19. Yet she multiplied her whoredoms, in calling to remembrance the days of her youth, wherein she had played the harlot in the land of Egypt. 20. For she doted upon their paramours, whose flesh is as the flesh of asses, and whose issue is like the issue of horses.

21. Thus thou calledst to remembrance the lewdness of thy youth, in bruising thy teats by the Egyptians for the paps of thy youth.

The prophet Hosea, in his time, observed that the two tribes retained their integrity in a great measure, when the ten tribes had apostatized; (Hos. xi. 12.) Ephraim indeed compasseth me about with lies, but Judah yet ruleth with God, and is faithful with the saints; and this was justly expected from them; (Hos. v. 15.) They that believed not in the Lord have been come to naught, yet let not Judah offend. But this lasted not long; by some unhappy matches made between the house of David and the house of Ahab, the worship of Baal had been brought into the kingdom of Judah, but had been by the reforming kings worked out again; and at the time of the captivity of the ten tribes, which was in the reign of Hezeciah, things were in a good posture: but it lasted not long; in the time of the house of Eliakim, when King Hezeciah had seen the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, they became more corrupt than Israel had seen, in their inordinate love of idols, v. 11. Instead of being made better by the warning which that destruction gave them, they were made worse by it, as if they were displeased because the Lord had made that breach upon Israel; and for that reason they were so disposed to rebellion. Instead of being made to stand in awe of him as a jealous God, they therefore grew strange to him, and liked those gods better, that would admit of partners with them. Note, Those may justly expect God's judgments upon themselves, who do not take warning by his judgments upon others; who see in others what is the end of sin, and yet continue to make a light matter of it. But it is bad indeed with those who are made worse by that which should make them better, and have their lusts irritated and exasperated by that which was designed to suppress and subdue them. Jerusalem grew worse in her whoredoms than her sister Samaria had been in her whoredoms. This was observed before; (ch. xvi. 51.) Neither has Samaria committed any thing like this, nor shall Jerusalem, that had been a faithful city, became a harlot, Isa. xi. 21. She also doted upon the Assyrians, (v. 12.) joined in league with them, joined in worship with them; grew to be in love with their captains and rulers, and cried up them as finer and more accomplished gentlemen than any that ever the land of Israel produced: "See how richly, how Newly, they are dressed, (thither must goers shew; how well they sit a horse, they are horsermen riding on horses; how charmingly they look, all of them desirably young men." And thus they grew to affect every thing that was foreign, and to despise their own nation; and even the religion of it was mean and homely, and not to be compared with the curiosity and gaiety that was in the heathen temples. This was now the case; they were in all league, with the Chaldeans. Hezeciah himself was faulty this way, when he was proud of the court which the king of Babylon made to him, and complimented his ambassadors with the sight of all his treasures, Isa. xxxix. 2. And the humour increased; (v. 14.) She doted upon the pictures of the Babylonian captains, (v. 15. 16.) what with her with that kingdom, invited them to come and settle in Jerusalem, that they might refine the genius of the Jewish nation, and make it more polite; nay, they sent for patterns of their images, altars, and temples, and made use of them in their worship; thus was she polluted with her whoredoms, (v. 17.) and thereby she discovered her own whoredom, v. 18. her own strong inclination to idolatry. And when she had enough of the Chaldeans, and grew tired of them, and disposed to break her league with them, as Jechoniam and Zedekiah did, her mind being alienated from them, she courted the Egyptians, doted upon their paramours, (v. 19.) she was come to naught, and broken her alliance with them, and, to strengthen the alliance, would join with them in their idolatries, and then depend upon them to be their protectors from all other nations; for so wise, so rich, so strong, was the Egyptian nation, and came to such perfection in idolatry, that there is no nation now which they can take such satisfaction in as in Egypt, according to the remembrance the lewdness of their youth, (v. 19.) the lewdness of her youth, v. 21. (1.) They pleased themselves with the remembrance of it. When they began to set their affections upon Egypt, they encouraged themselves to put a confidence in that kingdom, because of the old acquaintance they had with it, as if they still retained the lust and relish of the leeks and onions they had enjoyed there, and for a season were not monuments of prison and captivity. It lasted not long, but, when they had been a while in Egypt, they learned there, and brought up with them from thence. When they began an acquaintance with Egypt, they remembered how merrily their fathers worshipped the golden calf, what music and dancing they had at that sport, which they learned in Egypt; and hoped they should now have a fair pretence to come to that again. Thus she multiplies her whoredoms, v. (2.) They called it God's remembrance, and provoked him to remember it against them. God had said indeed that he would reckon with them for the golden calf, that idol of Egypt; (Exod. xxxii. 34.) but such was his patience, that he seemed to have forgotten it, till they, by their league now with the Egyptians against the Chaldeans, did, as it were, put him in mind of it; and he is now come to the day of visitation, when he will visit, and make such an end of it as he said, visit for that. It is very observable how this adulteress changes her lovers; she dotes first on the Assyrians, then she thought the Chaldeans finer, and courted them; after awhile her mind was alienated from them, and she thought the Egyptians more powerful, (v. 26.) and she must contract an intimacy with them; which shows the folly, [1.] Of fiercely lusts, when they are indulge, they grow haughty and sly, are soon surfeited, but never satisfied, they must have variety; and what is loved one day is loathed the next. Unius adulterii matrimonium vacat, as Seneca observes. [2.] Of idolatry, Those who think one God too little, will not think a hundred sufficient, but will still be for trying more, as finding all insuffi- cient. [3.] The same thing may very well be true of others. If we stretch our hand to a strange god, shall not God search this out? Ne doubt he shall, and when he has found it, can he be pleased with it? No, (v. 18.) Then my mind was alienated from her, as it was from her sister. How could the pure and holy God any longer take delight in such a degraded generation? Note, Sin alienates God's mind from the sinner, and, justly, for it is the alienation of the sinner's mind from God, but not, and only a thousand ways, to those from whom God's mind is alienated; for whom he turns from he will turn against.

22. Therefore, O Aholiah, thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will raise up thy lovers against thee, from whom thy mind is alienated, and I will bring them against thee on every side; 23. The Babylonians, and all the Chaldeans, Pekod, and Shoal, and Koah, and all the Assyrians with them: all of them desirable young men, captains and rulers, great lords and renowned, all of them riding upon horses. 24. And they shall come against thee with chariots, wagons, and wheels, and with an assembly of people, which shall set against thee buckler, and shield, and helmet, round about: and I will set judgment before them, and they shall judge thee according to their judgments. 25. And I will set my jealousy against thee, and they shall deal furiously with thee: they shall take away thy nose and thine ears; and thy remnant shall fall by the sword: they shall take thy sons and thy daughters; and thy residue shall be devoured by the fire. 26. They shall also strip thee out of thy clothes, and take away thy fair jewels. 27. Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee, and thy whoredom brought from the land of Egypt: so that thou shalt not lift up thine eyes unto them, nor remember Egypt any more. 28. For thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will deliver thee into the hand of them whom thou hatest, into the hand of them from whom thy mind is alienated: 29. And they shall deal with thee hatefully, and shall take away all thy labour, and shall leave thee naked and bare; and the nakedness of thy whoredoms shall be discovered, both thy lewdness and thy whoredoms. 30. I will do these things unto thee, because thou hast gone a whoring after the heathen, and because thou art polluted with their idols. 31. Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister; therefore will I give her cup into thy hand. 32. Thus saith the Lord God, Thou shalt drink of thy sister's cup deep and large: thou shalt be laughed to scorn and had in derision; it containedh much. 33. Thou shalt be filled with drunkenness and sorrow, with the cup of astonishment and desolation, with the cup of thy sister Samaria. 34. Thou shalt even drink it, and suck it out, and thou shalt break the sherds thereof, and pluck off thine own breasts: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God. 35. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast forgotten me, and cast me behind thy back, therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms.

Jerusalem stands indicted by the name of Aholiah for that she, as a false traitor to her sovereign Lord the God of heaven, not having his fear before her eyes, but moved by the instigation of the devil, had revolted from her allegiance to him, had compassed and imagined to shake off his government, had kept up a correspondence, and shown a confederacy, with his enemies, and the pretenders to a still contempt of his crown and dignity: to this indictment she has pleaded, Not guilty; I am not polluted, I have not gone after Baalim. But it is found against her by the notorious evidence of the fact, and she stands convicted of it, nor has any thing material to offer why judgment should not be given, and executing the warrant and commandment of law. In these verses, therefore, we have the sentence.

1. Her old confederates must be her executioners; and those whom she had courted to be her leaders in sin, are now to be employed as instruments of her punishment; (v. 22.) "I will raise up thy lovers against thee; the Chaldeans, whom formerly thou didst so much admire, and coveted an acquaintance with, and been under a contract from whom thy mind is since alienated, and with whom thou hast perjured a broken covenant. They are called thy lovers, (v. 22.) and yet, (v. 28.) them whom thou hatest. Note, It is common for sinful love soon to turn into hatred; as Amon's to Tamar. Those of headstrong and unreasonable passions are often very hot against these persons and things, that a little before they were as hot for. Fearful run to extremes; nay, and wise men may see cause to change their sentiments. And therefore as we should rejoice and weep as if we rejoiced not and wept not; so we should love and hate as if we loved not and hated not. Ita am a tuquam omnis—Love as one who may have cause to feel aversion.

2. The execution to be done upon her is very terrible. 22. They should come against her on every side; (v. 22.) those of the seven nations that constituted the Chaldean army, (v. 23.) all of them great lords and renowned, whose pomp and grandeur and splendid appearance made them look the more amiable, when they came as friends to protect and patronise Jerusalem, but the more formidable when they came to chastise its treacherous, and aimed at no less than its ruin. (1.) They shall come with a great deal of military force, (v. 24.) with chariots and wagons, furnished with all necessary provisions for a camp, with arms and ammunition, bag and baggage, with a vast army, and well armed. (2.) They shall have justice on their sides; "I will set judgment before them;" (they shall have right with them as well as might: for, the king of Babylon had just cause to make war upon the king of Judah, because he had broken his league with him); "and therefore they shall judge thee, not only according to God's judgments, as the instruments of his justice, to punish thee for the indignities done to him, but according to their judgments, according to the law of nations, to punish thee for thy pernicious dealings with them." (3.) They shall execute the war with a great deal of fury and resentment; it being more of revenge than war, they shall deal with thee hatefully, v. 29. This will make the execution the more severe, that their words will be dipped in poison. Thou hatest them, and they shall deal hatefully with thee; those that hate, will be hated, and hatefully dealt with. (4.) God himself will lead them on, and this anger shall be upon them. (v. 24.) They shall deal hatefully against thee, that shall kindle this fire; and then they shall deal furiously with thee. If men deal ever so hatefully, ever so furiously, with us, if we have God on our side, we need not fear them, they can do us no real hurt. But if men deal furiously with us, and God set his jealousy against us too, what will become of us?

The particulars of the sentence here passed upon this notorious adulteress are, [1.] That all she has shall be seized on. The clothes and the fair jewels, with which she had endeavoured to recommend herself to her lovers, these she shall be stripped of. (v. 25.) All those things that were the ornaments of their state, shall be taken away; "They shall take away all thy labour, all that thou hast gotten by thy labour, and shall leave thee naked and bare," (v. 29.) Both city and country shall be impoverished, and all the wealth of both swept away. [2.] That her children should go into captivity; "They shall take thy sons and thy daughters, and make slaves of them, (v. 25.) for they are children of whoredoms, unworthy the dignity and privileges of Israelites," H. S. ii. 4. [3.] That she shall be stigmatized and deformed; "They shall take away thy nose and thy lips, and shall make thee barren, and naked, and bare, nude, and bald, and defiled, for ever odious," (v. 25.) This intimates the many cruelties of the Chaldean soldiers toward the Jews that fell into their hands; whom, it is probable, they used barbarously. Some will have this to be understood figuratively; and by the nose they think is meant the kingly dignity, and by the ears that of the priesthood. [4.] That she shall be exposed to shame; Thy lewdness and thy whoredoms shall be discovered; (v. 29.) as when a malefactor is punished, all his crimes are ripped up, and repeated to his disgrace; what was secret then comes to light, and what was done long since is then called to mind. [5.] That she shall be quite cut off and ruined; "The remnant of thy people that have escaped the famine and pestilence, shall fall by the sword; and the residue of thy houses that have not been battred, shall go into captivity by the sword of the fire," (v. 35.) And this shall be the end of Jerusalem.

3. Because she has trod in the steps of Samaria's sins, she must expect no other than Samaria's fate. It is common, in giving judgment, to have an eye to precedents; so has God, in passing this sentence on Jerusalem; (v. 31, &c.) Thou hast walked in the way of thy sister, notwithstanding the warning thou hast had given thee, by the fatal consequences of her wickedness; and therefore I will give her cup, her portion of miseries, into thy hand, the cup of the Lord's fury, which will be to thee a cup of trembling." Now, (1.) This cup is said to be deep and large, and to contain much, (v. 32.) abundance of God's wrath, and abundance of miseries, (v. 35.) and a cup that shall make thee feel, as that which we read of, Jer. xxv. 15, 16. The cup of divine vengeance holds a great deal, and so they will find, into whose hand it shall be put. (2.) They shall be made to drink the very dregs of this cup, as the wicked are said to do; (Ps. lxxx. 8.) "Thou shalt drink it and suck it out, not because it is pleasant, but because it is forced upon thee; (v. 34.) they shall drink the dregs of this cup, dregs only of their own bases, for indignation at the extreme bitterness of this cup, being full of the fury of the Lord," (Isa. lii. 20.) as men in great anguish tear their hair, and throw every thing from them. Finding there is no remedy, but it must be drank, (for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God,) thou shalt have no manner of patience in the drinking of it." (3.) They shall be intoxicated by it, made sick, and be at their wits' end, as men in drink are, staggering, and stumbling, and ready to fall; (v. 37.) Thou shalt be filled with the cup of fury. Note, Drunkenness has sorrow attending it, to such a degree, that the utmost confusion and astonishment are here represented by it. Who would think that that which is such a force upon nature, such a scandal to it, which deprives men of their reason, disorders them to the last degree, and is therefore expressive of the greatest misery, we should yet be able with many a beloved sin; that they should damn their own souls, to distemper their own bodies? Who has wo and sorrow like them? Prov. xxiii. 29. (4.) Being so intoxicated, they shall become as drunkards deserve to be, a laughing-stock to all about them; (v. 32.) Thou shalt be laughed to scorn, and had in derision, as acting ridiculously in every thing thou goest about. When God is about to ruin a people, he makes their judges fools, and yours contempt on their princes, Job xii. 17, 21.

4. In all this God will be justified, and by all this they will be reformed; and so the issue even of this will be God's glory and their good. (1.) They have been bad, very bad, and that justifies God in all that is brought upon them; (v. 30.) I will do these things unto thee, because thou hast gone a whoring after other gods, and have not kept the covenant of God that brought thee out of Egypt. (2.) Some that are thus hardened, I have forgotten; (v. 34.) To whom I had made a covenant, and brought them out of Egypt; Who has wo and sorrow like them? But this will not be so, my thou shall not be forgotten, and cast me behind thy back. Note, Forgetfulness of God, and a contempt of him, of his eye upon us, and authority over us, are at the bottom of all our treacherous and adulterous departures from him. Therefore men wander after idols, because they forget God, and their obligations to him; nor could they look with so much desire and delight upon the baits of sin, if they did not forget God behind their back, as not worthy to be regarded. And those who put such an affront upon God, how can they think but that it should turn upon themselves at last? Therefore bear thou also thy lewdness and thy whoredoms; that is, thou shalt suffer the punishment of it, and then alone must bear the blame. Men need no more to sink them than the weight of their own sins; and they who will not part with them, will never be beloved; and if they do not bear them, (2.) They shall be better, much better, and this fire, though consuming to many, shall be refining to a remnant; (v. 27.) Thus will I make thy lewdness to cease from thee. The judgments which were brought upon them by their sins, parted between them and their sins, and taught them at length to say, What have we to do any more with idols? Observe, [1.] How inexpressive the change was; Thy whoredoms were brought from the land of Egypt. Their disposition to idolatry was early and innate, their practice of it was ancient, and had gained a sort of prescription by long usage. [2.] How complete the cure was, notwithstanding; "Though it has taken root, yet it shall be made to cease, to the end that they shall not so much as lift up their eyes;" Observe, [1.] How inexpressive the change was; Thy whoredoms were brought from the land of Egypt. They "shall not make any more idols;" Observe, [1.] How inexpressive the change was; Thy whoredoms were brought from the land of Egypt. They "shall not make any more idols." They shall avoid the occasions of this sin, for they shall not so much as look upon an idol, lest their hearts should unawares walk after their eyes. And they shall abandon all inclinations to it; They shall not remember Egypt, they shall not retain any of that affection for idols, which they had from the very infancy of their nation; but, though their captivity, their bondage in Egypt, and lost it through the grace of God, in their captivity in Babylon, which this was the blessed fruit of, even the taking away of sin; of that sin; so that whereas, before the captivity, no nation (all things considered) was more inopportunely bent upon idols and idolatry than they were, after that captivity, no nation was more
36. The Lord said moreover unto me, Son of man, wilt thou judge Aholah and Ahollibah? yea, declare unto them their abominations; 37. That they have committed adultery, and blood is in their hands, and with their idols have they committed adultery; and have also caused their sons, whom they bare unto me, to pass for them through the fire, to devour them. 38. Moreover, this they have done unto me: they have defiled my sanctuary in the same day, and have profaned my sabbaths. 39. For when they had slain their children to their idols, then they came the same day into my sanctuary to profane it; and, lo, thus have they done in the midst of my house. 40. And furthermore, that ye have sent for men to come from far, unto whom a messenger was sent; and, lo, they came; for whom thou didst wash thyself, paintedst thine eyes, and deckedst thyself with ornaments, 41. And sattest upon a stately bed, and a table prepared before it, whereupon thou hast set mine incense and mine oil. 42. And a voice of a multitude being at ease was with her: and with the men of the common sort were brought Sabeans from the wilderness, which put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads. 43. Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries, Will they now commit whoredoms with her, and she with them? 44. Yet they went in unto her, as they go in unto a woman that playeth the harlot; so went they in unto Aholah and unto Ahollibah, the lewd women. 45. And the righteous men, they shall judge them after the manner of the adulteresses, and after the manner of women that shed blood; because they are adulteresses, and blood is in their hands. 46. For thus saith the Lord God, I will bring up a company upon them, and will give them to be removed and spoiled. 47. And the company shall stone them with stones, and despacht them with their swords; they shall slay their sons and their daughters, and burn up their houses with fire. 48. Thus will I cause lewdness to cease out of the land, that all women may be taught not to do after your lewdness. 49. And they shall recompense your lewdness upon you, and ye shall bear the sins of your idols: and ye shall know that I am the Lord God.

After the ten tribes were carried into captivity, and that kingdom was made quite desolate, the remains of it by degrees incorporated with the kingdom of Judah, and gained a settlement (many of them) in Jerusalem; so that the two sisters were in effect become one again: and therefore, in these verses, the prophet takes those to task jointly, who were thus conjoined; "Wilt thou judge Aholah and Ahollibah together?" v. 36. Wilt thou go about to excuse them? Thou seest the matter is so bad as not to bear an excuse." Or, rather, "They shall now be employed, in God's name, to judge them, ch. xx. 4. The matter is rather worse than better since the union."

1. Let them be made to see the sins they are guilty of; declare unto them openly and boldly their abominations.

2. They have been guilty of gross idolatries; here called adultery; With their idols they have committed adultery, (v. 37,) have broken their marriage-covenant with God; have lusted after the gratifications of a carnal, sensual mind in the worship of God. This is the first and worst of the abominations he is to charge them with.

3. They have committed the most barbarous murders, in slaughtering their children to Moloch, a sin so unnatural, that they deserve to bear of it on all occasions; Blood is in their hands, innocent blood, the blood of their own children, which they have caused to pass through the fire, (v. 37,) not that they might be dedicated to the idols, but that they might be devoured; a sign that they loved their idols better than that which was dearest to them in the world.

3. They have profaned the sacred things with which God had dignified and distinguished them; this they have done unto me, this indignity, this injury, v. 38. Every contempt put upon that which is holy, reflects upon him who is the Fountain of holiness, and from a relation to whom whatever is called holy has its denomination. God had set up his sanctuary among them, but they defiled it, by making it a house of merchandise, a den of thieves; nay, and much worse, there they set up their idols, and worshipped them, and there they shed the blood of God's prophets. God had revealed to them his holy sabbaths, but they profaned them, by doing all manner of servile work therein, or perhaps by sports and recreations on that day, not only practised, but encouraged, by authority. They defiled the sanctuary, and the sabbath-day also, by what they profaned sabbath. To defile the sanctuary was bad enough on any day, but to do it on the sabbath-day was an aggravation. We commonly say, the better day, the better deed; but here, the better day, the worse deed. God takes notice of all circumstances of sin, which add to the guilt. He shows (v. 39,) the shame which was theirs for so long as both of the sanctuary and of the sabbath. They slew their children, and sacrificed them to their idols, to the great dishonour both of God and of the human nature; and then came, the same day, their hands imbored with the blood of their children, and their clothes stained with it, to attend in God's sanctuary; not to ask pardon for what they had done, but to present themselves before him, and tell him, "We do thee homage, we accept the sacrifice, we are reconciled to thee, and we are reconciled to our sins.""But the Lord knew their thoughts. They did not repent, but continued to do evil; and consequently he waited upon them with anger only, and punished them with vengeance.

Note. 1. It is a punishment of God's solemn ordinances, when those that are grossly and openly profane and violate, impudently and ineptly so intrude upon the services and privileges of them. Give not that which is holy unto dogs. Friend, how camest thou in hither?
4. They have courted foreign alliances, being proud of them, and repose a confidence in them. This also is represented by the sin of adultery, for it was a departure from God, not only to whom alone they ought to pay their homage, and to whom alone their applause, but in whom alone they ought to put their trust, and not in creatures. Israel was a peculiar people, must dwell alone, and not be reckoned among the nations; and they profane their crown, and by their honour in the dust, when they covet to be like them, or in league with them. But this they have now done; they have entered into strict alliances with the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, the most renowned and potent kingdoms at that time; but they scorned alliances with the petty kingdoms and states that lay near them, which yet might have been of more real service to them.

Note, Affecting an acquaintance and correspondence with great people has often been a snare to good people. Let us see how Jerusalem courts her high allies, thinking thereby to make herself considerable.

(1.) She privately requested that a public embassy might be sent to her; (v. 40.) You sent a messenger for men to come from far. It seems, then, that the neighbours had no desire to come into a confederacy with Jerusalem, but she thrust herself upon them, and sent underhand to desire them to court her; and, if, they came. The wisest and best men in the world have been known to have been in favor to work and conversation with profane and wicked people; but it is no sign either of wisdom or goodness to covet an intimacy with such, and to court it.

(2.) Great preparation is made for the reception of these foreign ministers, for their public entry and public audience; which is compared to the pains that an adulteress takes to make herself look handsome in Jezebel-like, that Jezebel-like, thouaintedst thy face, and deckest thyself with ornaments. 8. Jews and princes made themselves new clothes, fitted up the rooms of state, beautified the furniture, and made it look fresh. Thou satest upon a stately bed, (v. 41.) a stately throne; a table was prepared, wherewith thou hast set mine oil and mine incense.

This was either, [1.] A feast for the ambassadors, a public treat, agreeable to the other preparations. They were at a sense and concert, and oil to anoint their heads. Or, [2.] An altar already furnished for the ambassadors use in the worship of their idols; let them know that the Israelites were not so strait-laced but that they could allow foreigners the free exercise of their religion among them, and furnish them with chapels, yea, and complimented them so far as to join with them in their devotions; though the law of their God was another; yet they could easily dispense with themselves to oblige a friend. The oil and incense God calls his, not only because they were the gift of his providence, but because they should have been offered at his altar; which was an aggravation of their sin in serving idols and idolaters with them. See Hos. ii. 8.

(3.) There was great joy at their coming, as if it were the common sorrow, and the common sadness, and the common grief to Jerusalem; for you before; (v. 42.) a voice of a multitude being at ease was with her. The people were very easy, for they thought themselves very safe and happy now that they had such powerful allies; and therefore attended the ambassadors with loud huzzas and acclamations of joy. A great confluence of people there was to the court upon this occasion. The men of the common sort were there to grace the solemnity, and to increase the crowds; and with them were brought Sabians from the wilderness. The margin reads it drunken from the wilderness, that would drink healths to the prosperity of this grand alliance, and force them upon others, and be most noisy in shouting upon this occasion. Who ever they were, in honour of the ambassadors, they put bracelets upon their hands, and beautiful crowns upon their heads, which made the cavalcade appear very splendid.

(4.) God by his prophets warned them against making their foreign alliances with foreign nations; (v. 43.) Then said I unto her that was old in adulteries, that from the first was fain of leagues with heathens, (Judg. iii. 6.) and afterward of making alliances with their kingdoms; and, though often disappointed therein, would never be dissuaded from it; (This was the adultery she was old in.) I said, Will they then commit whoredoms with her, and live? Surely experience and observation will by this time have convinced both them and her, that an alliance between the nations of the Jews and a heathen nation can never be for the advantage of either. They are iron and clay that will not mix, nor will God bless it, or smile upon it. But, it seems, her being old in these adulteries, instead of weaning her from them, as one would expect, does but make her the more impudent and insolent in them; for though she was thus admonished of the folly of it, yet they went in unto her, v. 44. A bargain was soon clapped up, and a league made, first with this, and then with the other, foreign state. Samaria did so, Jerusalem did so, like lewd women. They could not rest satisfied in the embraces of God's laws and statutes, and the assurance of protection he gave them; they could not think he could secure them with them security enough. But they must by treaties and leagues, politic ones (they thought) and well concerted, throw themselves into the arms of foreign princes, and put their interests under their protection. Note, These hearts go a whoring from God, that take a complacency in the pomp of the world, and put a confidence in its wealth, and in an arm of flesh.

II. Let them be made to foresee the judgments that are coming upon them for these sins; (v. 45.) The righteous men, they shall judge them. Some make the instruments of their destruction to be the righteous men that shall judge them. The Assyrians that destroyed Samaria, the Chaldeans that destroyed Jerusalem, those were comparatively righteous, had a more regard for justice between man and man, and were more abundantly justly represented the treachery of the Jewish nation; however, they executed God's judgments, which, we are sure, are all righteous. Others understand it of the prophets, whose office it was, in God's name, to judge them, and pass sentence upon them. Or, we may take it as an appeal to all righteous men, to all that have a sense of equity; they shall be judged concerning these things, and agree in their verdict, that, forsooth as they have been notoriously guilty of adultery and murder, and the guilt is national, therefore they ought to suffer the pains and penalties which by law are inflicted upon women in their personal capacity, that shed blood, and are adulteresses. Righteous men will say, "Why should bloody, filthy cities escape any better than bloody, filthy persons? Judge, I pray thee," Isa. v. 3.

This judgment being given by the righteous men, the righteous God will award execution. See here,

1. What the execution will be, v. 46, 47. The same as before, v. 25, &c. God will bring a company of enemies upon them, who shall be made to serve his holy purposes, even then when they are serving their own sinful appetites and passions. These enemies shall easily prevail, for God will give them into their hands to be removed and spoiled; this company shall stone them with stones as male factors; shall single them out, and despatch them with their swords; and, as was sometimes done in severe executions, (witness of Achan,) they shall slay their children, and burn their houses. 2. What will be the effects of it. (1.) Thus they shall suffer for their sins; Their lewdness shall be recompensed upon them; (v. 49.) and they shall bear the sins of their idols, v. 35, 49. Thus God will assart the honour of his broken law and injured government, and let the world know what a just and jealous God he is. (2.) Thus shall they suffer, 1. From God: I will cause lewdness to cease out of the land, v. 27, 48. The destruction of God's city, like the death of God's saints, shall do that for them which ordinances and providences before could not do, it shall quite take away their sin; so that Jerusalem shall rise out of its ashes a new lump, as gold comes out of the furnace, purified from its dross. (2.) Thus shall they suffer, 2. From enemies: I will give them up to the hands of the heathen, and nations, and restless enemies, shall bring upon them blindness, so as to blind them, and make them mad; blindness shall lie upon them, from the least of them even to the greatest, v. 49. They shall be as one that treadeth upon a snare; they shall stumble and fall, and it shall be the hand of the Lord that shall bring it upon them, v. 50.

CHAP. XXIV.

Here are two sermons, in this chapter, preached on a particular occasion, and they are both from mount Sinai, the mount of terror, both from mount Hesh, the mount of curses; both speak the approaching fate of Jerusalem. The occasion of them was the king of Babylon's laying siege to Jerusalem, and the design of them is to show that in the day of God's purpose, that he shall be not only master of the place, but destroyer of it. 1. By the sign of flesh boiling in a pot over the fire, are showed the miseries that Jerusalem should suffer during the siege, and justly, for her filthiness, v. 1-14. 2. By the sign of Ezekiel's apt mourning for the death of his wife, is showed that the calamities coming upon Jerusalem were too great to be lamented, so great that they should sink down under them into a silent despair, v. 15-27.

1. AGAIN, in the ninth year, in the tenth month, of the day of the month, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, write thee the name of the day, even of this same day; the king of Babylon set himself against Jerusalem this same day. 3. And utter a parable unto the rebellious house, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Set on a pot, set it on, and also pour water into it: 4. Gather the pieces thereof into it, even every good piece, the thigh, and the shoulder; fill it with the choice bones. 5. Take the choice of the flock, and burn also the bones under it, and make it boil well, and let them seethe the bones of it therein. 6. Wherefore thus saith the Lord God, Wo to the bloody city! I will even make the pile for fire great. 10. Heap on wood, kindle the fire, consume the flesh, and space it well, and let the bones be burnt. 11. Then set it empty upon the coals thereof, that the brass of it may be hot, and may burn, and that the filthiness of it may be molten in it, that the scum of it may be consumed. 12. She hath wearied herself with lies, and her great scum went not forth out of her; her scum shall be in the fire. 13. In thy filthiness is lewdness: because I have purged thee, and thou wast not purged, thou shalt not be purged from thy filthiness any more, till I have caused mine fury to rest upon thee. 14. I the Lord have spoken it; it shall come to pass, and I will do it; I will not go back, neither will I spare, neither will I repent: according to thy ways, and according to thy doings, shall they judge thee, saith the Lord God. 15. We have here, 1. The notice God gives to Ezekiel in Babylon of Nebuchadnezzar's laying siege to Jerusalem, just at the time when he was doing it; (v. 2.) "Son of man, take notice, the king of Babylon, who is now abroad with his army, thou knowest not where, set up a sign board against Jerusalem this same day." It was many miles, it was many days' journey, from Jerusalem to Babylon; perhaps the last intelligence they had from the army was, that the design was upon Rabbath of the children of Ammon, and that the campaign was to be opened with the siege of that city. But God knew, and could tell the prophet. This day, at this time, Jerusalem is invested, and the Chaldean army is set down before it. Note, As all times, so all places, even the most remote, are present with God, and under his view. He tells it the prophet, that the prophet might tell it the people, that so, when it proved to be punctually true, as they would find by the public intelligence in a little time, it might be a confirmation of the prophet's mission, and they might infer that, since he had right news, he was so in his predictions, for he owed both to the same correspondence he had with Heaven. 2. The notice which he orders him to take of it. He must enter it in his book, memorandum, that in the ninth year of Jehoiachin's captivity, (for thence Ezekiel dated, ch. i, 2, which was also the ninth year of Zechariah's reign,) for he began to reign when Jehoiachin was carried off; in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, the king of Babylon laid siege to Jerusalem; and the date here agrees exactly with the date in the history, 2 Kings xxv. 1. See how God reveals things to his servants the prophets, especially these things which serve to confirm their word, and so to confirm their own faith. Note, It is good to keep an exact account of the times and seasons of God's dealings, in order sometimes to contribute to the manifesting of God's glory so much the more in them, and the explaining and confirming of scripture-prophecies. Known unto God are all his works. 3. The notice which he orders him to give to the people thereupon, the purport of which is, that he should lay siege to Jerusalem, now begun, will infallibly end in the ruin of it. This he must say to the rebellious house, to those of them that were in Babylon, to be by them communicated to those that were yet in their own land. A rebellious house will soon be a ruinous house.

1. He must show them this by a sign; for that stupid people needed to be taught as children are. The comparison made use of is that of a boiling pot. This agrees with Jeremiah's vision many years before, when he first began to be a prophet, and, probably, was designed by God. (Jer. ii. 11.) And a weeping pot, with the face toward the north; and the explanation of it, (v. 15.) makes it to signify the besieging of Jerusalem by the northern nations. And as this comparison is intended to confirm Jeremiah's vision, so also to confront the vain confidence of the princes of Jerusalem, who had said, (ch. xi. 5.) This city is the caldron, and we are the flesh; meaning, We are safe, hemmed in, surrounded with walls of brass. "Well," says God, "it shall be so, you shall be boiled in Jerusalem, as the flesh in the caldron, boiled to pieces; let the pot be set on with water in it; (v. 4.) let it be filled with the flesh of the choice of the flock, (v. 5.) with the choice pieces, (v. 4.) and the marrow-bones, and let the other bones serve for fuel, that, one way or other, all might be consumed. Nay, in the place of the pot will be burnt; and yet there was no getting out of it, but they must be forced to abide by it, as the flesh in a boiling pot.

2. He must give them a comment upon this sign. It is to be construed as a wo to the bloody city, v. 6. And again, (v. 9.) being bloody, let it go to pot, to be boiled, it is the fittest place for it. Let us here see,

(1.) What is the cause God takes with it. Jerusalem, during the siege, is like a pot boiling over the fire, all in a heat, all in a hurry. [1.] Care is taken to keep a good fire under the pot, which signifies the cleseness of the siege, and the many vigorous attacks made upon the city by the besiegers, and especially the continued wrath of God burning against them; (v. 9.) I will make the fire for great. Commission is given to them, (v. 10.) to heap on wood, and kindle the fire; to make Jerusalem more and more hot to the inhabitants. Note, The fire which God kindles for the consuming of impious sinners, shall never abate, much less go out, for want of fuel. Tophet has fire and much wood. Isa. xxx. 33. [2.] The meat, as it is boiled, is taken out, and given to the Chaldeans for them to feast upon. "Consume the flesh, let it be thoroughly boiled; fire it well, and make it savoury, for those that will feed sweeterly upon it; let the bones be burnt;" (either the bones under the pot, let them be consumed with the other fuel, or, as some think, the bones in the pot;) "let it boil so furiously, that not only the flesh may be sodden, but even the bones softened; let all the inhabitants of Jerusalem be, by sickness, sword, and famine, destroyed, boiled to rage; spew it to all;" (v. 6.) "Bring it out piece by piece; let every man be delivered into the enemy's hand, to be either put to the sword, or made a prisoner. Let them be an easy prey to them, and let the Chaldeans fall upon them as eagerly as a hungry man devours upon a good dish of meat, when it is set before him. Let no lot fall upon it; every piece in the pot shall be fetched out, and devoured, first or last, and therefore it is no matter for casting lots which shall be fetched out first."

It was a very severe military execution, when David measured Moab with two lines to put to death, and one full line to keep alive, 2. Sam. vii. 2. But here is no line, no lot of mercy, made use of; all goes one way, and that is to destruction. [3.] When all the broth is boiled away, the pot is set empty upon the coals, that it may burn too, which signifies the setting of the city on fire, v. 11. The scum of the land, the scum of the pot, is that all the rest of the meat, is so got into the pot, that there is no making it clean by washing or scouring it, and therefore it must be done by fire; so let the fierceness be burnt out of it, or, rather, molten in it, and burnt with it. Let the vipers and their nest be consumed together.

(2.) What is the quarrel God has with it. He would not take these severe methods with Jerusalem, but that he is provoked to it; she deserves to be thus dealt with, for,

[1.] It is a bloody city; (v. 7, 8.) Her blood is in the midst of her. Many a barbarous murder has been committed in the very heart of the city; and, they have a disposition to cruelty in their hearts; they inwardly delight in bloodshed, and so it is in the midst of them. Nay, they commit their murder by the destruction of the walls, the fortifications, and the seats of power, and then they did not avail them, in defence of the justice both of God and man. She did not pour out the blood she shed upon the ground, to cover it with dust, as being ashamed of the sin, or afraid of the punishment. She did not look upon it as a filthy thing, proper to be concealed, (Dent. xxviii. 13.) much less dangerous, Nay, she poured out the innocent blood she shed, after a rood up, and take vengeance, n. 8. It could not be avoided, but that God must in anger visit for these things, his soul must be avenged on such a nation as this. If such impudent murders as these, that even dare divine vengeance, go unpunished, it will be said that God has forsaken the earth. It is absolutely necessary that such a bloody city as this should have blood given her to drink, for she is worthy, for the vindicating of the honour of divine justice. And the crime being public and notorious, it is fit that the punishment should be so too; I have set her blood on the top of a rock. Jerusalem was to be made an example, and therefore was made a spectacle, to the world; God dealt with her according to the law of retaliation. It is fit that those who sin before all, should be rebuked before all; and that their reputation should not be consulted by the condignity of their punishment. But, for this, they were so impudent as not to desire the concealment of their sin.

[2.] It is a filthy city. Great notice is taken, in this explanation of the comparison, of the scum of this pot, which signifies the sin of Jerusalem, working up and appearing when the judgments of God were upon her. It is the potstave scum is therein, (v. 10.) out of the meat, or, as some think, out of the water. It is the scum that went not forth out of her, (v. 12.) that stuck to the pot when all was boiled away, and was molten in it; (v. 11.) some of this runs over into the fire, (v. 12.) inflames that, and makes it burn the more furiously, but it shall all be consumed at last, v. 11. When the hand of God was gone out against them, instead of humbling themselves under it, repenting and reforming, and according the punishment of their impiety, they grew more impudent and outrageous in sin; quarrelled with God, persecuted his prophets, were fierce to one another, enraged to the last degree against the Chaldeans, scarcely at the stone, gnawed: their chain, and were like a wild bull in a net. This was their scour; in their distress they trespassed yet more against the Lord; like that king Ahaz, 2 Chron. xxviii. 22. There is little hope of those who are made worse by that which should make them better; whose corruptions are excised and exasperated by those rebukes both of the word and of the providence of God, whom they despised and of the suppressing and subduing of them; or of those whose scour boiled up once in convictions, and confessions of sin, as if it would be taken off by reformation, but afterward returned again in a revolt from their good overtures; and the heart that seemed softened is hardened again. This was Jerusalem's case. She has sworn with lies, wearied God with purposes and promises of amendment, which she never stood to, swear'd herself with her carnal confidences, which have all deceived her, v. 12. Note, Those that follow lying vanities, weary themselves with the pursuit. Now see her doom, v. 13, 14. Because she is incurably wicked, she is abandoned to ruin, without remedy. First, Methods and means of reformation were to be used, v. 13. Do thy fitness in weakness; thou art become obstinate and impudent in it; then hast got a habit of it, which is confirmed by frequent acts. In thy fitness there is a rooted lewdness; as appears by this, I have hurst thee, and thou wast not hurst. I have given thee medicine, but it has done thee no good. I have used the means of cleansing thee, but they have been ineffectual; the intention of them has not been answered. "No. It is sad to think how many there are on whom ordinances and providences are all lost. Secondly, It is therefore resolved that no more such methods shall be used; Thou shalt not be hurst from thy fitness any more. The fire shall no longer be a refining fire, but a consuming fire, and therefore shall not be mitigated and shortened; it has been, but shall be continued in extremity, till it has done its destroying work. Note, Those that will not be healed, are justly given up, and their case adjudged desperate. There is a day coming when it will be said, He that is filthy, let him be filthy still. Thirdly, Nothing remains then but to bring them to utter ruin; I will cause my fiery rage to come upon them, and consume them. Those of the common sort are cast in the midst of the Jew's wrath, that wrath is come upon them to the uttermost, 1 Thess. ii. 16. They deserve it; According to thy doings they shall judge thee, v. 14. And God will do it. The sentence is bound on with repeated ratifications, that they might be awakened to see how certain their ruin was; "If the Lord have spoken it, who am able to make good what I have spoken; it shall come to pass, nothing shall prevent it, for I will do it myself, I will not go back upon any entreaties, the decree is gone forth, and I will not spare in compassion to them, neither will I repent." He will neither change his mind nor his way. Hereby the prophet was forbidden to intercede for them, and they were forbidden to flatter themselves with hopes of an escape. God hath said it, and he will do it. Note, The declarations of God's wrath against sinners are as inviolable as the assurances he has given of favour to his people; and the case of such is sad indeed, who have brought it to this issue, that either God must be false, or they must be damned. 15. Also the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 16. Son of man, behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke; yet shall not thou mourn nor weep, neither shall thy tears run down. 17. Forbear to cry, make no mourning for the dead, bind the tire of thy head upon thee, and put on thy shoes upon thy feet, and cover not thy lips, and eat not the bread of men. 18. So I spoke unto the people in the morning; and even my wife died; and I did in the morning as I was commanded. 19. And the people said unto me, Wilt thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou doest so? 20. Then I answered them, The word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 21. Speak unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will profane my sanctuary, the excellency of your strength, the desire of your eyes, and that which your soul pitteth; and your sons and your daughters whom ye have left shall fall by the sword. 22. And ye shall do as I have done; ye shall not cover your lips, nor eat the bread of men. 23. And your tires shall be upon your heads, and your shoes upon your feet; ye shall not mourn nor weep; but ye shall pine away for your iniquities, and mourn one towards another. 24. Thus Ezekiel is unto you a sign: according to all that he hath done shall ye do; and when this cometh, ye shall know that I am the Lord God. 25. Also, thou son of man, shall it not be in the day when I take from them their strength, the joy of their glory, the desire of their eyes, and that wherupon they set their minds, their sons and their daughters, 26. That he that escapeth in that day shall come unto thee, to cause thee to hear it with thine ears! 27. In that day shall thy mouth be opened to him which is escaped, and thou shalt speak, and be no more dumb; and thou shalt be a sign unto them; and they shall know that I am the Lord. 28. These verses conclude what we have been upon all along from the beginning of this book, to wit, Ezekiel's prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem; for, after this, though he prophesied much concerning other nations, yet he said no more concerning Jerusalem, till he heard of the destruction of it, almost three years after, ch. xxxiii. 21. He had assured them, in the former part of this chapter, that there was no hope at all of the preventing of the trouble; here he assures them that they should not have the ease of weeping for it. Observe here, 1. The sign by which this was represented to them, and were a sign that cost the prophet very dear; the more shame for them, that when he, by a divine appointment, was at such an expense to affect them with what he had to deliver, yet they were not affected by it. 1. He must lose a good wife, that should suddenly be taken from him by death. God gave him notice of it before, that it might be the less surprize to him; (v. 16.) Behold, I take away from thee the desire of thine eyes with a stroke. Note, (1.) A married state may very well agree with the prophetic office; it is honourable in all, and therefore not sinful in ministers. (2.) Much of the comfort of human life lies in agreeable relations: no doubt, Ezekiel found a prudent, tender yoke-fellow, that shared with him in his griefs and cares, to be a happy companion in his captivity. (3.) Those in the conjugal relation must be to each other not only a covering of the eyes, (Gen. xx. 16.) to restrain wandering looks after others; but a desire of the eyes, to engage pleasing looks on one another. A beloved wife is the desire of the eyes, which find not any object more grateful. (4.) That is least safe which is most dear. Our masters, if we have lost our own, they may be removed from us, and may become the sorrow of our hearts; which is a good reason why those who have wives, should be as though they had none, and those who rejoice in them, as though they rejoiced not. 1 Cor. vii. 29, 30. Death is a stroke which the most pious, the most useful, the most amiable, are not exempted from. (5.) When the desire of our eyes is taken away with a stroke, we must see and own the hand of God in it; it takes from us the desire of thine eyes. He takes our creature-comforts from us when and how he pleases; he gave them to us, but reserved to himself a property in them; and may he not do what he will with his own? (6.) Under afflictions of this kind, it is good for us to remember that we are sons of men; for so God called the prophet here. If thou art a son of Adam, thou art liable to man's infirmities, and therefore a dying creature. It is an affliction which the children of men are liable to; and shall the earth be forsaken for us? According to this prediction, he tells us, (v. 18.) I spoke unto the people in the morning: for God sent his prophets, rising up early, and sending them; then he thought, if ever, they would be disposed to hearken to him. Observe, [1.] Though God had given Ezekiel a certain prospect of this affliction coming upon him, yet it did not take him off from his work, but he resolved to go on in that. [2.] We may the more easily bear an affliction, if it find us in the way of our duty; for nothing can hurt us, nothing come amiss to us, while we keep ourselves in the love of God.

2. He must deny himself the satisfaction of mourning for his wife, which would have been both an honour to her and an ease to the oppression of his own spirit. He must not use the natural expressions of sorrow. v. 16. He must not give vent to his passion by weeping, or letting his tears run down; though tears are a tribute due to the dead, and, when the body is gone, it is fit that it should thus be watered. But Ezekiel is not allowed to do this; though he thought he had as much reason to do it as any man, and as much occasion to do it as any man, as his friends, the morning before the day of his wife's death, desired (v. 15,) that if he did it not, much less might he use the customary formalities of mourners. He must dress himself in his usual attire, must bind his turban on him, here called the targe of his head, must put on his shoes, and not go barefoot, as was usual in such cases; he must not cover his lips, nor throw a veil over his face, (as mourners were wont to do, Lev. xvi. 29.) must not be as a mourner, nor sit upon ashes, nor sit upon sackcloth, nor fast, Matt. xvi. 18. He must not eat the bread of men, nor expect that his neighbours and friends should send him in provisions, as usually they did in such cases, presuming the mourners had no heart to provide met for themselves; but, if it were sent, he must not eat of it, but go on in his business as at other times. It could not but be some sacrifice to him to refrain from flesh and blood, not to lament the death of his wife too much: (v. 16.) But I did in the morning as I was commanded. He appeared in public, in his usual habit, and looked as he used to do, without any signs of mourning. (1.) There was something peculiar, and Ezekiel, to make himself a sign to the people, must put a force upon himself, and exercise an extraordinary piece of self-denial. Note, Our dispositions must always submit to God's directions, and his command must be obeyed, even in that which is most difficult and displeasing to us. (2.) Though mourning for the dead is a severe duty, it must always be kept under the government of religion and right reason, and we must not sorrow as those that have no hope, nor lament the loss of any creature, even the most valuable, and that which we could worst spare, as if we had lost our God, or as if all our happiness were gone with it; and of this overreverence in mourning, ministers, when it is their case, ought to take care. They must carefully reserve a due time to study in all the affliction, to accommodate ourselves to it, and to get our acquaintance with the other world increased, by the removal of our dear relations, and learn with holy Job to bless the name of the Lord, even when he takes as well as when he gives.

II. The explication and application of this siege. The people inquire the meaning of it: (v. 19.) Will thou not tell us what these things are to us, that thou dost not? They knew that Ezekiel was an affectionate husband, that the death of his wife was a great affliction to him, and that he would not appear so unconcerned at it but for some good reason, and for instruction to them; and perhaps they were in hopes that it had a favourable signification, and that they might be comforted by it, and that they might be comforted again according to the time he had afflicted them, and make them look pleasant again. Note, When we are inquiring concerning the things of God, our inquiry must be, "What are those things to us? What are we concerned in them? What conviction, what counsel, what comfort, do they speak to us? Wherein do they reach our case?" Ezekiel answers them an answer verbatim, as he had received it from the Lord, who had told him what he must speak to the house of Israel.

1. Let them know that as Ezekiel's wife was taken from him by a stroke, so would God take from them all that which was dearest to them, v. 21. If this were done to the green trees, what shall be done to the dry? If a faithful servant of God was thus afflicted only for his trial, shall such a generation of rebels against God go unpunished? By this awakening providence God showed that he was in earnest in his threatenings, and inexorable. We may suppose that Ezekiel prayed that, if it were the will of God, his wife might be spared to him, but God would not hear him; and should he be heard then in his intercessions for this provoking people! No, it is determined; God will take away the desire of your eyes. Note, The removal of what is most to us, shows us that we should awaken us to think of parting with ours too; for are we better than they? We know not how soon the same cup, or a more bitter one, may be put into our hands, and should therefore weep with them that weep, as being ourselves also in the body. God will take away that which their soul delights in, of which they say, What profit is it to them? that it should be cut off from among the living; that God should take away the desire of their eyes. (so some read it;) ye shall lose that which you most dread the loss of. And what is that? (1.) That which was their public pride, the temple; "I will profane my sanctuary, by giving that into the enemy's hand, to be plundered and burnt." This was signified by the death of a wife, a dear wife, to teach us that God's sanctuary should be dearer to us, and that we should look upon the desire of our eyes as nothing compared to it, as the monuments of the earth are set to keep for whatsoever. Christ's church, that is his spouse, should be ours too. Though these people were very corrupt, and had themselves profaned the sanctuary, yet it is called the desire of their eyes. Note, Many that are destitute of the power of godliness, are yet very fond of the form of it; and it is just with God to punish them for their hypocrisy by depriving them of that too. The sanctuary is here called the excellence of their strength; they had many strong olds and places of defence, but the temple excelled them all; it was the pride of their strength; they prided in it as their strength, that they were the temple of the Lord, Jer. vii. 4. Note, The church-privileges that men are proud of, are profaned by their sins, and it is just with God to profane them by his judgments. And with these God will take away, (2.) That which they prided in, their temple; for none of them, as they looked upon with delight; “Your sons and your daughters (which are the dearer to you, because they are but a few left of many; the rest having perished by famine and pestilence) shall fall by the sword of the Chaldeans.” What a dreadful spectacle would it be to see their own children, pieces, pictures of themselves, whom they had taken such pains to build up; and whose very names they had loved as their own souls, sacrificed to the rage of the merciless conquerors! This, this was the punishment of sin.

2. Let them know that as Ezekiel wept not for his affliction, so neither should they weep for theirs. He must say, Ye shall do as I have done, v. 22. Ye shall not mourn nor weep, v. 23. Jeremiah had told them the same, that men shall not lament for the dead, nor cut themselves; (Jer. xvi. 6.) not that there shall be any such merciful circumstances without, or any such degrees of wisdom and grace within, as shall mitigate and moderate the sorrow; but they shall not mourn for, (1.) Their grief shall be so great, that they shall be quite overwhelmed with it, their passions shall stifle them, and they shall have no outward tokens of it by giving vent to it. (2.) Their calamities shall cause them more sorrow when one is upon the neck of another, that by long custom they shall be hardened in their sorrows, (Job vii. 10.) and perfectly stufified, and moped (as we say) with them. (3.) They shall not dare to express their grief, for fear of being deemed disaffected to the conquerors, who would take their lamentations as an advantage to disturbance to their triumphs. (4.) They shall neither have hearts, nor time, nor money, whereby to put themselves in mourning, and accommodate themselves with the ceremonies of grief; “You will be so entirely taken up with solid, substantial grief, that you will have no room for the shadow of it.” (5.) Particular mourners shall not need to distinguish themselves by covering their lips, and laying aside their ornaments, and going bare-footed (as in the times of the captivity) or with a sad or sorrowful aspect (as in the times of the captivity); Ezekiel shall know when and how to be a mourner. (6.) There shall be none of that sense of their affliction and sorrow for it, which would help to bring them to repentance, but that only which shall drive them to despair; so it follows, “Ye shall flee away for your iniquities, with scared consciences and reprovable minds, and ye shall mourn, not to God in prayer and confession of sin, but one toward another.” mourning, and from complaining of God, thus making their burthen heavier and their wound more grievous, as impatient people do under their afflictions, by mingling their own passions with them.

III. An appeal to the event, for the confirmation of all this; (v. 24.) “When this comes, as it is foretold, when Jerusalem, which is this day besieged, is quite destroyed and laid waste, which now you may not believe will ever be, then ye shall know that I am the Lord God, who have given you this fair warning of it. Then you will remember that Ezekiel was to you a sign.” Note, Those who regard not the threatenings of the word when they are foretold, will be made to remember them when that which they were told will come to pass. 1. The great desolation which the siege of Jerusalem should end in; (v. 25.) In that day, that terrible day, when the city should be broken up, I will take from them. (1.) That which they depended on; their strength, their walls, their treasures, their for-thy face against the Ammonites, and prophecy against them; 3. And say unto the Ammonites, Hear the word of the Lord God; Thus saith the Lord God, Because thou saidst, Aha, against my sanctuary, when it was profaned; and against the land of Israel, when it was desolate; and against the house of Judah, when they went into captivity: 4. Behold, therefore, I will deliver thee to the men of the east for a possession, and they shall set their palaces in thee, and make their dwellings in thee: they shall eat thy fruit, and they shall drink thy milk. 5. And I will make Rabbah a stable for camels, and the Ammonites a couching-place for flocks; and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 6. For thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast clapped thy hands, and stamped with the feet, and rejoiced in heart with all thy desire against the land of Israel; 7. Behold, therefore, I will stretch out my hand upon thee, and will deliver thee for a spoil to the heathen, and I will cut thee off from the people, and I will cause thee to perish out of the countries: I will destroy thee; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord.

Here,

1. The prophet is ordered to address himself to the Ammonites, in the name of the Lord Jehovah, the God of Israel, who is also the God of the whole earth. But what can Chemosh, the god of the children of Ammon, say, in answer to it? He is bidden to set his face against the Ammonites, for he is God's representative as a prophet, and thus he must signify that God set his face against them, for the face of the Lord is against them that do evil, Ps. xxxiv. 16. He must speak with boldness and assurance, as one that knew whose errand he went upon, and that he should be borne out in delivering it. He must therefore set his face as a flint, Isa. 1. 7. He must show his displeasure against these proud enemies of Israel, and face them down, though they were very impudent and proud men. He must show his displeasure so much and so long against Israel, yet still he was for Israel, and, while he witnessed against their corruptions, adhered to, and gloried in, God's covenant with them. Note, Those are miserable that have the preaching and praying of God's prophets against them; against whom their faces are set.

2. He is directed what to say to them. Ezekiel is now a captive in Babylon, and has been so many years in the midst of the state of his own nation, much less of the nations that were about it; but God tells him both what they were doing, and what he was about to do with them. And thus by the spirit of prophecy he is enabled to speak as pertinently to their case as if he had been among them.

1. He must upbraid the Ammonites with their insolent and barbarous triumphs over the people of Israel in their calamities. The Ammonites said, when all went against the Jews, Aha, so would we have it. They were glad to see, (1.) The temple burned, the sanctuary profaned by the victorious Chaldeans; this is put first, to intimate what was the cause of the controversy; they had an enmity to the Jews for the sake of their religion, though it was only some poor remains of the profession of it that were to be found among them. (2.) The nation ruined. They rejoiced when the land of Israel was made desolate, the cities burnt, the count; wasted, and both depopulated, and when the house of Judah went into captivity. When they had not power to oppress God's Israel themselves, they were pleased to see the Chaldeans oppress them; partly because they envied their wealth and the good land they enjoyed, partly because they feared their growing power, and partly because they hated their religion, and the divine oracles they had been accustomed to repeat. (v. 6.) They clapped with their hands, to irrigate the rage of the Chaldeans, and to set them on as dogs upon the game; or, they clapped their hands in triumph, attended this tragedy with their Plaudite—Give us your applause, thinking it well acted; never was there anything more diverting or entertaining to them. They stamped with their feet, ready to leap and dance for joy upon this occasion; they not only rejoiced in heart, but they could not forbear showing it; though every one that had any sense of honour and humility would cry shame upon them for it. Especially considering that they rejoiced thus, not for anything they got by Israel's fall; if so, they had been the more excusable, Most people are for themselves. But this was purely from a principle of malice and enmity; Thus he rejoiced, &c. and they themselves were again scourged the same time, when he was scourged, he gloried in it; Ps. xlii. 7. and it is the Lord's angry hand that smites against the land of Israel. Note, The people of God have always had a great deal of ill-will borne them by this wicked world; and their calamities have been their neighbours' entertainments. See to what unnatural instances of malice the enmity that is in the seed of the serpent against the seed of the woman, will carry them. The Ammonites, of all people, should not have reared their heads in Jerusalem's ruin, but should rather have trembled, because they themselves had such a narrow escape at the same time; it was but cross or pile, which should be besieged first, Rabbah or Jerusalem, ch. xxxi. 20. And they had reason to think that the king of Babylon would set upon them next. But thus were their hearts hardened to their ruin, and their insolence against Jerusalem was to them an evident token of perdition. Phil. i. 28. It is a very wicked thing to be glad at the calamities of any, especially of God's people, and a sin that God will surely reckon for; such delight has God in showing mercy, and so backward is he to punish, that nothing is more pleasing to him than to be stopped in the ways of his judgments by intercessions, nor any thing more provoking than to hear of them. And so the Ammonites, ch. xxi. 12. Note, The king of Babylon, though at present victorious, yet he had reason to fear from God's hand to be brought to a stop and overthrown; and the Ammonites, as he then was, were to be the means of his destruction. And so the Ammonites, as he then was, were to be the means of his destruction.

2. He must threaten the Ammonites with utter ruin, for this insolence which they were guilty of. God turns away his wrath from Israel against them, as is said, Prov. xxiv. 17, 18. God is jealous for his people's honour, because his own is so nearly interested in it. And therefore they that shall be made to know that they touch the apple of his eye. He had before predicted the destruction of the Ammonites, ch. xxxi. 28. Had they repented, that had been revoked; but now it is ratified. (1.) A destroying enemy is brought against them; I will deliver thee to the men of the east, first to the Chaldeans, who came from the north-east, and whose army, under the command of Nebuchadnezzar, destroyed the country of the Ammonites, about five years after the destruction of Jerusalem, into which place these relations, ch. xiv. 25. and then to the Egyptians, who were properly the children of the east, who, when the Chaldeans had made the country desolate, and quitted it, came and took possession of it for themselves, probably with the consent of the conquerors: shepherds' tents were their palaces, these they set up in the country of the Ammonites.

* A game, in which it is put to chance whether the side of a coin which bears the cross, or that which bears the reverse, shall be uppermost. —Eo.
then they made their dwellings, v. 4. They enjoyed the products of the country; They shall eat thy fruit, and drink thy milk; and the milk from the cattle is the fruit of the ground at second-hand. They made use even of the royal city for their cattle; (v. 5.) I will make Rabbah, that was a nice and splendid city, to be a stable for camels; for its new masters, whose wealth lies all in cattle, will not think they can put the palaces of Rabbah to a better use. Rabbah had been a hand of destruction to others when joy was the rule; God's hand stretched out against the Ammonites will not only deliver them for a spoil to the heathen, so that their neighbours shall prey upon them, but will cut them off from the people, and make them perish out of the countries, so that there shall be no remains of them in that place. Compare with this, Jer. xxxix. 1, &c. What can sound more terrible than that resolution, (v. 7.) For I will deliver those to whom I will give them; the Lord God is neither both to save and to destroy, and it is a fearful thing to fall into his hands. Both the threatenings here, (v. 5. and v. 7.) conclude with this, Ye shall know that I am the Lord. For, (1.) Thus God will maintain his own honour, and will make it appear that he is the God of Israel, though he suffers them for a time to be captives in Babylon. (2.) Thus he will bring his people and all his nations into an acquaintance with him, and it will be a blessed effect of their calamities. Better know God, and be poor, than be rich, and ignorant of him.

8. Thus saith the Lord God, Because that Moab and Seir do say, Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen; 9. Therefore, behold, I will open the side of Moab from cities, from his cities which are on his frontiers, the glory of the country, Beth-jeshimoth, Baal-mone, and Kiriatamu. 10. Unto the men of the east with the Ammonites, and will give them in possession, that the Ammonites may not be remembered among the nations. 11. And I will execute judgments upon Moab; and they shall know that I am the Lord. 12. Thus saith the Lord God, Because that Edom hath dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance, and hath greatly offended, and revenged himself upon them; 13. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, I will also stretch out my hand upon Edom, and will cut off man and beast from it; and I will make it desolate from Teman; and they of Dedan shall fall by the sword. 14. And I will lay my vengeance upon Edom by the hand of my people Israel: and they shall do in Edom according to mine anger, and according to my fury; and they shall know my vengeance, saith the Lord God. 15. Thus saith the Lord God, Because the Philistines have dealt by revenge, and have taken vengeance with a despitful heart, to destroy it for the old hatred; 16. Therefore, thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will stretch out my hand upon the Philistines, and I will cut off the Chereethims, and destroy the remnant of the sea-coast. 17. And I will execute great vengeance upon them with burning rebusks; and they shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall lay my vengeance upon them.

Three more of Israel's ill-natured neighbours are here arraigned, convicted, and condemned to destruction, for contributing to, and triumphing in, Jerusalem's fall. 1. The Moabites. Seir, which was the seat of the Edomitians, is joined with them, (v. 8.) because they said the same as the Moabites; but they were afterward reckoned with by themselves, v. 12. Now observe, 1. What was the sin of the Moabites; they said, Behold, the house of Judah is like unto all the heathen. They triumphed, (1.) In the apostacies of Israel, were pleased to see them forsake their God, and worship idols, and hoped that in a while their religion would be quite lost and forgotten, and the house of Judah would be as the heathen, perfect idolaters. Thus when that profession of religion is adopted by a part of their profession, they encourage the enemies of religion to hope that it will in time sink, and be run down, and quite abandoned; but let the Moabites know that though there are those of the house of Judah who have made themselves like the heathen, yet there is a remnant that retain their integrity, the religion of the house of Judah shall recover itself, and its peculiarities shall be preserved; it shall not lose itself among the heathen, but distinguish itself from them, till it deliver itself honourably into a better institution. (2.) They triumphed in the calamities of Israel. They said, The house of Judah is like all the heathen, in as bad a state as they; their God is no more able to deliver them from this overflowing scourge of these parts of the world, than the gods of the heathen are to deliver them. Where are the promises they gloried in, and all the wonders which they and their fathers told us of? What the better are they for the covenant of peculiarity, upon which they so much valued themselves? They that looked with so much scorn upon all the heathen, are now set upon a level with them, or rather sunk below them. 2. Note, Those who judge only by outward and apparent things are ready to conclude that the people of God have lost all their privileges, when they have lost their worldly prosperity; which does not follow, for good men, even in affliction, in captivity among the heathen, have graces and comforts within, sufficient to distinguish them from all the heathen. Though the event seem one to the righteous and wicked, yet indeed it is vastly different. 2. What might be the punishment of Moab for this sin; because they triumphed in the overthrow of Judah, their country shall be in like manner overthrown with that of the Ammonites, who were guilty of the same sin; (v. 9, 10.) I will open the side of Moab, will uncover its shoulder, will take away all its defences, that it may become an easy prey to any that will make a prey of it. (1.) See here how the punishment of Moab for that was its strength and guard, shall be demolished by the Chaldean forces, and laid open. Some of the cities are here named, which are said to be the glory of the country, which they trusted in, and boasted of, as impregnable; these shall decay, be deserted, or betrayed, or fall into the enemy's hand, that Moab may lie exposed, and whoever will, may penetrate into the heart of the country. Note, Those who glory in any other defence and protection than that of the divine power, providence, and promise, will, sooner or later, see cause to be ashamed of their glorying. (2.) See here to whom it shall be exposed; The men of the east, when they come to take possession of the heaps of the Ammonites, shall see some of the Moabites too; God, the Lord of all lands, will give them that land; for the kingdoms of men he gives to whosoever he will. The Arameans, who are shepherds, and live quietly, plain men dwelling in tents, shall by an overruled Providence be put in possession of the land of the Moabites, who are soldiers, men of war, and cunning hunters, that live turbulently. The Chaldeans of Babylon shall get it by war; and the Arameans shall enjoy it in peace. Concerning the Ammonites it is said, They shall no more be remembered among the nations, (v. 10.) for they had been necessary to the murder of Gedaliah, Jer. xl. 14. But of the Moabites it is said, I will execute judgments upon Moab; they shall feel the weight of God's displeasure, but perhaps not to that degree that the Ammonites shall; however, so far as that, they shall know that I am the Lord; that the God of Israel is a God of power, and that his covenant with his people is not broken.

II. The Edomites, the posterity of Esau, betwixt whom and Jacob there had been an old enmity. And here is,

1. The sin of the Edomites, v. 12. They not only triumphed in the ruin of Judah and Jerusalem, as the Moabites and Ammonites had done, but they took advantage from the present distressed state to which the Jews were reduced, to do them some real mischief; probably, made inroads upon their frontiers, and plundered their country; Edom has dealt against the house of Judah by taking vengeance. The Edomites had of old been tributaries to the Jews, according to the sentence that the elder should serve the younger; and though they afterwards revolted; Amaziah severely chastised them, (2 Kings xiv. 7.) and for this they took vengeance; now they would pay off all the old scores; and not only incensed the Babylonians against Jerusalem, crying, Raze it, raze it, (Ps. cxxxvii. 7.) but cut off those that escaped; as we find in the prophecy of Obadiah, which is wholly directed against Edom, v. 15. And we find here revenging a revenging a revenging, which intimated that they were not only eager upon it, but very cruel in it, and recompensed to the Jews more than double. Herein he has greatly offended. Note, It is a great offence to God for us to revenge ourselves upon our brother; for God has said, Vengeance is mine. We are forbidden to revenge, or to bear a grudge. Suppose Judah had been hard upon Edom formerly, it was a base thing for the Edomites now, in revenge for it, to smite them secretly; but the Jews had a divine warrant to reign over the Edomites, for that therefore they ought not to have made reprisals; and it was the more disingenuous for them to retain the old enmity, when God had particularly commanded his people to forget it, (Deut. xxix. 7.) Thou shalt not abhor an Edomite.

2. The judgments threatened against them for this sin, v. 13. (1.) The Aramazians are severity; (v. 11.) I will stretch out my hand upon Edom. Their country shall be desolate from Teman, which lay in the south part of it; and they shall fall by the sword unto Dedan, which lay north; the desolations of war should go through the nation. (1.) They had taken vengeance, and therefore God will lay his vengeance upon them; (v. 14.) They shall know my vengeance; the Chaldeans shall not leave it to God to take vengeance on them, may expect that he will take vengeance on them; and that will not believe and fear his vengeance, shall be made to know and feel his vengeance; they shall be dealt with according to God's anger, and according to his fury, not according to the weakness of the instruments that are employed in it, but according to the strength of the arm that employs them. (2.) They had taken vengeance on Israel, and God will take his vengeance on them by the hand of his people Israel; they suffered much by the Chaldeans, which seems to be referred to, Jer. xxxix. 8. But beside that there were savours to come upon mount, Zion, who should judge the mount of Esau, (Obad. 21.) and Israel's Redeemer comes with dyed garments from Pozrath, (Isa. lxiii. 1.) this implies a promise that Israel should recover itself again, to that degree as to be in a capacity of curbing the insolence of her enemies. And we find (Mal. 1. 5.) that Judas Maccabaeus fought against the children of Esau in Idumea, gave them a great overthrow, abated their courage, and took their spoil. And Josephus says (Antiq. li. 13. cap. 17.) that Hircanus made the Edomites tributaries to Israel. Note, The equity of God's judgments is to be observed, when he not only avenge injuries upon those that did them, but by these against whom they were done.

III. The Philistines. And, 1. Their sin is much the same with that of the Edomites; They have dealt by revenge with the people of Israel, and have taken vengeance with a despicable heart, not to disturb them only, but to destroy them, for the old hatred, (v. 15.) the old grudge they bore them, or, as the margin has it, with perfidious hatred, a hatred that began long since, and which they were not solved to continue; the anger was implacable, they dealt by revenge, traded in the acts of malice; it was their constant practice, and their heart, their spiteful heart, was upon it. 2. Their punishment likewise is much the same, v. 16. They were for destroying God's people, shall themselves be cut off and destroyed. And (v. 17.) they were not avenging themselves to execute great vengeance upon them. This was fulfilled when that country was wasted by the Chaldean army, not long after the destruction of Jerusalem, which is foretold, Jer. xlvii. It was strange that these nations, which bordered upon the land of Israel, were not alarmed by the success of the Chaldean army, and made to tremble in the apprehensions of their own danger; and when God was determined to make a great overthrow it was time to look to their own; but their impious and malice made them forget their politics, till God by his judgments convinced them that the cup was going round, and they were not the less safe for their being secure.

CHAP. XXVI.

The prophet had soon done with those four nations that he set his face against in the foregoing chapters; for they were not at that time very considerable in the world, nor would their fall make any great noise among the nations, nor any figure in history. But the city of Tyre is next set to the bar, which, being a place of vast trade, was known all the world over; and therefore here are three whole chapters, this and the two that follow, spent in the prosecution of the destruction of the sea-kingdom, the beloved of Tyre, Isa. xxviii. It is but just mentioned in Jeremiah, as sharing with the natives in the common calamity, ch. xxv. 22.—xxviii. 3.—xlvi. 1. But Ezekiel is ordered to bring large upon that head. In this chapter, we have, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was, triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 2. II. The destruction of Tyrus itself foretold. 1. The extremity of the destruction of Tyre, v. 3. 2. The instruments of this destruction; many nations, v. 3. and the king of Babylon by name with his vast victorious army, 7. 11. 3. The great surprise, that they should lay upon that head. In this chapter, we have, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was, triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 2. II. The destruction of Tyrus itself foretold. 1. The extremity of the destruction of Tyre, v. 3. 2. The instruments of this destruction; many nations, v. 3. and the king of Babylon by name with his vast victorious army, 7. 11. 3. The great surprise, that they should lay upon that head. In this chapter, we have, I. The sin charged upon Tyre, which was, triumphing in the destruction of Jerusalem, v. 2.
saying, 2. Son of man, because that Tyurus hath said against Jerusalem, Aha, she is broken that was the gates of the people; she is turned unto me; I shall be replenished, now she is laid waste: 3. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyrus, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up. 4. And they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers: I will also scrape her dust from her, and make her like the top of a rock. 5. It shall be a place for the spreading of nets in the midst of the sea: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God; and it shall become a spoil to the nations. 6. And her daughters which are in the field shall be slain by the sword; and they shall know that I am the Lord. 7. For thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will bring upon Tyre Nebuchadrezzar king of Babyl-on, a king of kings, from the north, with horses, and with chariots, and with horsemen, and companies, and much people. 8. He shall slay with the sword thy daughters in the field; and he shall make a fort against thee, and cast a mount against thee, and lift up the buckler against thee. 9. He shall set engines of war against thy walls, and with his axes he shall break down thy towers. 10. By reason of the abundance of his horses their dust shall cover thee: thy walls shall shake at the noise of the horsemen, and of the wheels, and of the chariots, when he shall enter into thy gates, as men enter into a city wherein is made a breach. 11. With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets: he shall slay thy people by the sword, and thy strong garrisons shall go down to the ground. 12. And they shall make a spoil of thy riches, and make a prey of thy merchandise; and they shall break down thy walls, and destroy thy pleasant houses: and they shall lay thy stones, and thy timber, and thy dust, in the midst of the water. 13. And I will cause the noise of thy songs to cease; and the sound of thy harps shall be no more heard. 14. And I will make thee like the top of a rock: thou shalt be a place to spread nets upon; thou shalt be built no more: for I the Lord have spoken it, saith the Lord God.

This prophecy is dated in the eleventh year, which was the year that Jerusalem was taken, and in the first day of the month, but it is not said what month; some think the month in which Jerusalem was taken, was the fourth month, others the month after; or perhaps it was the first month, and so it was the first day of the year. Observe here, I. The pleasure with which the Tyrians looked upon the ruins of Jerusalem. Ezekiel was a great way off, in Babylon, but God told him what Tyrus said against Jerusalem; (v. 2.) Aha, she is broken, broken to pieces, that was the gates of the people, to whom there was a great resort, and where there was a general rendezvous of all nations, some upon one account, and some upon another, and I shall get by it; all the wealth, power, and interest which Jerusalem had, it is hoped, shall be turned to Tyre; and God saith, I am against thee, is the expression of God's displeasure. We do not find that the Tyrians had such a hatred and enmity to Jerusalem and the sanctuary as the Ammonites and Edomites had, or were so spiteful and mischievous to the Jews; they were men of business, and of large acquaintance and free conversation, and therefore were not so bigotted, and of such a persecuting spirit, as the narrow souls for whom the temple was purposed, and by whose care the care was to get estates, and enlarge their trade, and they looked upon Jerusalem not as an enemy, but as a rival. Hiram, king of Tyre, was a good friend to David and Solomon, and we do not read of any quarrels the Jews had with the Tyrians; but Tyre promised herself that the fall of Jerusalem would be an advantage to her in respect of trade and commerce; they shall be thy merchants, and the great men from all parts that used to come to Jerusalem for the accomplishing of them- selves, and to spend their estates there, will now come to Tyre, and spend them there; and whereas many, since the Chaldean army became so formidable in these parts, had retired into Jerusalem, and brought their estates thither for safety, as the Rechites did, now they will come to Tyre, which, being in a manner surrounded with the sea, will be thought a place of greater strength than Jerusalem; and thus the prosperity of Tyre will rise out of the ruins of Jerusalem. Note, To be secretly pleased with the death or decay of others when we are likely to get by it, with their fall when we may thrive upon it, is a sin that does most easily beset us, but is not thought to be such a bad thing, and so provoking to God, as really it is. We are apt to say, when those who stand in our light, in our way, are removed, when they break, or fall into disgrace, "We shall be replenished, now that they are laid waste." But this comes from a selfish, covetous principle, and a desire to be placed alone in the midst of the earth, as if we grudged that any should live by us. This comes from a want of that love to our neighbor, which is the true spirit of God so expressively requires, and from that inordinate love of the world as our happiness, which the love of God so expressly forbids. And it is just with God to blast the designs and projects of those who thus contrive to raise themselves upon the ruins of others; and we see they are often disappointed. II. The displeasure of God against them for it. The providence of God had done well for Tyre; Tyre was a pleasant and wealthy city, and might have continued so, if she had, as she ought to have done, sympathized with Jerusalem in her calamities, and sent her an address of condolence; but when, instead of that, she showed herself pleased with her neighbor's fall, and perhaps sent an address of congratulation to the conquerors, then God says, Behold, I am against thee, Tyre, v. 3. And let her not expect to prosper long, if God be against her. 1. God will bring formidable enemies upon her; Many nations shall come against thee; an army made up of many nations, or one nation that shall be as strong as many. Those that have God against them, may expect all the creatures against them; for what people can they have, with whom God is at war? They shall come pouring in as the waves of the sea, one upon the neck of another, with an irresistible force. The person is named that shall bring this army upon them; Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, a king of kings, that had many kings tributary to him, and dependants on him, beside those that were his captives, Dan. ii. 37, 38. He is that head of gold. He shall come with a vast army, horses and chariots, &c. all land forces; we do not find he had any naval force, or any thing where with he might attack it by sea. But the attempt the more difficult, as we find, ch. xxix. 18. where it is called a great service which he serv\-ed against Tyre. He shall besiege it in form, (v. 8.) make a fort, and cast a mount, and (v. 9.) shall set engines of war against the walls. His troops shall be so numerous as to raise a dust that shall cover the city, v. 10. They shall make a noise that shall even shake the walls, and shall not be of any used when they enter a city that is broken up; the horses shall prance with so much fury and violence, that they shall even tread down the streets though ever so well paved.

2. They shall do terrible execution. (1.) The enemy shall make themselves masters of all their fortifications, shall destroy the walls, and break down the towers, v. 4. For what walls are strong among the desolations of the judgments of God? Her strong garrisons shall go down to the ground, v. 11. And the walls shall be broken down, v. 12. The city held out a long siege, but it was taken at last. (2.) A great deal of blood shall be shed; Her daughters which are in the field, the cities upon the continent, which were subject to Tyre as the mother city, the inhabitants of them shall be slain by the sword, v. 6. The invaders begin with them that come first in their way. And, (v. 11.) he shall stay thy people with the sword; not only the soldiers that are found in arms, but theburghers, shall be put to the sword, the king of Bab\-ylon being highly incensed against them for holding out so long. (3.) The wealth of the city shall all become a spoil to the conqueror; (v. 12.) They made a fire of the merchandise; it was in hope of the plunder, that the city was set upon with so much vigour. See the vanity of riches, that they are kept for the owners to their hurt; entice and re\-compense thieves, and not only cease to benefit those who took pains for them, and were duly enti\-led to them, but are made to serve their enemies, who were thereby put into a capacity of doing them so much the more mischief. (4.) The city itself shall be laid waste: All the palaces of the princes shall be destroyed; (v. 12.) such as were pleasantly situated, beautified, and furnished, shall become a heap of rubbish. Let none please themselves too much in their pleasant houses, for they know not how soon they may see the desolation of them. Tyre shall be utterly ruined; the enemy shall not only pull down the houses, but shall carry away the stones and the timber, which might seem to the rebuilding of them in the midst of the wa\-ter, not to be recovered, or ever made use of again.

Nay, (v. 4.) I will scrape her dust from her; not only shall the loose dust be blown away, but the very ground it stands upon shall be torn up by the enraged enemy, carried off, and laid in the midst of the wa\-ter, v. 12. The foundation is in the dust, that dust shall be all taken away, and then the city shall go down with them. As Tyre was pro\-\ntroyed, it was ploughed like a field, Mic. iii. 12. But the destruction of Tyre is carried further than that; the very soil of it shall be scraped away, and it shall be made like the top of a rock, (v. 4, 14.) pure rock that has no earth to cover it; it shall only be a place for the spreading of nets, (v. 5, 14.) it shall serve fishermen to dry their nets upon, and mend them. (5.) There shall be a full period to all its mirth and joy; (v. 13.) I will cause the noise of the songs to cease. Tyre had been a joyous city, (Isa. xxvi. 7.) with her songs she had courted cus\-tomers to deal with her in a way of trade; but now farewell all her profitable commerce and pleasant conversation; Tyre is no more a place either of bus\-iness or of sport. Lastly, It shall be built no more, (v. 14.) not built any more as it had been, with such state and magnificence; nor built any more in the same place, but shall be built a new city, (v. 15.) a place of a long time; the present inhabitants shall be de\-stroyed or dispersed, so that this Tyre shall be no more. For God has spoken it, (v. 5, 14.) and when what he has said is accomplished, they shall know thereby that he is the Lord, and not a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent.

15. Thus saith the Lord God to Tyre: Shall not the isles shake at the sound of thy fall, when the wounded cry, when the slaughter is made in the midst of thee? 16. Then all the princes of the sea shall come down from their thrones, and lay away their robes, and put off their broderied garments; they shall clothe themselves with trembling; they shall sit upon the ground, and shall tremble at every moment, and be astonished at thee, 17. And they shall take upon a la\-mentation for thee, and say to thee, How art thou destroyed that wast inhabited of sea\-\rning men, the renowned city which wast strong in the sea, she and her inhabitants, which cause their terror to be on all that haunt it! 18. Now shall the isles trem\-ble in the day of thy fall; yea, the isles that are in the sea shall be troubled at thy de\-parture. 19. For thus saith the Lord God, When I shall make thee a desolate city, like the cities that are not inhabited; when I shall bring up the deep upon thee, and great waters shall cover thee; 20. When I shall bring thee down with them that de\-scend into the pit, with the people of old time, and shall set thee in the low parts of the earth, in places desolate of old, with them that go down to the pit, that thou be not inhabited; and I shall set glory in the land of the living; 21. I will make thee a terror, and thou shalt be no more; though thou be sought for, yet shalt thou never be found again, saith the Lord God.

The utter ruin of Tyre is here represented in very strong and lively figures, which are exceed\-ingly affecting.

1. See how high, how great Tyre had been, how little likely ever to have come to this. The re\-membrance of men's former grandeur and plenty is a great place, with all of the sea, present in any where and at any time. Tyre was a renowned city, (v. 17.) famous among the nations, the crowning city, (so she is called, Isa. xxxii. 8.) a city that had crowns in her gift, honoured all she smiled upon, crowned herself and all about her; she was inhabited of seas, of those that trade at sea, of those who from all parts came thither by sea, bringing with them the abundance of the seas, and the treasures hid in the sand. She was strong in the sea; easy of access to her friends, but to her enemies inaccessible; fortified by a wal.
of water, which made her impregnable. So that she with her pomp, and her inhabitants with their pride, caused their terror to be on all that haunted that city, and upon any account frequented it. It was well fortified, and formidable in the eyes of all that acquainted themselves with it. Every body stood in awe of the Tyrians, and was afraid of disobliging them. Note, Those who know their strength are too apt to cause terror, to pride themselves in frightening those they are an over-match for.

2. See how low, how little, Tyre is made, v. 19, 20. This renowned city is made a desolate city, is no more frequented as it has been, there is no more resort of merchants to it, it is like the cities not inhabited, which are no cities, and, having none to keep them in repair, will go to decay of themselves. Tyre shall be like a city overflowed by an inundation of waters, which cover it, and upon which the deep is brought up. As the waves had formerly been its defence, so now they shall be its destruction. She shall be brought down with them that descend into the pit, with the cities of the old world that were under water, and with Sodom and Gomorrah, their iniquities, and all the cities of the same, having been, shall be in the condition of those who have been long buried, of the people of old time, who are old inhabitants of the silent grave, who are quite rotted away under ground, and quite forgotten above ground; such shall Tyre be, free among the dead; set in the lower parts of the earth, humbled, mortified, reduced. It shall be like the places desolate of old, as it is now, they having been, as other cities that have formerly been in like manner deserted and destroyed. It shall not be inhabited again; none shall have the courage to attempt the rebuilding of it upon that spot, so that it shall be no more; the Tyrians shall be lost among the nations, so that people will look in vain for Tyre in Tyre; Thou shalt be sought for and never find it again. New persons may build a new city upon a new spot of ground hard by, which they may call Tyre, but Tyre, as it is, shall never be any more. Note, The strongest cities in this world, the best fortified and best furnished, are subject to decay, and may in a little time be brought to nothing. In the history of our own island, many cities are spoken of as in being when the Romans were here, and many that are scarcely known where to look for, and of which we can find no more evidence, than Roman urns and coins dug up there sometimes accidentally. But in the other world we look for a city that shall stand for ever, and flourish in perfection through all the ages of eternity.

3. See what a distress the inhabitants of Tyre are in; (v. 15.) There is a great slaughter made in the midst of thee, many slain, and great men; it is probable, when the city was taken, that the generality of the inhabitants were put to the sword; then did the wounded cry, and they cried in vain, to the pitiless conquerors; they cried quarter, but it would not be given them; the wounded are slain without mercy, or, rather, that is the only mercy that is showed them, that the second blow shall rid them of their pain.

4. See what consternation all the neighbours are in, upon the fall of Tyre. This is elegantly expressed here, to show how astonishing it should be. (1.) The islands shall shake at the sound of thy fall, v. 15. As when a great merchant breaks all, that he deals with are shocked by it, and begin to look about them; perhaps they had effects in his hands, which in his fall shall lose. Or, When they see one fall and become bankrupt of a sudden, in debt a great deal more than he is worth, it makes them afraid for themselves, lest they should do so too. Thus the isles, which thought themselves safe in the embraces of the sea, when they see Tyrus fall, shall tremble, and be troubled, saying, "What will become of us?" And it is well if they make this good use of it, to take warning by it not to be secure, but to stand in awe of God and his judgments. The sudden fall of a great tower shakes the ground round about it; thus all the islands in the Mediterranean sea shall feel themselves sensible of the terror of Tyre, it being a place that had the mariners, and such interests in, and such a constant correspondence with. (2.) The princes of the sea shall be affected with it, who ruled in these islands; or, the rich merchants, who live like princes, (Isa. xxxii. 8.) and the masters of ships, who command like princes, these shall conclude the fall of Tyre, in a most compassionate manner; (v. 16.) They shall come down from their thrones, neglecting the business of their thrones, and despising the pomp of them; they shall lay away their robes of state, their brodered garments, and shall clothe themselves all over with wrinkles, with sackcloth that will make them shiver. Or, They shall by their own act and deed make themselves to tremble, and shall be supported in their trembling, by the terror of God. They shall be in the ground in shame and sorrow; they shall tremble every moment at the thought of what has happened to Tyre, and for fear of what may happen to themselves; for what island is safe if Tyre be not? They shall take up a lamentation for thee, shall have elegies and mournful poems penned upon the fall of Tyre, v. 17. How art thou destroyed! [1.] It shall be a great grief to God, and they shall be affected with wonder, that a place so well fortified by nature and art, so famed for politics, and so full of money, which is the sinews of war, and that held out so long and with so much bravery, should be taken at last; (v. 21.) I make thee a terror. Note, It is just with God to make those a terror to their neighbours, by the suddenness and strangeness of their punishment, who make themselves a terror to their neighbours by the abuse of their power. Tyre had caused her terror, (v. 17.) and now is made a terrible example. [2.] It shall be a great affliction to them, and they shall be affected with sorrow; (v. 17.) they shall take up a lamentation for Tyre, as thinking it a thousand pityes that such a rich and splendid city should be thus laid in ruins. If Tyre be destroyed, then Jerusalem, who once, was a city, is destroyed, there were no such lamentation for it. What is the thing to them that passed by; (Lam. i. 12.) but when Tyre, the trading city, fell, it was universally bemoaned. Note, Those who have the world in their hearts, lament the loss of great men more than the loss of good men. [3.] It shall be a loud alarm to them; They shall tremble in the day of their fall, shall have cause to think that their own turn will be next. If Tyre fall, who can stand? Howl, fir-trees, if such a cedars be shaken. Note, The fall of others should awaken us out of our security. The death or decay of others in the world is a check to us, when we dream that our mountain stands strong, and shall not be moved. 5. See how the irreparable ruin of Tyre is aggravated by the prospect of the restorations to Israel. Thus shall Tyre sink, when I shall set glory in the land of the living, v. 20. Note, (1.) The holy land is the land of the living; for none but holy souls are properly living souls; where living sacrifices are offered to the living God, and where the lively oracles are, there the land of the living is; there David hoped to see the goodness of the Lord, (Ps. lxxvii. 15.) That was a type of heaven, which is indeed the land of the living. (2.) Through this land of the living may for a time lie under disgrace, yet God will again set glory in it; the glory that is departed shall return; and the restoration of what they had been deprived of shall be so much more their glory. God will himself be the Glory of the lands that are the lands of the living. (5. It will aggravate the misery of those that have their position in the land of the dying, of those that are for ever dying, to behold the happiness of those, at the same time, that shall have their everlasting portion in the land of the living. When the rich man was himself in torment, he saw Lazarus in the bosom of Abraham, and glory set for him in the land of the living.

CHAP. XXVII.

Still we are attending the funeral of Tyre, and the lamentation due to the fall of that renowned city. In this chapter, we have, 1. A large account of the dignity, wealth, and splendour of Tyre, while it was in its strength, the vast trade it drove, and the interest it had among the nations, (v. 1, 25.) which is designed to make its ruin the more lamentable. 2. A prediction of its fall and ruin, and the confusion and consternation which all its neighbours shall thereby be put into, v. 26.-36. And this is intended to stain the pride of all worldly glory and, by setting the one over against the other, to let us see the vanity and uncertainty of the riches, honours, and pleasures of the world, and what little reason we have to place our happiness in them, or to be content with the conversation of them; so that all this is written for our learning.

1. THE word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, 2. Now, thou son of man, take up a lamentation for Tyre; 3. And say unto Tyrus, O thou that art situate at the entry of the sea, which art a merchant of the people for many isles. Thus saith the Lord God, O Tyrus, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty. 4. Thy borders are in the midst of the seas, thy builders have perfected thy beauty. 5. They have made all thy ship-boards of fir-trees of Senir; they have taken cedars from Lebanon to make masts for thee. 6. Of the oaks of Bashan have they made thine oars: the company of the Ashurites have made thy benches of ivory, brought out of the isles of Chittim. 7. Fine linen, with broidered work from Egypt, was that which thou spreadest forth to be thy sail: blue and purple from the isles of Elishah was that which covered thee. 8. The inhabitants of Zidon and Arvad were thy mariners: thy wise men, O Tyrus, that were in thee were thy pilots. 9. The ancients of Gebal, and the wise men thereof, were in thee thy calkers: all the ships of the sea, with their mariners, were in thee to occupy thy merchandise. 10. They of Persia, and of Lud, and of Phint, were in thine army thy men of war: they hanged the shield and helmet in thee; they set forth thy comeliness. 11. The men of Arvad, with thine army, were upon thy walls round about, and the Gammadins were in thy towers: they hanged their shields upon thy walls round about; they have made thy beauty perfect. 12. Tarshish was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of all kind of riches: with silver, iron, tin, and lead, they traded in thy fairs. 13. Javan, Tubal, and Meshech, they were thy merchants: they traded the persons of men and vessels of brass in thy market. 14. They of the house of Togarmah traded in thy fairs with horses, and horsemen, and mules. 15. The men of Dedan were thy merchants: many isles were the merchantism of thy hand: they brought thee for a present, horns of ivory and ebony. 16. Syria was thy merchant by reason of the multitude of the wares of thy making: they occupied in thy fairs with emeralds, purple, and broidered work, and fine linen, and coral, and agate. 17. Judah, and the land of Israel, they were thy merchants: they traded in thy market wheat of Minnith and Pannam, and honey, and oil, and balm. 18. Damascus was thy merchant in the multitude of the wares of thy making, for the multitude of all riches; in the wine of Helbon, and white wool. 19. Dan also and Javan, going to and fro, occupied in thy fairs: bright iron, cassia, and camals, were in thy market. 20. Dedan was thy merchant in precious clothes for chariots, 21. Arabia, and all the princes of Kedar, they occupied with thee in lambs, and rams, and goats; in these were thy merchants. 22. The merchants of Sheba and Raamah, they were thy merchants: they occupied in thy fairs with chief of all spaces, and with all precious stones, and gold. 23. Haren, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Asshur, and Chibir, were thy merchants. 24. These were thy merchants in all sorts of things, in blue clothes, and broidered work, and in chests of rich apparel, bound with cords, and made of cedar, among thy merchandise. 25. The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market; and thou wast replenished, and made very glorious in the midst of the seas.

Here,

1. The prophet is ordered to take up a lamentation for Tyrus, v. 2. It was yet in the height of its prosperity, and there appeared not the least symptom of its decay; yet because its prosperity is its snare, is the cause of its pride and security, which will make its fall the more grievous. Even those that live at ease are to be lamented, if they are not preparing for trouble. He must lament it because its ruin is hastening on space, it is sure, it is near; and though the prophet foretell it, and justify God in it, yet he must lament it. Note, We ought to lament the mercies of other nations, as well as of our own, out of an affection for mankind in general; it is a part of the honour we owe to all men to bewail their calamities, and those which they have brought upon themselves by their own folly.

II. He is directed what to say, and to say it in the name of the Lord Jehovah, a name not unknown in Tyre, and which shall be better known, ch. xxvi. 6.

1. He must upbraid Tyre with her pride; O
Tyre, thou hast said, I am of perfect beauty, (v. 3.) of universal beauty, (so the word is,) every way accomplish'd, could be the more every where admired. Zion, that had the beauty of holiness, is called indeed the perfection of beauty, (Ps. I. 29.) that is the beauty of the Lord. But Tyre, because well built, and well filled with money and trade, will set up for a perfect beauty. Note, It is the folly of the children of this world to value themselves on the ornament and pleasure they live in, to the hindrances beauty is chargeable to, for all their self-excellence, or for, if these they excel others, to think themselves perfect. But God takes notice of the vain conceits men have of themselves in their prosperity, when the mind is lifted up with the condition, and often, for the humbling of the spirit, finds ways to bring down the estate. Let none reckon themselves beautified any further than they are sanctified, nor say that they are of perfect beauty till they come to heaven.

2. He must uphold Tyre with her prosperity, which was the matter of her pride. In elegies, it is usual to insert encomiums of those whose fall we lament; the prophet, accordingly, praises Tyre for all that she had that was praiseworthy. He has nothing to say of her religion, her piety, her charity, her public justice; the only distinction he finds interest to do good offices among her neighbours; but she lived great, and had a great trade; and all the trading part of mankind made court to her. The prophet must describe her height and magnificence, that God may be the more glorified in her fall, as the God who looks upon every one that is proud, and abases them, hides them in the dust for many generations; (Ps. LXX.)

(1.) The city of Tyre was advantageously situated, at the entry of the sea. (v. 3.) having many commodious harbours each way, not as cities seated on rivers, which the shipping can come but one way to. It stood at the end of the Mediterranean, very convenient for trade by land into all the Levant parts; so that she became a merchant of the people for many isles; lying between Greece and Asia, it became the great emporium, or mart-town, the rendezvous of merchants from all parts: Thy borders are in the heart of the seas, v. 4. It was surrounded with water, which was a great advantage to its trade; the darling of the sea, lield in its bosom, in its heart. Note, It is a great convenience, upon many accounts, to live in an island; seas are the masts which support them, not which our fathers have set, but the God of our Fathers, and which cannot be removed as other landmarks may, nor so easily got over. The people so situated may the more easily dwell alone, if they please, may the more easily traffic abroad, and keep a correspondence with the nations. We therefore of this island must own that he who determines the bounds of men's habitations, has often a hand to dwell for us.

(2.) It was curiously built, according as the fashion then was; and, being a city on a hill, it made a glorious show, and tempted the ships that sailed by into her parts; (v. 4.) Thy builders have perfected thy beauty. They have so improved in architecture, that nothing appears in the builders of Tyre that can be found fault with; and yet it will be observed, they were not such as our fathers have set, but the God of our Fathers, and which cannot be removed as other landmarks may, nor so easily got over. The people so situated may the more easily dwell alone, if they please, may the more easily traffic abroad, and keep a correspondence with the nations. We therefore of this island must own that he who determines the bounds of men's habitations, has often a hand to dwell for us.

(3.) It had its haven replenished with abundance of gallant ships, Isa. xxxiii. 21. The ship carpenters did their part, as well as the house carpenters theirs. The Tyrians are thought to be the first that invented the art of navigation; at least, they improved it, and brought it to so a perfect perfection as to supply the Lord's use. They made the boards, or planks, for the bulk of the ship, of fir-trees fetched from Senir, a mount in the land of Israel, joined with Hermon, Cant. iv. 8. Planks of fir were smooth and light, but not so lasting as our English oak. (2.) They had cedars from Lebanon, and gums from Bashan, v. 5. (3.) They had oaks from Bashan, (Isa. ii. 13.) to make ours of; for it is probable that their ships were mostly galleys, that go with oars. The people of Israel built few ships for themselves, but they furnished the Tyrians with timber for ship-building. Thus one country uses what another produces, and so are they serviceable one to another, and contribute to the wealth and prosperity of each other. Thus magnificence did they affect in building their ships; that they made the very boughs of ivory, which they fetched from the islands of Chittim, from Italy or Greece, and had workmen from the Ashurites or Assyrians to make them; so rich would they have their state-rooms in their ships to be. (3.) So very prodigal were they, that they made their sails of fine linen fetched from Egypt, and that embroidered too, v. 7. Or, it may be meant of their flags, (which they hoisted to that the city they belonged to,) which were very costly. The word signifies a banner as well as a sail. (6.) They hung those rooms on ship-board with blue and purple, the richest cloths and rich-marble, which a merchant could get from the isles they traded with. For through Tyre were fetched blue and purple, which is therefore called the Tyrian dye, yet they must have that which was so-fetched.

(4.) These gallant ships were well manned, by men of great ingenuity and industry. The pilots and masters of the ships, that had command in their fleets, were of their own city, such as they could partake confidence in; (v. 8.) Thy wise men, O Tyre, that went in there, were thy pilots. But for common sailors, they had them from other countries; The inhabitants of Arvad and Zidon were thy mariners; these came from cities near them; Zidon was sister to Tyre, not two leagues off, to the northward; there they bred able seamen, which it is the interest of the maritime powers to support, and give all the encouragement they can to. They sent to Gebal in Syria for carkers, or strengtheners of the cloths, or chinks, to step them when the ships came home, after long voyages, to be repaired. To do this, they had the ancients, and wise men, v. 9. For there is more need of wisdom and prudence to repair what is gone to decay than to build anew. In public matters there is occasion for the ancients and wise men that have been in the breaches, and the restorers of paths to dwell in the vineyards. The countries they traded with were at their service, and were willing to send men into their pay, or to fix their youths as apprentices in Tyre, or to put them on board their fleets; so that all the ships in the sea, with their mariners, were ready to occupy thy merchandise. These that give good wages, will have hands at from Syria, Ned, and Phut. (5.) Their city was guarded by a military force that was very considerable, v. 10, 11. The Tyrians were themselves wholly given to trade; but it was necessary that they should have a good army on foot, and therefore they took these of other states into their pay, such as were fittest for service; though they had them from afar, (which perhaps was their all to advantage,) but there was the guards of them. These bore their arms, when there was occasion, and in time of peace hanged up the shield and buckler, in the armoury, as it were to proclaim peace, and let the world know that they had at present no need of them; but they were ready to be taken down whenever there was occasion for them. Their walls were guarded by the men of Arvad, Tharshish, and the虑vocarum people; these were stout men, that had a great deal of strength in their arms; yet the vulgar Latins renders them fugitives, men no longer than one's arm. They hung their shields upon the walls in their magazines, or places of arms; or hang them out upon the walls of their cities, to be visible to all that see them, and so the time they are ready, seeing how well provided they were with all things necessary for their own defence. Thus they set forth thy comeliness, (v. 10,) and made thee beauty perfect, v. 11. It contributed as much as any thing to the glory of Tyre, that it had those of all nations about in its service, except of the land of Israel, (though it far next them,) which furnished them with some of what was needful and that it furnishes them with men; that would have trenched upon the liberty and dignity of the Jewish nation, 2 Chron. ii. 17, 18. It was also the glory of Tyre that it had such a militia, so fit for service, and in constant pay; and such an armoury, like that in the tower of David, where hung the shields of mighty men, Cant. iv. 4. It is observable, that there and here the armours are said to be furnished with shields and helmets, defensive arms, not with swords and spears, offensive, though it is probable that there were such; to intimidate that the military force of a people must be intended only for their own protection, and not to invade and annoy their neighbours; to secure their own right, not to encroach upon the rights of others.

(6.) They had a vast trade, and a correspondence with nations upon earth, as well as upon the sea. Some nations they dealt with in one commodity, and some in another, according as either its products or its manufactures were, and the fruits of nature or art were: with which it was blessed. This is very much enlarged upon here, as that which was the principal glory of Tyre, and which supported all the rest. We do not find any where in scripture so many nations associated together as are here; so that this chapter, some think, gives much light to the first account we have of the settlement of the nations after the flood, Gen. x. The critics have abundance of work here to find out the several places and nations spoken of; concerning many of them their conjectures are different, and they leave us in the dark, and at much uncertainty; it is well that it is not material; modern surveys come short of explaining the ancient geography; and we will not amuse ourselves here with a particular enquiry, either concerning the traders, or the goods they traded in; we leave it to the critical expositors, and observe that only which is improvable.

[1.] We have reason to think that Ezekiel knew little, of his own knowledge, concerning the trade of Tyre; he was a priest, carried away captive far enough from the neighbourhood of Tyre, we may suppose when he was young, there he had been eleven years. And yet he speaks of the particular merchandises of Tyre as nicely as if he had been comptroller of the custom-house there; by which it appears that he was divinely inspired in what he spoke and wrote. It is God that saith this, v. 3.

[2.] This account of the trade of Tyre intimates to us, that God does not take any notice of what they do when they are employed in their worldly business; not only when they are at church, praying and hearing, but when they are in their markets and fairs, and upon the exchange, buying and selling; which is a good reason why we should in all our dealings keep a conscience void of offence; and have our eye always upon him who sees our actions.

[3.] We may here observe the wisdom of God, and his goodness, as the common Father of mankind, in making one country to abound in one commodity, and another in another, and all more or less serviceable either to the necessity, or to the comfort and ornament, of human life. Non omnis fret omnia tellus—One land does not supply all the varieties of produce. Providence dispenses its gifts variously, some to each, and all to none, that they may be a mutual commerce among those whom God has made partakers of his grace. As they are all called on all the face of the earth, Acts xix. 26. Let every nation therefore thank God for the productions of its country; though they be not so rich as those of others, yet there is use for them in the public service of the world.

[4.] See what a blessing trade and merchandise are to mankind, especially when followed in the fear of God, and are a regular, not only a private advantage, but to a common benefit. The world is full of God's riches, Ps. civ. 24. There is a multitude of all kind of riches in it, (as it is here, v. 12,) gathered off its surface, and dug out of its bowels. The earth is also full of the fruits of men's ingenuity and industry, according as their genius leads them; now by exchange and barter these are made more extensively useful; thus what can be spared is helped off, and what is wanted is fetched in, in lieu of it, from the most distant countries. Those that are not traders themselves, have reason to thank God for tradesmen and merchants, by whom the productions of other countries are brought to our hands, as those of our own are by our husbandmen.

[5.] Beside the necessaries that are here traded in, there whose abundance of things are here mentioned, that only serve to please fancy, and are made valuable only by men's humour and custom; and yet God allows us to use them, and trade in them, and part with these things for them, which we can spare, that are of an intrinsic worth much beyond them. Here are horns of ivory and ebony, (v. 13,) that are brought for a present, exposed to sale, and offered in exchange; or, as some think, presented to the city, or the great men of it, to obtain their favour. Here are emeralds, coral, and agate, (v. 16,) all precious stones and gold, (v. 22,) which the world could better be without than iron and common stones. Here are, to please the taste and smell, the chief of all spices, (v. 22,) cassia and calamus, (v. 19,) and, for ornament, purple, broidered work, and fine linen; (v. 15,) precious cloths for chariots, (v. 20,) blue cloth, (which Tyre was famous for,) broidered work, and chests of rich apparel, bound with rich cords, and made of cedar, a sweet wood to perfume the garments kept in them, v. 24. Upon the review of this invoice, or bill of parcels, we may justly say, What a great many things are here that we have no need of, and can live very comfortably without. It is observable that Judah and the land of Israel were merchants in Tyre too; in a way of trade they were allowed to converse with the heathen. But they traded mostly in wheat, a substantial commodity, and necessary; wheats of Minnith and Pamnag, two countries in Cenam famous for the best wheat, as some think; the whole land indeed was a land of wheat, (Deut. viii. 8.) It had the field of Kidon, (v. 17,) for it, as other parts of the land, was maintained by corn fetched from the land of Israel: they traded likewise in honey, and oil, and balm, or rosin; all useful things, and not serving to pride or luxury. And the land which these were the staple commodities of, was that which was the glory of all lands, which God reserved for his peculiar people, not those that traded in spices and precious stones; and the Israelites could not have enough of that which was provided for them if they have food convenient; for they that are acquainted with the delights of the children of God, will not set their hearts on the delights of the sons and daughters of men, or the treasures of kings and provinces. We find indeed that the New Testament Babylonia in such things as Tyre traded in, Rev. xvi. 12, 13. For, notwithstanding its pretensions to sanctity, it is a mere worldly interest.
[7.1 Though Tyre was a city of great merchandise, and they got abundance by buying and selling, importing commodities from one place, and exporting them to another, yet manufacture-trades were not neglected. The wares of their own making, and a multitude of such wares, are here spoken of, v. 16, 18. It is the wisdom of a nation to encourage art and industry, and not to bear hard upon the handicraft-tradesmen; for it contributes much to the wealth and honour of a nation to send abroad samples of such wares, as might bring them in the multitude of all riches.

[8.] All this made Tyre very great and very proud; The ships of Tarshish did sing of thee in thy market, (v. 25.) thou wast admired and cried up by all the nations that had dealings with thee; for thou wast replenished in wealth and number of people, was beautified, and made very glorious, in the midst of the seas. These that grow rich are cried up as very glorious; for riches are glorious things in the eyes of carnal people, Gen. xxxxi. 1.]

26. Thy rowers have brought thee into great waters: the east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas. 27. Thy riches, and thy fairs, thy merchandise, thy mariners, and thy pilots, thy calkers, and the occupiers of thy merchandise, and all thy men of war, that are in thee, and in all thy company, which is in the midst of thee, shall fall into the midst of the seas in the day of thy ruin. 28. The suburbs shall shake at the sound of the cry of thy pilots. 29. And all that handle the oar, the mariners, and all the pilots of the sea, shall come down from their ships, they shall stand upon the land; 30. And shall cause their voice to be heard against thee, and shall cry bitterly, and shall cast up dust upon their heads; they shall wallow themselves in the ashes: 31. And they shall make themselves utterly bald for thee, and gird them with sackcloth; and they shall weep for thee with bitterness of heart and bitter wailing. 32. And in their wailing they shall take up a lamentation for thee, and lament over thee, saying, What city is like Tyre, like the destroyed in the midst of the sea? 33. When thy wares went forth out of the seas, thou filledst many people: thou didst enrich the kings of the earth with the multitude of thy riches and of thy merchandise. 34. In the time when thou shalt be broken by the seas in the depths of the waters, thy merchandise, and all thy company in the midst of thee, shall fall. 35. All the inhabitants of the isles shall be astonished at thee, and their kings shall be sore afraid, they shall be troubled in their countenance. 36. The merchants among the people shall hiss at thee; thou shalt be a terror, and never shall be any more.

We have seen Tyre flourishing, here we have Tyre falling; and great is the fall of it, so much the greater for its having made such a figure in the world. Note, The most mighty and magnificent kingdoms and states, sooner or later, have their day, and some chance of promotion or success; but when they are in their zenith, they will begin to decline; but the destruction of Tyre was sudden. Her sun went down at noon. And all her wealth and grandeur, pomp and power, did but aggravate her ruin, and make it the more grievous to herself, and astonishing to all about her. Now observe here,

1. How the ruin of Tyre will be brought about, v. 26. Sudden, great, sudden, like a great ship split or sunk by the misdirection of her steersmen; Thy rowers have themselves brought thee into great and dangerous waters; the governors of the city, and those that had the management of their public affairs, by some mismanagement or other involved them in that war with the Chaldeans, which was the ruin of their state; by their insolvency, by some avarice given to the Chaldeans, or some attempt made upon them, in confidence of their own ability to contend with them, they provoked Nebuchadnezzar to make a descent upon them, and, by their obstinacy in standing it out to the last, enraged him to that degree, that he determined the ruin of their state; and, like an east wind, broke them in the midst of the seas. Note, It is ill with a people when those who sit at their own table, instead of putting them into the harbour, run them aground.

2. How great and general the ruin will be. All her wealth shall be buried with her, her riches, her fairs, and her merchandise; (v. 27.) all that had any dependence upon her, and dealings with her, in trade, in war, in conversation, they shall all fall with her into the midst of the seas, in the day of her ruin. Note, Those who make creatures their confidence, place their happiness in their interest in them, and rest their hopes upon them, will of course fall with them; happy therefore are they that have the God of Jacob for their Help, and whose hope is in the Lord their God, who lives for ever.

3. What sordid lamentation would be made for the destruction of Tyre. The pilots, their princes and governors, when they see how ill they have conducted themselves, and how much they have contributed to their own ruin, shall cry out so loud as to make even the suburbs shake, (v. 28.) such a vexation shall it be to them to reflect upon their own bad conduct. The inferior officers, that were as the mariners of the state, shall be forced to come down from their respective posts, (v. 29.) and they shall cry out against them, and shall disown all they had received from them, most properly; and well able to hold out as thought thou hadst been; they shall cry bitterly for the common ruin, and their own share in it. They shall use all the most solemn expressions of grief; they shall cast dust on their heads, in indignation against themselves, shall wallow themselves in ashes, as having bid a final farewell to all ease and pleasure; they shall make themselves bald, (v. 31.) with tearing their hair; and, according to the custom of great mourners, they shall gird themselves with sackcloth, who used to wear fine linen; and, instead of merry songs, they shall weep with bitterness of heart. Note, Losses and crosses are very grievous, and hard to be borne, to those that have long been wallowing in pleasure, and sleeping in carnal security.

4. How Tyre should be upbraided with her former honour and prosperity; (v. 32, 33.) she that was Tyre the renowned, shall now be called Tyre the destroyed to the midst of the sea. "What city is like Tyre? Did ever any city come down from such a height of prosperity to such a depth of adversity? Time was, when thy wares, those of thine own making, and those that passed through thy hands, went forth out of the seas, and were exported to all parts of the world; then thou filledst many people, and didst enrich the kings of the earth and their kingdoms. The Tyrians, though they bore such a name in trade, were yet, it seems, fair merchants, and let their neighbours not only live, but thrive, by them. All that dealt with them, were gainers; they did not cheat or oppress the people, but did enrich them with the multitude of their merchandise. "But now they that used to be enriched by thee, shall be ruined with thee," (as is usual in trade); "when thou shalt be broken, and all that are lifted up in thee, all thy company shall fall too," v. 34. There is an end of Tyre, that made such a noise and bustle in the world. This great blaze goes out in a snuff.

3. How the fall of Tyre should be matter of terror to some, and laughter to others, according to they were differently interested and affected. Some shall be sore afraid, and shall be troubled, (v. 55.) concluding it will be their own turn to fall next. Others shall hiss at her, (v. 36.) shall ridicule her pride and vanity, and bad conduct, and think her ruin just. She triumphed in Jerusalem's fall, and there are those that will triumph in hers. When God casts his judgments on the sinner, men also shall clap their hands at him, and shall hiss him out of his place, Job xxvii. 22, 23. Is this the city which men called the perfection of beauty?

CHAP. XXVIII.

In this chapter, we have, I. A prediction of the fall and ruin of the king of Tyre, who, in the destruction of that city, is particularly set up as a mark for God's avowals, v. 1-10. II. A lamentation for the king of Tyre, when he is thus fallen, though he falls by his own iniquity, v. 11-19. III. A prophecy of the destruction of Zion, which was in the neighbourhood of Tyre, and had a dependence upon it, v. 20-25. IV. A promise of the restoration of the Israel of God, though in the day of their calamity they were insulted over by their neighbours, v. 24-26.

1. THE word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, say unto the prince of Tyrus, Thus saith the Lord God, Because thy heart is lifted up, and thou hast said, I am a god, I sit in the seat of God, in the midst of the seas; yet thou art a man, and not God, though thou set thy heart as the heart of God: 3. Behold, thou art wiser than Daniel; there is no secret that they can hide from thee: 4. With thy wisdom and with thine understanding thou hast gotten thee riches, and hast gotten gold and silver into thy treasures: 5. By thy great wisdom, and by thy traffic, hast thou increased thy riches, and thy heart is lifted up because of thy riches: 6. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast set thy heart as the heart of God; 7. Behold, therefore, I will bring strangers upon thee, the terrible of the nations: and they shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, and they shall defile thy brightness. 8. They shall bring thee down to the pit, and thou shalt die of the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas. 9. Wilt thou yet say before him that slayeth thee, I am God? but thou shalt be a man, and no god, in the hand of him that slayeth thee. 10. Thou shalt die of the deaths of the uncutومmaced by the hand of strangers: for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God.

We had done with Tyrus in the foregoing chapter, but now the prince of Tyrus is to be singled out from the rest; here is something to be said to him by himself; a message to him from God, which the prophet must send him, whether he will hear or whether he will forbear.

1. He must tell him of his pride. His people were proud, (ch. xxvii. 3.) and so is he; and they shall both be made to know that God resists the proud. Let him know that he is not safe.

1. What were the expressions of his pride? His heart was lifted up, v. 2. He had a great conceit of himself, was blown up with an opinion of his own sufficiency, and looked with disdain upon all about him; out of the abundance of the pride of his heart, he said, I am a god: he did not only say it in his heart, but had the impudence to speak it out. God has said of princes, They are gods, (Ps. lix. 6.) but it does not become them to say so of themselves; it is a high affront to him who is God alone, and will not give his glory to another. He thought that the city of Tyre had as necessary a dependence upon him as the world has upon the God that made it; and that he was himself independent as God, and unaccountable to any. He thought himself to have the wealth and greatness and God strength and as incontestable an authority, and that his prerogatives were as absolute, and his word as much a law, as the word of God. He challenged divine honours, and expected to be praised and admired as a god, and doubted not to be defied among other heroes, after his death, as a great benefactor to the world. Thus the king of Babylon said, I will be like the Most High, (Isa. xiv. 14,) he even like the Most High in the strange God, and therefore will not be easily traduced, because I cannot be controlled. I sit in the seat of God; I sit as high as God, my throne equal with his. Divinum imperium cun Jove Caesar habet.—Cesar divides dominion with Jove. I sit as safe as God, as safe in the heart of the seas, and as far out of the reach of danger, as he in the height of heaven. He thinks his guards of men of a set apart from God and independent on him, as her armies were of hosts of angels that are about the throne of God. He is put in mind of his meaness and mortality, and, since he needs to be told, he shall be told, that self-evident truth, Thou art a man, and not God, a depending creature, a dying creature; thou art flesh, and not spirit, Isa. xxxi. 5. Note, Men must be made to know that they are but men, Ps. ix. 20. The greatest wits, the greatest dototies, the greatest solons are men, and not gods; Jesus Christ was both God and man. The king of Tyre, though he has such a mighty influence upon all about him, and with the help of his riches bears a mighty sway, though he has tribute and presents brought to his court with as much devotion as if they were sacrifices to his altar, though he is flattered by his courtiers, and made a god by his poets, yet after all, he is only a man, he knows it, he says it; but he sets his heart as the heart of God; Thus hast conceived thyself to be a god, hast compared thy self with God, thinking thyself as wise and strong and as fit to govern the world, as he. It was the ruin of our first parents, and ours in them, that they would be as gods, Gen. iii. 5. And still that corrupt nature which inclines men to set up themselves in their own eyes, to exalt themselves above what they are, to prize what their own hands have made, to have what they will, their own end, to live to themselves, and their own felicity, to enjoy themselves, sets their hearts as the heart of God, invades his prerogatives, and catches at the flowers of his crown—a presumption that cannot go unpunished.
1. We are here told what it was that he was proud of.

1. His wisdom. It is probable that this prince was a man of very good natural parts, a philosopher, and well read in all the parts of learning that were then in vogue, at least, a politician, and one that had great dexterity in managing the affairs of state. And then he thought himself wiser than Daniel, v. 3. We found, before, that Daniel, though now but a young man, was celebrated for his prevalence in prayer, ch. xiv. 14. Here, we find him famous for his understanding in the management of the affairs of this world, a great scholar and statesman, and withal a great saint; and yet not a prince, but a poor captive. It was strange that under such external disadvantages his lustre should shine forth, so that he was become wise to the proverb. When the king of Tyre dreams himself to be a god, he says, I am wiser than Daniel. There is no secret that they can hide from thee. Probably, he challenged all about him to prove him with questions, as Solomon was proved, and he had unravelled all their enigmas, had solved all their problems, and none of them all could puzzle him; he had perhaps been successful in discovering plots, and diving into the counsels of the neighbouring princes; and therefore thought himself omnipotent, and that no thought could be withholden from him. Therefore he said, I am a god. Note, Knowledge puffeth up; it is hard to know much and not to know it too well, and to be elevated with it. He that was wiser than Daniel, was prouder than Lucifer. Those therefore that are knowing must study to humble, and to evidence that they are so.

2. His wealth. That way his wisdom led him; it is not said that by his wisdom he searched into the avenues of religion or government, meddled the state better than it was, or made better laws, or had advanced the interests of the commonwealth of learning; but his wisdom and understanding were of use to him in traffic. As some of the kings of Judah loved husbandry, (2 Chron. xxxvi. 10.) so the king of Tyre loved merchandise, and by it he got riches, increased his riches, and filled his treasures with gold and silver, and with silver-wares, and with vessels of gold. Thus, the wisest of the world is, those are cried up as the wisest men, that know how to get money, and by right or wrong to raise estates; and yet really this their way is their folly, Ps. lxxix. 13. It was the folly of the king of Tyre, [1.] That he attributed the increase of his wealth to himself, and not to the providence of God, forgetting him whom he had forsaken, to get wealth, Dan. viii. 17, 18. [2.] That he therefore thought himself a wise man, because he was a rich man; whereas a fool may have an estate, (Ecc. vi. 19.) yes, and a fool may get an estate, for the world has been often observed to favour such, when bread is not to the wise, Ecc. iv. 11. [3.] That his heart was lifted up because of his riches; for the increase of his wealth, which made him so haughty and proud; and yet he had no heart to set his heart as the heart of God. The man of sin, when he had a great deal of worldly pomp and power, showed himself as a god, 2 Thess. ii. 4. Those who are rich in this world, have therefore need to charge that upon themselves, which the word of God charges upon them, that they be not high-minded, 1 Tim. vi. 17.

2. The extremity of the destruction; They shall draw their swords against the beauty of thy wisdom, v. 7. against all those things which they gloried in as thy beauty, and the production of thy wisdom. Note, It is just with God that our enemies should make that their prey which we have made our pride. The king of Tyre’s palace, his treasury, his city, his navy, his army, these he glories in as his brightness, these, he thinks, make him illustrious and glorious as a god on earth. But all these the victorious enemy shall defile, shall deface, shall detest, he thought them sacred, things that none durst touch; but the conquerers shall seize them as common spoil, and spoil the brightness of them. But, whatever comes of what he has, surely his person is saved, (v. 8.) whereas Solomon’s body was burnt to ashes. They shall cast him, (x. 26.) into the fire, to the grave; then shall die the death. And, (1.) It shall not be an honourable death, but an ignominious one. He shall be so vituperated in his death, that he may despair of being defiled after his death. He shall die the deaths of them that are slain in the midst of the seas, that have no honour done them at their death, but their dead bodies are immediately thrown overboard, without any ceremony or mark of distinction, to be a feast for the fish. Tyre is like to be destroyed in the midst of the sea, (ch. xxxvii. 32.) and the prince of Tyre shall fare no better than the people. (2.) It shall not be a happy death, but a miserable one; he shall die the deaths of the uncircumcised, (v. 10.) of those that are strangers to God, and not in covenant with him, and therefore that die under his wrath and curse. It is death, a double death, a temporal and eternal, the death both of body and soul. He shall die the second death; that is dying miserably indeed. The sentence of death, here passed upon the king of Tyre, is ratified by a divine authority; I have spoken it, saith the Lord God. And what he has said will he do. None can gainsay it, nor will he answer it.

3. The effectual destruction. He shall be made of all his pretensions to deity, (v. 9.) “When the conqueror sets his sword to thy breast, and then seest no way of escape, wilt thou then say, I am God? Wilt thou then have such a conceit of thyself, and such a confidence in thyself, as thou hast now? No, thy being overpowered by death, and by the fear of it, will force thee to own that thou art not a god, but a weak, trembling, trembling, dying man. In such a hand as that which is here described, (in the hand of and of the instruments that he employed,) thou shalt be a man, and not God; utterly unable to resist, and help thyself.” I have said, Ye are gods; but ye shall die like men, Ps. lixxxii. 6, 7. Note, Those who pretend to be rivals with God, shall be forced one way or other to let fall their claims. Death, a last, worst, when we come into his hand, will make us know that we are men.

11. Moreover, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 12. Son of man, take up a lamentation upon the king of Ty- rus, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God, Thou sealest up the sun, full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty. 13. Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God; every precious stone was thy covering, the sardius, topaz, and the diamond, the beryl, the onyx; and the jasper, the sapphire, the emerald, and the carbuncle, and gold: the workmanship of thy taborets and of thy pipes was prepared in thee in the day that thou wast created. 14. Thou art the anointed cherub that coverest; and I have set thee so: thou wast upon the holy mountain of God; thou hast walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire. 15. Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day that thou wast created, till iniquity was found in thee. 16. By the multitude of thy merchandise they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thou hast sinned; therefore I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God; and I will destroy thee, O covering cherub, from the midst of the stones of fire. 17. Thy heart was lifted up because of thy beauty; thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of thy brightness: I will cast thee to the ground, I will lay thee before kings, that they may behold thee. 18. Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities, by the iniquity of thy traffic; therefore will I bring forth a fire from the midst of thee, it shall devour thee; and I will bring thee to ashes upon the earth, in the sight of all them that behold thee. 19. All they that know thee among the people shall be astonished at thee: thou shalt be a terror, and never shalt thou be any more.

As after the prediction of the ruin of Tyre, (ch. xxvi.) followed a pathetic lamentation for its, (ch. xxvi, ii.) so after the ruin of the king of Tyre is foretold, it is bewailed.

1. This is commonly understood of the present prince of Tyre, spoken to, v. 2. His name was Eschato, or Ethiobus, as Diodorus Siculus calls him, that was king of Tyre when Nebuchadnezzar destroyed it. He was, it seems, upon all external accounts, an accomplished man, very great and famous; but his iniquity was his ruin. Many expositors have suggested, that beside the literal sense of this lamentation there is an allegory in it, and that it is an allusion to the fall of the angels that sinned, who undid themselves by their pride. And (as is usual in texts that have a mystical meaning) some passages here refer primarily to the king of Tyre, as that of his high degree, his prerogatives over the angels, as that of being in the holy mountain of God. But if there be any thing mystical in it, (as perhaps there may,) I shall rather refer it to the fall of Adam, which seems to be glanced at, (v. 13.) Thou hast been in Eden the garden of God, and that in the day thou wast created.

In some it is thought that the king of Tyre is meant the whole royal family, this including also the foregoing kings, and looking as far back as Hiram king of Tyre. The present governor is called prince; (v. 2.) but he that is here lamented is called king. The court of Tyre and its kings had for many ages been famous. But sins ruins it.

Now we may observe two things here:

1. What was the renown of the king of Tyre. He is here spoken of as having lived in great splendour, v. 12.—15. He was a man but it is here owned he was a very considerable man, and one that made a mark for himself in his day. He exceeded other men; Hiram and other kings of Tyre had done so in their time; and the present king perhaps had not come short of any of them: Thou seest up the sum full of wisdom, and perfect in beauty: both the powers of human nature and the prosperity of human life, seemed in him to have been at the highest pitch. He was looked upon to be as wise as one of his merchandise, ethiobus, he could make him, and as happy as the wealth of this world and his enjoyment of it could make him; in him you might see the utmost that both could do; and therefore seal up the sum, for nothing can be added; he is a complete man, perfect in suo generi—in his kind. (2.) He seemed to be as wise and happy as Adam in innocence; (v. 13.) Thou hast been in Eden, even in the garden of God, thou hast lived as it were in paradise all thy days, hast had a full enjoyment of everything that is good for food or pleasant to the eyes; and an uncontroverted dominion over all about thee, as Adam had. One instance of the magnificence of the king of Tyre, is, that he outdid all other princes in jewels, those which have the most plenty of that trade most abroad, as he did; Every precious stone of his temple. There is a great variety of precious stones; but he had jewels of so great a quantity, and so splendid, that, beside what were treasured up in his cabinet, and were the ornaments of his crown, he had his clothes trimmed with them; they were his covering; nay, (v. 14.) he walked up and down in the midst of the stones of fire, these precious stones, which glittered and sparkled like fire. His rooms were in a manner set round with jewels, so that he walked in the midst of them. He was so proud and vain that he fancied himself so glorious as if, like God, he had been surrounded by so many angels, who are compared to a flame of fire. And if he be such an admirer of precious stones as to think them as bright as angels, no wonder that he is such an admirer of himself, as to think himself as great as God. Nine several sorts of precious stones are here named, which were all in the High Priest's ephod: these gems they are particularly named, because he, in his building, and in his dress, and in speaking, was to speak particularly of them, and tell those about him, with a great deal of foolish pleasure. THIS is such a precious stone; of such a value, and so and so are its virtues. Thus is he upbraided with his vanity. Gold is mentioned last, as far inferior in value to these precious stones; and he used to speak of it accordingly. Another thing that made him think his palace a paradise, was, the curious music he had, the taborets and pipes, hand instruments and wind instruments; the workmanship of these was extraordinary, and they were prepared for him on purpose; prepared in thee, the pronoun is feminine, in thee, O Tyre; or it denotes that the king was effeminate in doing on such things. They were prepared in the day he was created. This is, that the architect of the temple had made them on purpose to celebrate the joys either of his birth-day or of his coronation-day. These he prided himself much in, and would have all that came to see his palace take notice of them. (3.) He looked like an incarnate angel; (v. 14.) Thou art the anointed cherub that covers or protects; that is, he looked upon himself as a guardian angel, that he was bright, he was the glory set pointed to their office, and qualified for it; anointed kings should be to their subjects as anointed cherubim, that cover them with the wings of their power; when they are such, God will own them; their advancement was from him; I have set thee so. Some think, because mention was made of Eden, that it refers to the cherub set on the east of Eden to cover it, Gen. iii. 24. He thought himself as able to guard his city from all invaders as that angel was for his charge. Or, it may refer to the cherubim in the most holy place, whose wings covered the ark; he thought himself as bright as one of them. (4.) He appeared in as much splendour as the High Priest when he was clothed with his garments for glory and honour, which was most pleasing to God, as president of the temple built on that holy mountain; thou didst look as great, and with as much majesty and authority, as ever the High Priest did when he walked in the temple, which was garnished with precious stones, (2 Chron. iii. 6.) and had his habit on, which had precious stones both in the breast and on the shoulders; in that he seeth set up in the midst of the stones of fire. Thus glorious is the king of Tyre; at least, he thinks himself so.

2. Let us now see what was the ruin of the king of Tyre, what it was that stained his glory, and laid all this honour in the dust: (v. 15.) "Thus was perfect in thy ways thou didst prosper in all thy affairs; and every thing went well with thee; thou hast not only not a clear, but a bright reputation, from the day thou wast created, the day of thine accession to the throne, till iniquity was found in thee; and that spoiled all." This may perhaps allude to the deplorable case of the angels that fell, and of our first parents, who were perfect in their ways till iniquity was found in them. And when iniquity was once found in him it increased, he grew worse and worse; and increased, and increased; and "his pride, led thy sanctuaries; thou hast lost the benefit of all that which thou thoughtst sacred, and in which, as in a sanctuary, thou thoughtest to take refuge; these thou hast defiled, and so exposed thyself by the multitude of thine iniquities." Now observe,

1. What the iniquity was that was the ruin of the king of Tyre. (1.) The iniquity of his traffic, (v. 16.) by the multitude of thy merchandise; they have filled the midst of thee with violence, and thus thou hast sinned. The king had so much to do with his merchandise, and was so wholly intent upon the gains of that, that he took no care to do justice, to right things; and to himself, and to others; and to make all agreeable, he hath committed violence; nay, in the multiplicity of business, wrong was done to many by oversight; and in his dealings he made use of his power to invade the rights of those he dealt with. Note, Those that have much to do in the world, are in great danger of doing much amiss; and it is hard to deal with many without violence to some. Trades are called mysteries; but too many make mysteries of iniquity. (2.) His pride and vainglory; (v. 17.) "Thine heart was lifted up because of thy beauty; thou wast in love with thyself, and thy own shadow. And thus thou hast corrupted thy wisdom by reason of the brightness, the pomp and splendour, wherein thou livest." He gazed so much upon this, that it dazzled his eyes, and prevented him from seeing his way. He appeared so puffed up with his greatness, that it bereaved him both of his wisdom, and of the reputation of it. He really became a fool in glorifying. Those make a bad bargain for themselves, that part with their wisdom for the gratifying of their gaiety, and, to please a vain humour, lose a real excellency.

2. What the ruin was, that this iniquity brought him to. (1.) He was thrown out of his dignity, and dislodged from his palace, which he took to be his paradise and temple; (v. 16.) "I will cast thee as profane out of the mountain of God." His kingly power was high as a mountain, setting him above others; it was a mountain of God, for the powers that be are ordained of God, and have something in them that is sacred; but, having abused his power, he is reckoned profane, and is therefore deposed and expelled; he disgraces the crown he wears, and so has forfeited it, and shall be destroyed from the midst of the stones of fire, the precious stones with which his palace was garnished, as the temple was; and they shall be no protection to him. (2.) He was exposed to contempt and disgrace, and trampled upon by his neighbours; "I will cast thee among the pavement-stones, from the midst of the precious stones, and will lay thee a fruitful spectacle before kings, that they may behold thee, and take warning by thee not to be proud and oppressive." (3.) He was quite consumed by his city, and by it; "I will bring forth a fire from the midst of thee. The conquerors, when they have plundered the city, will kindle a fire in the heart of it, which shall lay it, and the palace particularly, in ashes. Or, it may be taken more generally, for the fire of God's judgments, which shall devour both prince and people, and bring all the glory of both to ashes upon the earth; and shall be brought forth from the midst of thee. All God's judgments upon sinners take rise from themselves; they are devoured by a fire of their own kindling. (4.) He was hereby made a terrible example of divine vengeance. Thus he is reduced in the sight of all them that behold him; (v. 18.) They that know him shall be astonished at him, and shall wonder how one that stood so high could be brought so low. The king of Tyre's palace, like the temple at Jerusalem when it was destroyed, shall be an astonishment and a hissing, 2 Chron. vii. 20, 21. So fell the king of Tyre.

20. Again the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 21. Son of man, set thy face against Zidon, and prophesy against it, 22. And say, Thus saith the Lord God; Behold, I am against thee, O Zidon; and I will be glorified in the midst of thee: and they shall know that I am the Lord, when I have executed judgments in her, and shall be sanctified in her. 23. For I will send into her pestilence, and blood into her streets; and the wounded shall be judged in the midst of her by the sword upon her on every side; and they shall know that I am the Lord. 24. And there shall be no more a pricking brier unto the house of Israel, nor any grieving thorn of all that are round about them, that despised them; and they shall know that I am the Lord God. 25. Thus saith the Lord God, When I shall have gathered the house of Israel from the people among whom they are scattered, and shall be sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen, then shall they dwell in their land that I have given to my servant Jacob. 26. And they shall dwell safely therein, and shall build houses, and plant vineyards; yea, they shall dwell with confidence, when I have executed judgments upon all those that despise them round about them; and they shall know that I am the Lord their God.
God's glory is his great end, both in all the good and in all the evil which proceed out of the mouth of the Most High; so we find in these verses,

1. God will be glorified in the destruction of Zion, a city that lay near to Tyre, was more ancient, but not so considerable, had a dependence upon it, and stood and fell with it. God says here, I am against thee, O Zion, and I will be glorified in the ruin of thee, v. 22. And again, "They that would not know by gentler methods, shall be made to know that I am the Lord, and I alone, and that I am a just and jealous God, when I shall have executed judgments in her, destroying judgments, when I shall have done execution according to justice, and according to the sentence passed; and so shall be sanctified in her." The Zidonians, it seems, were more addicted to idolatry than the Tyrians were, who, being men of business and large conversation, were less under the power of bigotry and superstition; the Zidonians were noted for the worship of Ashtaroth. Solomon introduced it, 1 Kings xi. 9. Jezebel was daughter to the king of Zion, who brought the worship of Baal into Israel; (1 Kings xxi. 31.) so that God had been much dishonoured by the Zidonians. Now, says he, I will be glorified in the destruction of Zion, which were borderers upon the land of Israel, where God was known, and where they might have got the knowledge of him, and have learned to glorify him: but, instead of that, they seduced Israel to the worship of their idols. Note, When God is sanctified, he is glorified; for his holiness is his glory; and those whom he is not sanctified and glorified by, he will be sanctified and glorified upon, by executing judgments upon them, which speak him a just Avenger of his own and his people's injured honour.

The judgments that shall be executed upon Zion are, war and pestilence, two wasting, depopulating judgments, v. 23. They are God's messengers which he sends on his errands, and they shall accomplish that for which he sends them. Pestilence and blood shall be sent into her streets, there the dead bodies of these shall lie, who perished, some by the plague, occasional or through ill diet when the city was besieged, and some by the sword of the enemy, most likely the Chaldean armies, when the city was taken, and all were put to the sword. Thus the wounded shall be judged; when they are dying of their wounds, they shall judge themselves, and others shall say, They justly fall; or, as some read it, They shall be punished by the sword, that sword which God shall commission to destroy every side. It is God that judges, and he will overcome.

Nor is it Tyre and Zion only on which God would execute judgments, but on all these that despised his people Israel, and triumphed in their calamities; for this was now God's controversy with the nations that were round about them, v. 26. Note, When God's people are under his contending, he will not be pleased to see those who despise them and their enemies, to see those who despise them, and their enemies, to take delight in them, and to affect the membranes that were scorched, that they shall not seem vile to those who are about them, and therefore takes it ill of these who despise them, and so help forward the affliction when he is but a little displeased; Zech. i. 13. God regards them even in their low estate; and therefore let not men despise them.

God will be glorified in the restoration of his people to their former safety and prosperity. God had been dishonoured by the sins of his people, and their sufferings too had given occasion to the enemy to blaspheme; (Isa. lii. 5.) but God will now both care them of their sins, and ease them of their troubles, and so will be sanctified in them in the sight of the heathen, will recover the honour of his holiness, to the satisfaction of all the world, v. 25. For,

1. (1.) They shall return to the possession of their own land again; I will gather the house of Israel out of their dispersions, in answer to that prayer, (Ps. civ. 47.) Save us, O Lord our God, and gather us from among the heathen; and in pursuance of that promise, (Deut. xxx. 4.) Then the Lord thy God gather thee. Being gathered, they shall be brought in a body, to dwell in the land that I have given to your fathers, to the ancient grant, in bringing them back, for that remained in force, and the discontinuance of the possession was not a defection of the right. He gave it, will again give it.

2. (2.) They shall enjoy great tranquillity there. When those that had been vexations to them are taken off, they shall live in quietness; there shall be no more a burning briar, or a gnawing thorn, v. 24. They shall have a happy habit, and shall build houses, and plant vineyards; and they shall enjoy a happy security and serenity there; they shall dwell safely, shall dwell with confidence, and there shall be none to disquiet them, or make them afraid, v. 26. This never had a full accomplishment in the body of that people, for after their return out of captivity, they were ever and anon molested by one band or another: But now, the church in this world has been ever since quite free from prickling briars and gnawing thorns; yet sometimes the church has rest; believers always dwell safely under the divine protection, and may be quiet from the fear of evil. But the full accomplishment of this promise is reserved for the heavenly Canaan, when all the saints shall be gathered together, and every thing that offends shall be removed, and all griefs and fears for ever banished.

CHAP. XXIX.

Three chapters we had concerning Tyre and its king, next follow four chapters concerning Egypt and its king. This is the first of them. Egypt is described and foretold, no doubt, and in a general manner, for late they had had but too friendly a correspondence with it, and had depended too much upon it; and therefore, whether the proclamation reached Egypt or no, it would be of use to Israel, to take them off from their confidence in their alliance with it. The prophecies against Egypt, which are all laid together in these four chapters, were of five several dates; the first in the tenth year of captivity; (v. 1.) the second in the twenty-second; (v. 12.) the third in the eleventh year, and the first month; (ch. xxx. 20.) the fourth in the eleventh year, and the third month; (ch. xxxi. 1.) the fifth in the twelfth year; (ch. xxxii. 1.) and another in the sixteenth year. We shall observe these in this chapter, we have,

1. The destruction of Pharaoh foretold, for his dealing deceitfully with Israel. v. 1. 7. II. The desolation of the land of Egypt foretold, v. 8. 12. III. A promise of the restoration thereof, in part, after forty years, v. 13. 18. IV. The possession that should be given to Nubchadrezar of the land of Egypt, v. 17. 20. V. A promise of mercy to Israel, v. 21.

1. In the tenth year, in the tenth month, in the twelfth day of the month, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying,

2. Son of man, set thy face against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and prophesy against him, and against all Egypt: 3. Speak, and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, Pharaoh king of Egypt, the great dragon that lieth in the midst of his rivers, which hath said, My river is mine own, and I have made it for myself. 4. But I will put hooks in thy jaws, and I will cause the fish of thy rivers to stick unto thy scales; and I will bring thee up out of the midst of thy rivers, and all the fish of the rivers shall stick unto thy scales. 5. And I will leave thee thrown into the wilderness, thee and all the fish of thy rivers: thou shalt fall upon the open fields; thou shalt not be brought together, nor gathered: I have given thee for meat to the beasts of the field and to the fowls of the heaven. 6. And all the inhabitants of Egypt shall know that I am the Lord, because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel. 7. When they took hold of thee by the hand, thou didst break, and rend all their shoulder: and when they leaned upon thee thou brakest, and madest all their loins to be at a stand.

Here is,

I. The date of this prophecy against Egypt. It was in the tenth year of the captivity, and yet it is placed after the prophecy against Tyre, which was delivered in the eleventh year, because in the accomplishment of the prophecies, the destruction of Tyre happened before the destruction of Egypt, and Nebuchadnezzar's gaining Egypt was the recompense of the eyes of his adversaries: therefore the prophecy against Tyre is put first, that we may the better observe that. But particular notice must be taken of this, that the first prophecy against Egypt was just at the time when the king of Egypt was coming to relieve Jerusalem, and raise the siege, (Jer. xxxviij. 5.) but did not answer the expectations of the Jews from them. Note, It is good to foresee the failure of our creature-confidence, then when we are most in temptation to depend upon them; that we may cease from man.

II. The scope of this prophecy. It is directed against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and against all Egypt, v. 2. The prophecy against Tyre began with the people, and then proceeded against the prince. But this begins with the prince, because it begins to have its accomplishment in the insurrections and rebellions of the people against the prince, not long after this.

III. The prophecy itself. Pharaoh Hophra (for so was the present Pharaoh surnamed) is here represented by a great dragon, or crocodile, that lies in the midst of his rivers, as Leviathan in the waters, to play therein, v. 3. Niblus, the river of Egypt, was famed for crocodiles. And what is the king of Egypt, in God's account, but a great dragon, venomous and mischievous? Therefore says God, I am against thee, I am above thee; so it may be read. How high soever the princes and potentates of the earth are, there is a higher than they, (Ecc. v. 8.) a God above them, that can control them, and, if they be tyrannical and oppressive, a God against them; and they will be free to reckon with them. Observe here,

1. The pride and security of Pharaoh. He lies in the midst of his rivers, rolls himself with a great deal of satisfaction in his wealth and pleasures; and he says, My river is my own: he boasts that he is an absolute prince, his subjects are his vassals, Joseph bought them long ago, Gen. xlvii. 25. That he is a sole prince, and has neither partner in government, nor competition for it; that he is out of debt, what he has is his own, and none of his neighbours have any demands upon him; that he is independent, neither tributary nor accountable to any. Note, Worldly, carnal minds please themselves with, and pride themselves in, their property; forgetting that whatever we have, we have only the use of it, the property is in God; we ourselves are not our own, but his; our tongues are not our own, Ps. xii. 4. Our river is not our own, for its springs are in God. Moses could never find what he had, is his own, for though it be so against all the world, it is not so against God. But Pharaoh's reason for his pretensions is yet more absurd; My river is my own, for I have made it for myself. Here he usurps two of the divine prerogatives, to be the author, and the end, of his own being and felicity. He only that is the great Creator, can say of this world, and of every thing in it, this is my own, for myself. He calls his river his own, because he looks not unto the Maker thereof, nor has regard unto him that fashioned it long ago, Isa. xxii. 11. What we have, we have received from God, and must use for God, so that we cannot say, We made it, much less, We made it for ourselves; and why then do we boast? Note, Self is the great idol that all the world worships, in contempt of God and his sovereignty. 2. The course God will take with this proud man, to humble him. He is a great dragon in the waters, and God will accordingly deal with him, v. 4. 5. (1.) He will draw him out of his rivers, for he has a hook and a cord for this levithan, with which he can manage him, though none on earth can; (Job xli. 1.) I will bring thee up out of the midst of the waters; we cast them out of thy kingdom, out of all those things in which thou takest such a complacency, and placest such a confidence. Herodotus relates of this Pharaoh, who was now king of Egypt, that he had reigned in great prosperity for twenty-five years, and was so elevated with his successes, that he said, God himself cannot cast me out of his kingdom; but he shall soon be convinced of his mistake, and what he depended on shall be no defence. God can force men out of that in which they are most secure and easy. (2.) All his fish shall be drawn out with him, his servants, his soldiers, and all that had a dependence on him, as he thought, but really such as he had dependence upon; these shall stick to his scales, adhere to their king, resolving to live and die with him. But, (3.) The king and his army, the dragon and all the fish that stick to his scales, shall perish together, as fish cast upon dry ground, and shall be meat to the beasts and fowls, v. 5. Now this is supposed to have its accomplishment soon after, when this Pharaoh, in defence of Aricus king of Libya, who had been expelled his kingdom by the Cyrenians, levied a great army, and went out against the Cyrenians, to recover his kingdom. The Pharaoh was defeated in battle, and all his forces put to flight, which gave such disgust to his kingdom, that they rose in rebellion against him. Thus was he left thrown into the wilderness, he and all the fish of the river with him. Thus issue men's pride and presumption and carnal security. Thus men justly lose what they call their own under God, when they call it their own against God. The libation of the cannibals God has with the Egyptians; it is because they have cheated his people, they encouraged them to expect relief and assistance from them when they were in distress, but failed them; (v. 6.) because they have been a staff of reed to the house of Israel. They pretended to be a staff for them to lean upon, but when any serious emergency supervened, they were found black and could not, or treacherous and would not, do that for them that was expected. They broke under them, to their great disappointment and amazement, so that they rent their shoulder, and made all their limbs to be at a stand. The king of Egypt, it is probable, had encouraged Zedekiah to break his league with the king of Babylon, with a promise that he would stand by him, which when he failed to do to any purpose, it could not but put them to a great consternation. God had told them, long since, that the Egyptians were broken reeds; (Isa. xxx. 6, 7.) Rabshakeh had told them so; (Isa. xxxvi. 6.) and now they found it so. It was indeed the folly of Israel to trust them, and they were well enough served when they were deceived in them. God was righteous in suffering them to be so. But that is no excuse at all for the Egyptians' falsehood and treachery, nor shall it secure them from the judgments of that God who is, and will be, the Avenger of all such wrongs. It is a great sin, and very provoking to God, as well as unjust, ungrateful, and very dishonourable and unkind, to put a cheat upon those that put a confidence in us.

3. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will bring a sword upon thee, and cut off man and beast out of thee. 9. And the land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste; and they shall know that I am the Lord: because he hath said, The river is mine, and I have made it. 10. Behold, therefore, I am against thee, and against thy rivers, and I will make the land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the tower of Syene even unto the border of Ethiopia. 11. No foot of man shall pass through it, nor foot of beast shall pass through it, neither shall it be inhabited forty years. 12. And I will make the land of Egypt desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities among the cities that are laid waste shall be desolate forty years: and I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries. 13. Yet thus saith the Lord God, At the end of forty years will I gather the Egyptians from the people whither they were scattered: 14. And I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, and I will cause them to return into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation; and they shall be there a base kingdom. 15. It shall be the basest of the kingdoms; neither shall it exalt itself any more above the nations: for I will diminish them, that they shall no more rule over the nations. 16. And it shall be no more the confidence of the house of Israel, which bringeth their iniquity to remembrance, when they shall look after them: but they shall know that I am the Lord God.

This explains the foregoing prediction, which was figurative, and looks something further. Here is a prophecy,

1. Of the ruin of Egypt. The threatening of this is very full and particular; and the sin for which this ruin shall be brought upon them, is, their pride, v. 9. They said, The river is mine, and I have made it; therefore their land shall spue them out. (1.) God is against them, both against the king and against the people, against thee and against thy rivers; waters signify people and multitudes, Rev. xvii. 15. (2.) Multitudes of them shall be cut off by the sword of war, a sword which God will bring upon them, to destroy both man and beast, the sword of a civil war. (3.) The country shall be depopulated. The land of Egypt shall be desolate and waste; and the enemies of the Lord, the cities not inhabited; the wealth of both was their pride, and that God will take away. It shall be utterly waste; wastes of waste, (so the margin reads it,) and desolate; (v. 10.) neither men nor beasts shall pass through it, nor shall it be inhabited, (v. 11.) it shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are so, v. 12. This was the effect not so much of what is spoken of before, which were made by them, but of the war which the king of Babylon made upon them. It shall be desolate from one end of the land to the other, from the tower of Syene even unto the border of Ethiopia. The sin of pride is enough to ruin a whole nation. (4.) The people shall be dispersed and scattered among the nations, (v. 12.) so that they who thought the balance of power was in their hand, should now become a contemptible people. Such a fall does a haughty spirit go before.

2. Of the restoration of Egypt after awhile, v. 13. Egypt shall be desolate forty years, (v. 12.) and then I will bring again the captivity of Egypt, v. 14. Some date the forty years from Nebuchadnezzar's destroying Egypt, others from the desolation of Egypt some time before; however, they end not but that it shall be a period of a hundred and seventy years' captivity of Judah ended, or soon after. Then this prediction was accomplished, (1.) That God will gather the Egyptians out of all the countries into which they were dispersed, and make them to return to the land of their habitation, and give them a settlement there again, v. 14. Note, Though God will find out a way to humble the proud, yet he will not crown for ever, nor use them in this world. (2.) That yet they shall not make a figure again as they have done. Egypt shall be a kingdom again, but it shall be the basest of the kingdoms, (v. 13.) it shall have but little wealth and power, and shall not extend its conquests as formerly; shall be the tail of the nations, and not the head. It is a mercy that it shall become a kingdom again, but, to humble it, it shall be a despicable kingdom; it shall not be a great kingdom, but shall be but a base kingdom. It shall be so low and despised as never it was, and made to bear a contemptible and servile yoke before. It shall bear a yoke and a staff, a reproach and a shame. It shall lose its ancient name, Egypt, and be called a people of sorts.

[1.] That it may not domineer over its neighbours, that it may not exact itself above the nations, nor rule over the nations, as it has done, but that it may know what it is to be low and despised. Note, Those who abuse their power will justly be stripped of it; and God, as King of nations, will find out a way to maintain the injured rights and liberties, not only of his own, but of other nations.

[2.] That it may not deceive the people of God; (v. 16.) It shall no more be the confidence of the house of Israel; they shall no more be in temptation to trust in it as they have done, which is a sin that brings its iniquity to remembrance, that is, provokes God to punish them still further for all their other sins. Or, it puts them in mind of their idolatries, to return to them, when they look to the idolaters, to repose a confidence in them. Note, The creatures we confide in are often therefore ruined, because there is no other way effectually to cure us of our confidence in them. Rather than Israel shall be ensured again, the whole land of Egypt shall be laid waste, He that use provokes Egypt for their ransum, (Isa. xlix. 3.) will now give Egypt for their cure; and it shall be destroyed rather than Israel shall not in this particular be reformed. God, not only in justice, but in wisdom and goodness to us, breaks those creature-stays which we lean too much upon; and makes them to be no more, that they may be no more our confidence.
17. And it came to pass in the seven and twentieth year, in the first month, in the first say of the month, the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 18. Son of man, Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon caused his army to serve a great service against Tyre: every head was made bald, and every shoulder was peeled: yet had he no wages, nor his army, for Tyre, for the service that he had served against it: 19. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I will give the land of Egypt unto Nebu-chadrezzar king of Babylon; and he shall take her multitude, and take her spoil, and take her prey; and it shall be the wages for his army. 20. I have given him the land of Egypt for his labour wherewith he served against it, because they wrought for me, saith the Lord God. 21. In that day will I cause the horn of the house of Israel to bud forth, and I will give thee the opening of the mouth in the midst of them; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

The date of this prophecy is observable; it was in the twenty-seventh year of Ezekiel's captivity, sixteen years after the prophecy in the former part of the chapter, and almost as long after those which follow in the next chapters; but it comes in here for the explication of all that was said against Egypt. After the destruction of Jerusalem, Nebuchadnezzar put into execution the covenants in the compacts of the Ammonites and Moabites, and making himself master of their countries. Then he spent thirteen years in the siege of Tyre; during all that time the Egyptians were embroiled in war with the Cyrenians and one with another, by which they were very much weakened and impoverished: and just at the end of the siege of Tyre, God delivers this prophecy to Jeremiah, which in the most solemn manner he was to use. 22. That utter destruction of Egypt, which he had foretold fifteen or sixteen years before, which had been but in part accomplished hitherto, should now be completely by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophecy which begins here, it should seem, is continued to the twentieth verse of the next chapter. And Dr. Lightfoot observes, that it is the last prophecy we have of this prophet, and should have been last in the book, but is hid here, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together. The particular destruction of Pharaoh-Hophra, foretold in the former part of this chapter, was likewise foretold, Jer. xlv. 30. This general devastation of Egypt by Nebuchadnezzar was foretold, Jer. xlviii. 10, 11, 12.

1. What success God would give to Nebuchadnezzar and his forces against Egypt. God gave him that land, that he might take the spoil and prey of it, v. 19, 20. It was a cheap and easy prey, he subdued it with very little difficulty. The blood and treasure expended upon the conquest of it were inconsiderable; but it was a rich prey, and he carried off a great deal from it that was well known to Nabuchodonosor. They having been divided among themselves, no doubt, gave a common enemy great advantage against them, who, when they had been so long preying upon one another, soon made a prey of them all.

Et quid discordia cives perduxit miseror—What swertchenedness does civil discord bring? Jeremiah for told that Nebuchadnezzar should array himself with the land of Egypt, as a shepherd puts on his coat, which intimates what a rich and cheap prey it should be.

2. Upon what considerations God would give Nebuchadnezzar this success against Egypt; it was to be a reward to him for the hard service which he had caused his army to serve against Tyre, v. 18, 20. (1.) The taking of Tyre was a tedious piece of work, it cost Nebuchadnezzar abundance of blood and treasure; it held out thirteen years, all that time the Chaldean army was hard at it, to make themselves masters of it. A large current of the sea, between Tyre and the continent, was to be crossed with earth, and many other difficulties which were thought insuperable they had to struggle with; but so great a prince, having begun such an undertaking, thought himself bound in honour to push it on, whatever it cost him. How many thousand lives have been sacrificed to such points of honour as this was! In prosecuting this siege, every head was made bald, and every shoulder feeleth, with carrying burthens, and labouring in the water, when they had a strong tide and a strong town to contend with. Egypt, a large kingdom, being divided within itself, is easily conquered; Tyre, a single city, being unanimous, is with difficulty subdued. These that have much to do in the world, find some affairs go on a great deal more readily and easily than others. But, (2.) In this service God showed that they wrought for him, v. 20. He set them at work, for the benefit of another city and its king; though they meant not so, neither did their heart think so, who were employed in it. Note, Even great men and bad men are tools that God makes use of, and are working for him, even when they are pursuing their own covetous and ambitious designs; so wonderfully does God overrule all to his own glory. Yet, (3.) For this service he had no wages or reward. Therefore he was a great expense to take Tyre; and when he had it, though it was a very rich city, and he promised himself good plunder for his army from it, he was disappointed; the Tyrians sent away by ships their best effects, and threw the rest into the sea, so that they had nothing but bare walls. Thus are the children of this world ordinarily frustrated in their highest expectations, though they be carried through a vast utter destruction of Egypt, which he had foretold fifteen or sixteen years before, which had been but in part accomplished hitherto, should now be completely by Nebuchadnezzar. The prophecy which begins here, it should seem, is continued to the twentieth verse of the next chapter. And Dr. Lightfoot observes, that it is the last prophecy we have of this prophet, and should have been last in the book, but is hid here, that all the prophecies against Egypt might come together. anci shall begin to dawn, and they shall have some little reviving in their bondage; in the honour that shall be done, (1.) To their princes; they are the horns of the house of Israel, the seat of their glory and power, these began to bud forth when Daniel and his fellows were highly preferred in Babylon; Daniel sat in the gate of the city; Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, were set over the affairs of the province, (Dan. ii. 49.) these were all of the king's seed, and of the princes, Dan. i. 3. And it was within a year after the conquests of Egypt that they were thus preferred; and, soon after, three of them were made famous by the honour God put upon them in bringing them alive out of the burning fiery furnace. This might very well be called the bawling forth of the horns of the house of Israel. And, some years after, this promise had a further accomplishment in the enlargement and elevation of Jehoiachin king of Judah, Jer. lxi. 31, 32. They were both tokens of God's favour to Israel, and happy omens. (2.) To their prophets; and I will give thee the opening of the mouth. Though none of Ezekiel's prophesies, after this, are recorded, yet we have reason to think he went on prophe-sying, and with more liberty and boldness, when Daniel and his fellows were in power, and would be ready to protect him not only from the Babylonians, but from the wicked ones of his own people. Note, It bodes well to a people when God enlarges the liberties of his ministers, and they are countenanced and encouraged in their work.

a this chapter, we have, 1. A continuation of the prophecy against Egypt, which we had in the latter part of the foregoing chapter, just before the desolation of that once flourishing kingdom was completed by Nebuchadrezzar. In which is foretold the destruction of all her allies and confederates, all those to which she had been a terror, and the several steps which the king of Babylon should take in pushing on this destruction, v. 1-19. 2. A repetition of a former prophecy against Egypt, just before the desolation of it begun by the Babylonians, which gradually weakened them, and prepared the way for the king of Babylon, v. 20-26. It is all much to the same purport with what we had before.

1. THe word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Howl ye, Woe worth the day! 3. For the day is near, even the day of the Lord is near, a cloudy day; it shall be the time of the heathen. 4. And the sword shall come upon Egypt, and great pain shall be in Ethiopia, when the slain shall fall in Egypt, and they shall take away her multitude, and her foundations shall be broken down. 5. Ethiopia, and Libya, and Lydia, and all the mingled people, and Chub, and the men of the land that is in league, shall fall with them by the sword. 6. Thus saith the Lord, They also that uphold Egypt shall fall; and the pride of her power shall come down: from the tower of Syene shall they fall in it by the sword, saith the Lord God. 7. And they shall be desolate in the midst of the countries that are desolate, and her cities shall be in the midst of the cities that are wasted. 8. And they shall know that I am the Lord, when I have set a fire in Egypt, and when all her helpers shall be de-stroyed. 9. In that day shall messengers go forth from me in ships, to make the careless Ethiopians afraid, and great pain shall come upon them, as in the day of Egypt for, lo, it cometh. 10. Thus saith the Lord God, I will also make the multitude of Egypt to cease by the hand of Nebuchadrezzar king of Babylon. 11. He and his people with him, the terrible of the nations shall be brought to destroy the land: and they shall draw their swords against Egypt and fill the land with the slain. 12. And I will make the rivers dry, and sell the land into the hand of the wicked; and I will make the land waste, and all that is therein, by the hand of strangers: I the Lord have spoken it. 13. Thus saith the Lord God, I will also destroy the idols, and I will cause their images to cease out of Noph and there shall be no more a prince of the land of Egypt: and I will put a fear in the land of Egypt. 14. And I will make Pthros desolate, and will set fire in Zoon, and will execute judgments in No. 15. And I will pour my fury upon Sin, the strength of Egypt; and I will cut off the multitude of No. 16. And I will set fire in Egypt: Sin shall have great pain, and No shall be rent asunder, and Noph shall have distresses daily. 17. The young men of Aven and Pibeseth shall fall by the sword: and these cities shall go into captivity. 18. At Taphanethes also the day shall be darkened, when I shall break there the yokes of Egypt: and the pomp of her strength shall cease in her: as for her, a cloud shall cover her, and her daughters shall go into captivity. 19. Thus will I execute judgments in Egypt, and they shall know that I am the Lord.

The prophecy of the destruction of Egypt is here very full and particular, as well as, in the general, very frightful. What can protect a pravocking people, when the righteous God comes forth to contend with them? 1. It shall be a very lamentable destruction, and such as shall occasion great sorrow; (v. 2, 3.) "Howl ye, ye may justly shriek now that it is coming, for ye shall be made to shriek and make hideous howls, when it comes. Cry out, Woe worth the day! or, Ah the day, alas because of the day, the terrible day! Woe and alas! For the day is near; the day we have so long dreaded, so long desired. It is the day of the Lord, the day in the which he will manifest himself as a God of vengeance; you have your day now, when you can all bear you, and all your days shall hear you, and God will take his day now shortly; the day of the revelation of his righteous judgment," Ps. xxxvii. 13. It will be a cloudy day, that is, dark and dismal, without the shining forth of any comfort; and it shall threaten a storm; fire, and brimstone, and a horrible tempest. It shall be the time of the heathen, of reckoning with the heathen, for all their heathenish practices; that time which David spake of when God would Now-out his fury upon the heathen, (Ps. lxix. 6.) when they shall sink; Ps. lx. 15.

2. It shall be the destruction of Egypt, and of all the states and countries in confederacy with her, and in her neighbourhood. (1.) Egypt herself shall fall; (v. 4.) The sword shall come upon Egypt, the sword of the Chaldeans, and it shall be a victorious sword, for the slain shall fall in Egypt, fall by it, fall before it. Is the country populous? They shall take away her multitude. Is it strong, and well fixed? Her foundations shall be broken down, and they shall break them down, but also she shall be broken, she shall be utterly laid waste, high shall fall of course. (2.) Her neighbours and inmates shall fall with her; when the slain fall so thick in Egypt, great shall be in Ethiopia, both that in Africa, which is in the neighbourhood of Egypt on one side, and that in Asia, which is near to it on the other side; when their neighbour's house was on fire, they could not but apprehend their own in danger; nor were their fears groundless, for they shall all fall with them by the sword; (v. 5.) Ethiopia, and Libya, (Cush and Phut, so the Hebrew names are, two of the sons of Ham, who are mentioned,) and Misraim, that is, Egypt, between them, Gen. x. 6. The Lydians, who were famous archers, are spoken of as confederates with Egypt, Jer. xlvii. 7. These shall fall with Egypt and Chaldb; that shall fall with them, and among the inhabitants of the inner Fayoum, these and those were the mingled people; there were those of all these and other countries, who upon some account or other resided in Egypt; as did also the men of the land that is in league, some of the remains of the people of Israel and Judah, the children of the covenant, or league, as they are called, (Acts iii. 28.) the children of the covenant, God, iv. 28. These sojourned in Egypt, contrary to God's command, and these shall fall with them. Note, They that will take their lot with God's enemies, shall have their lot with them; yea, though they be in profession the men of the land that is in league with God.

3. All that pretend to support the sinking interests of Egypt, shall come down under her, shall come down with her; (v. 6.) They that uphold Egypt shall fall, and then Egypt must fall of course. See the justice of God; Egypt pretended to uphold Jerusalem when that was tottering, but proved a deceitful reed; and now they that pretended to uphold Egypt, shall prove no better. Those that deceive others are commonly paid in their own coin, they are themselves deceived. (1.) Does Egypt think here disciples and converts to her cause; and do they not remember her judgment, and do they not remember her king? The pride of her flower shall come down, v. 6. The power of the king of Egypt was his pride; but that shall be broken, and humbled. (2.) Is the multitude of her people her support? These shall fall by the sword, even from the tower of Syene, which is in the utmost corner of the land, from that side of it by which the enemy shall come, and the conquerors shall come in; and the desert bandmen said the merchants, shall be desolate, (v. 7.) as before, ch. xxix. 12. Even the multitude of Egypt shall be made to cease, v. 10. That populous country shall be depopulated. The land shall be even filled with the slain, v. 11. (3.) Is the river Nile her support, and the several channels of it a defence to her? I will make the rivers dry, (v. 13.) her own streams shall be dried up, and her fruits shall be desolate. (4.) Are her idol's a support to her? Those shall be destroyed, those imaginary upholders shall appear more than ever to be imaginary, for so images are when they pretend to be deliverers and strong holds; (v. 13.) I will cause their images to cease out of Niph. (5.) Is her royal family her support? There shall be no more a prince in the land of Egypt; the royal family shall be extinguished, and all that continued so long. (6.) Is her courage her support, and does she think to uphold herself by the bravery of her men in war, and to be now prepared to spare, She shall fall; I will put a fear in the heart of Egypt. (7.) Is the rising generation her support, is she upheld by her children, and does she think herself happy because she has her quiver full of them? Alas, the young men shall fall by the sword, (v. 17.) and the daughters shall go into captivity, (v. 18.) and so she shall be robbed of all her hopes. 4. God will destroy all the opening judgments on Egypt; (v. 8.) They shall know that I am the Lord, and greater than all gods, than all their gods, when I have set a fire in Egypt. The fire that consumes nations is of God's kindling; and when he sets fire to a people, all their helpers shall be destroyed; those that go about to quench the fire shall themselves be devoured by it; for who can stand before the Lord when he is angry? When he pours out his fury upon a place, when he sets fire to it, (v. 15. 16.) neither its strength nor its multitude can stand it in any stead.

5. The king of Babylon and his army shall be employed as instruments of this destruction; The multitude of Egypt shall be made to cease, and be quite cut off by the hand of the king of Babylon, v. 1. The king of Babylon, and the king of Egypt, and the king of Ethiopia, and the king of Babylon, shall not be able to join themselves together. It is said of the Chaldeans, who should destroy Egypt, (1.) That they are strangers, (v. 12.) who therefore shall show no compassion for old acquaintance sake, but shall carry it strangely toward them. (2.) That they are the terrible of the nations, (v. 11.) both in respect of force, and in respect of ferocity; and, in respect of horror, they shall be made terrible work. (3.) That they are the wicked; who will not be restrained by reason and conscience, the laws of nature, or the laws of nations, for they are without law; I will sell the land into the hand of the wicked. They do violence unjustly, as they are wicked; yet, so far as they are instruments in God's hand of executing his judgments, it is on his part justly done. Note, God often makes one wicked man a scourge to another; and even wicked men acquire a title to prey, jure belii.—by the laws of war, for God sells it into their hands.

6. No place in the land of Egypt shall be exempted from the fury of the Chaldean army, not the strongest, not the remotest; The sword shall go through the land. Divers places are here named: Amurath, v. 12. Sinjor, (v. 11.) Sinjor, and Elaven, (v. 13, 15, 16.) Aven and Phubeseth, (v. 17.) Tehaan, v. 18. These shall be made desolate, shall be fired, and God's judgments shall be executed upon them, and his fury poured out upon them. Their strength and multitude shall be cut off; they shall have great pain, shall be rent asunder with fear, and shall have distresses daily; their day shall be spent, their pleasures, comforts, and hopes shall be extinguished; and, in their turn, they shall no more oppress and tyrannize as they have done; the pomp of their strength shall cease, and a cloud shall cover them; a cloud so thick that through it they shall not see any hopes, nor shall their glory be seen, or shine further. And, lastly, the Ethiopians, who are at a distance from them, and are the more determined enemies of them, shall share in their pain and terror; God will so kindle his vengeance spread the rumour, and the careless Ethiopians shall be made afraid, v. 9. Note, God can strike a terror upon those that are most secure; fearfulness shall, when he pleases, surprise the most presumptuous hypocrites.

The close of this prediction leaves, (1.) The land of Egypt mortified. Thus will I execute judgments on Egypt, v. 19. The destruction of Egypt is the executing of judgments, which intimates not only that it is done justly, for its sins, but that it is done regular, and inasmuch as it is done by God, and by the executions God does, are according to his judgments. (2.) The God of Israel herein glorified; They shall know that I am the Lord. The Egyptians shall be made to know it, and the people of God shall be made to know it better. The Lord is known by the judgments which he executeth.

20. And it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the first month, in the seventh day of the month, that the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 21. Son of man, I have broken the arm of Pharaoh king of Egypt; and lo, it shall not be bound up to be healed, to put a roller to bind it, to make it strong to hold the sword. 22. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against Pharaoh king of Egypt, and will break his arms, the strong, and that which was broken; and I will cause the sword to fall out of his hand. 23. And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and will disperse them through the countries. 24. And I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon, and put my sword in his hand: but I will break Pharaoh's arms, and he shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly-wound man. 25. But I will strengthen the arms of the king of Babylon, and the arms of Pharaoh shall fall down; and they shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall put my sword into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall stretch it out upon the land of Egypt. 26. And I will scatter the Egyptians among the nations, and disperse them among the countries; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

This short prophecy of the weakening of the power of Egypt was delivered about the time that the army of the Egyptians, which attempted to raise the siege of Jerusalem, was frustrated in its enterprises, and returned re infecta—without accomplishing their purpose; whereupon the king of Babylon renewed the siege, and carried his point. The kingdom of Egypt was very ancient, and had been many ages considerable. That of Babylon was but lately arrived at its great pomp and power, being built upon the ruins of the kingdom of Assyria. Now it is with them as it is with fair weather and fine crops, growing up, others are declining and going back; one must increase, and the other must of course decrease.

1. It is here told that the kingdom of Egypt shall grow weaker and weaker. The extent of its territories shall be abridged, his wealth and power shall be diminished, and he shall become less able than ever to submit to either himself or his friend. (4.) This was in part done already; (v. 21.) I have broken the arm of Pharaoh some time ago. One arm of that kingdom might well be reckoned broken, when the king of Babylon routed the forces of Pharaoh-Necho at Carchemish, (Jer. xlv. 2.) And made himself master of all that pertained to Egypt from the river of Egypt to Euphrates, 2 Kings xxiv. 7. Egypt had been long in gathering strength, and extending its dominions, and therefore that there may be a proportion observed in providence, it loses its strength slowly and by degrees. It was soon after the king of Assyria was taken; in the year of his death, he was conquered by the king of Babylon, and his empire was divided among his conquerors, (2 Kings xxiv. 7.) and the same was more and more wearied out, until the arm of his power was broken, and the king of Egypt fell with the rest. The king of Babylon was by this time the most formidable enemy that Egypt had to contend with. They were much at variance with each other, and the former had often to suffer in Egypt's wars with the Assyrians. 2. It is here told that the kingdom of Babylon shall grow stronger and stronger, v. 24, 25. It is said and repeated, that God will, (1.) Put strength into the king of Babylon's arms, that he may be able to go through the service he is designed for. (2.) That he will put a sword, his sword, into the king of Babylon's hand, which signified his giving him a commission, and furnishing him with arms for carrying on a war, particularly against Egypt. (3.) To judge. As judges on the bench, like Plate, (John xix. 11.) so generals in the field, like Nebuchadnezzar, have no power but what is given them from above.

CHAP. XXXI.

The prophecy of this chapter, as the two chapters before, is against Egypt, and designed for the humbling and mortifying it. In the former, as in the latter, the crimes, and to see what has been done to others in the like case, which serves both to direct and to justify the proceedings: Pharaoh stands in the bar of divine justice for his pride and haughtiness, and the injuries he had done to God's people; but he thinks himself so high, so great, as not to be accountable to any authority; so strong, and so well guarded, as not to be overthrown, but he is declared by the prophet is therefore directed to make a report to him of the case of the king of Assyria, whose head city was Nineveh. 1. He must show him how great a monarch the king of Assyria was, and how he had been treated with what a mighty sway he bore; the king of Egypt, great as he was, could not go beyond him, v. 3. 9. II. He must then show him how he was to the king of Assyria, and to Nebuchadnezzar, as a man to a child, as the prophet next read him the history of the fall and ruin of the kingdom of Assyria, what a noise it made among the nations, and what a warning it gave to all potent princes to take heed of pride, v. 11. 17. IV. He must leave the king of Egypt to apply all this to himself, to see his own face in the looking-glass of the king of Assyria's sin, and to foresee his own fall through the perspective-glass of his ruin, v. 18.

1. AND it came to pass in the eleventh year, in the third month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, speak unto Pharaoh king of Egypt, and to his multitude: Whom art thou like in thy greatness? 3. Behold, the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with fair branches, and with a shadowing shroud, and of a high stature; and his top was among the thick boughs. 4. The waters made him great, the deep set him up on high with her rivers running round about his plants, and sent out her little rivers unto all the trees of the field. 5. Therefore his height was exalted above all the trees of the field, and his boughs were multiplied, and his branches became long, because of the multitude of waters, when he shot forth. 6. All the fowls of heaven made their nests in his boughs, and under his branches did all the beasts of the field bring forth their young, and under his shadow dwelt all great nations.

7. Thus was he fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches: for his root was by great waters. 8. The cedars in the garden of God could not hide him: the fir-trees were not like his boughs, and the cedrus-trees were not like his branches; nor any tree in the garden of God was like unto him in his beauty. 9. I have made him fair by the multitude of his branches: so that all the trees of Eden, that were in the garden of God, envied him.

This prophecy bears date the month before Jerusalem was taken, as that in the close of the foregoing chapter about four months before: when God's people were in the depth of their distress, it would be some comfort to them, as it would serve likewise for a check to the pride and malice of their neighbours, that insisted over them, to be told from heaven that the cup was going round, even the cup of trembling, that it would shortly be taken out of the hands of God's people, and put into the hands of those that hated them, Isa. li. 22, 23. In this prophecy, 1. The prophet is directed to put Pharaoh upon searching the records for a case parallel to his own; (v. 2.) See Note, a. The multitude of his attendants, that contributed so much to his magnificence, and the multitude of his armies, that contributed so much to his strength; these he was proud of, these he put a confidence in, and they were as proud of him, and trusted as much in him. Now ask him, Whom art thou like in thy greatness? We are apt to judge of ourselves by comparison. Those that think highly of themselves, fancy themselves as great and as good as such and such, that have been mightily celebrated. The flatterers of princes tell them whom they equal in pomp and grandeur; "Well," says God, "let him pitch upon the most famous potentate that ever was, and it shall be allowed that he is like him in greatness, and no way inferior to him; but let him pitch upon whom he will, he will find that his day came to fall; he will see there was an end of all his perfection, and must therefore expect the end of his own in like manner." Note, The falls of others, both into sin and ruin, are minded to the Mediation of Christ, and are intended to be secrets, or high-minded, or to think we stand out of danger.

11. He is directed to show him an instance of one whom he resembled in greatness; and that was the Assyrian, (v. 3.) whose monarchy had continued from Nimrod. Senacherib was one of the mighty princes of that monarchy; but it sunk down soon after him, and the monarchy of Nebuchadnezzar was built upon its ashes to the top of its stock. Let us now see what a flourishing prince the king of Assyria was. He is here compared to a stately cedar, v. 3. The glory of the house of David is illustrated by the same similitude, ch. xvii. 3. The olive-tree, the fig-tree, and the vine, which were all fruit-trees, had refused to be promoted over the trees, because they would not leave their fruitfulness; (Jug. ix. 8, &c.) and therefore the choice falls upon the cedar, that is stately and strong, and casts a great shadow, but bears no fruit.

1. The Assyrian monarch was a tall cedar, such as the cedars in Lebanon generally were, of a high stature, and his top among the thick boughs; he was attended by other princes that were tributaries to him, and was surrounded by a life-guard of brave men. He spread all around his neighborhood, they were all shrubs to him; (v. 3.) His height was exalted above all the trees of the field, they were many of them very high, but he overtopped them all, v. 8. The cedars, even these in the garden of Eden, where, we may suppose, they were the best of the kind, would not hide him, but his top branches outshone theirs.

He was a spreading cedar: his branches did not only run up in height, but ran out in breadth; denoting that this mighty prince was not only exalted to great dignity and honour, and had a name above the names of the great men of the earth, but that he obtained great dominion and power; his territories were large, and he extended his conquests far, and his influences much further. This cedar, like a vine, sent forth his branches to the sea, to the rivers, Ps. lxxx. 11. His boughs were made his branches became long; (v. 5.) so that he had a shadowing shroud, v. 3. This contributed very much to his beauty, that he grew proportionably large as well as high. He was fair in his greatness, in the length of his branches, (v. 7.) very comely as well as very stately, fair by the multitude of his branches, v. 9. His large dominions were well managed, like a spreading tree that is kept in shape and good order by the skill of the gardener, so as to be very beautiful to the eye. His government was as amiable in the eyes of wise men, as it was admirable in the eyes of all men. The fir-trees were not like his boughs, so straight, so green, so regular; nor were the branches of the cedrus-trees like his branches, so thick, so spreading. In short, no tree was to be compared to the god of the Assyrians, which stood where paradise was planted; there where there was every tree that was pleasant to the sight, (Gen. ii. 9.) there was none like to this cedar in beauty; in all the nations about there was no prince so much admired, so much courted, and which every body was so much in love with, as the king of Assyria. Many of them did virtuously, but he excelled all; they were all admired, all exalted, all the trees of them that envied him, v. 9. When they found they could not compare with him, they were angry and grieved that he so far outdid them, and secretly grudged him the praise due to him. Note, It is the unhappiness of those who in any thing excel others, that thereby they make themselves the objects of envy; and who can stand before envy?
3. He was serviceable, as far as a standing, growing cedar could be, and that was only by his shadow; (v. 6.) All the fowls of heaven, some of all sorts, made their nests in his boughs; where they were sheltered from the injuries of the weather. The branches of the field put themselves under the protection of his branches, there they were levant—rising up, and cooent—lying down, there they brought forth their young; for they had there a natural covert from the heat and from the storm. The meaning of all is, Under his shadow dwelt all great nations; they all fled to him for safety, and were willing to swear allegiance to him. He would undoubtedly protect them; as travelers in a shower come under thick trees for shelter. Note, Those who have power, ought to use it for the protection and comfort of those whom they have power over; for to that end they are intrusted with power. Even the bramble, if he be anointed king, invites the trees to come, and trust in his shadow, Judg. ix. 15. But the utmost security that any creature, even the king of Assyria himself, can give, is but the shadow of a tree, which is but a scanty and slender protection, and leaves a man many ways exposed. Let us therefore flee to God for protection, and he will take us under the shadow of his wings, where we shall be warmer and safer than under the shadow of the strongest and statelyest cedars, Ps. xvii. 8.—xcli. 4.

4. He seemed to be settled and established in great power; (v. 1.) Jer. xxii. 10. For God that made him fair, v. 9. For by him kings reign: he was comely with the comeliness that God put upon him. Note, God's hand must be eyed and owned in the advancement of the great men of the earth; and therefore we must not envy them; yet that will not secure the continuance of their prosperity; for he that gave them their beauty, if they be deprived of it, knows how to turn them into deformity. He seemed to have a good bottom; this cedar was not like the hale in the desert, made to inhabit the parched places. (Jer. xvi. 6.) It was not a root in a dry ground, Isa. lii. 2. No, he had abundance of wealth to support his power and grandeur; (v. 4.) The waters made him great; he had vast treasures, large stores and magazines, which were as the deep that set him up on high, constant revenues coming in by taxes, customs, and tolls, which were as rivers running and going about his plants; these enabled him to strengthen and secure his interests every where, for he went out his little rivers, or conduits, to all the trees of the field, to water them, and when they had maintenance from the king's palace, (Ezra iv. 14.) and their country was nourished by the king's country, (Acts xxi. 20.) they would be serviceable and faithful to him. Those that have wealth flowing upon them in great rivers, find themselves obliged to send it out again in little rivers; for, as goods are increased, they are increased that eat therein, and the more men have, the more occasion they have for it; yea, and still the more they have occasion for. The branches of this cedar became long because of the multitude of waters, which fed them. (v. 5. and v. 7.) His root was by great waters, which seems to secure that it should not wither, (Ps. i. 3.) that it should not see when heat comes. Jer. xvii. 8. Note, Worldly people may seem to have an established prosperity, yet it only seems so, Job v. 3. Ps. xxxvii. 35.

10. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Because thou hast lifted up thyself in height, and he hath shot up his top among the thick boughs, and his heart is lifted up in his height; I have, therefore, delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen; he shall surely deal with him: I have driven him out for his wickedness. 12. And strangers, the terrible of the nations, have cut him off, and have left him upon the mountains and in the valleys his branches are fallen, and his boughs are broken by all the rivers of the land; and all the people of the earth are gone down from his shadow, and have left him. 13. Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, and all the beasts of the field shall be upon his branches: 14. To the end that none of all the trees by the waters exalt themselves for their height, neither shoot up their top among the thick boughs, neither their trees stand up in their height, all that drink water: for they are all delivered unto death, to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, with them that go down to the pit. 15. Thus saith the Lord God, In the day when he went down to the grave I caused a mourning; I covered the deep for him, and I restrained the floods thereof, and the great waters were stayed; and I caused Lebanon to mourn for him, and all the trees of the field fainted for him. 16. I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall, when I cast him down to hell with them that descend into the pit; and all the trees of Eden, the choice and best of Lebanon, all that drink water, shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth. 17. They also went down into hell with him, unto them that be slain with the sword; and they that were his arm, that dwelt under his shadow in the midst of the heathen. 18. To whom art thou thus like in glory and in greatness among the trees of Eden? yet shalt thou be brought down with the trees of Eden unto the nether parts of the earth: thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword. This is Pharaoh, and all his multitude, saith the Lord God.

We have seen the king of Egypt resembling the king of Syria in pomp and power and prosperity, how like he was to him in greatness; now here we see,

1. How he does likewise resemble him in his pride; (v. 10.) for as face answers to face in a glass, so does one corrupt, carnal heart to another; and the same temptations of a prosperous state by which some are overcomen, are fatal to many others too. Thou, O king of Egypt, hast lifted up thyself in height, hast been proud of thy wealth and power, ch. xxix. 3. And just so, he, the king of Assyria, when he had shot up his top among the thick boughs, his heart was immediately lifted up in his height, and he grew insolent and imperious; set God himself at defiance, and trampled upon his people; witness the messages and letter which the great king, the king of Assyria, sent to Hezekiah, Isa. xxxvii. 4. How haughtily does he speak of himself and his own achievements, how scurrility of that great and good man! There were other sins in which the Egyptians and the Assyrians did concur, particulady that of oppressing God's people; it is charged upon them both together, (Isa. li. 4.) but here that sin is run up to its cause, and that was, pride; for it is the thought and fear of the crown that produced it. Note, When men's outward condition rises, their minds commonly rise with it. And it is very rare to find an humble spirit in the midst of great advancements. II. How he shall therefore resemble him in his fall; and for the opening of this part of the comparison.

Here is a history of the fall of the king of Assyria. For his part, says God, (v. 11.) I have therefore, because he was thus lifted up, delivered him into the hand of the mighty one of the heathen. Cyrus, king of the Medes, in the 26th year of his reign, in conjunction with Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, in the 1st year of his reign, destroyed Nineveh, and with it the Assyrian empire. Nebuchadnezzar, though he was not then, yet afterwards became, very emphatically, the mighty one of the heathen; most mighty among them; and most mighty over them, to prevail against them. (1.) It is God himself that orders his ruin; I have delivered him into the hand of the executioner; I have driven him out. Note, God is the Judge, who puts down one, and sets up another. Ps. lxxxv. 7. And when he pleases, he can raise and abase princes, who, being both armed and come themselves, and seem to others, to have taken deep-root. And the mightiest ones of the heathens could not gain their point against those they contended with, if the Almighty did not himself deliver them into their hands. (2.) It is his own sin that procures his ruin; I have driven him out for his wickedness. None are driven out from their honour, power, and possessions, but it is for their wickedness. None of our comforts are ever lost, but what have been a thousand times forfeited. If the wicked are driven away, it is in their wickedness. (3.) It is a mighty one of the heathen that shall be the instrument of his ruin. For God often employs one wicked man in punishing another. He shall surely deal with him, shall know how to manage him, great as he is, Note, Proud, imperious men will, sooner or later, meet with their match. Now, in this history of the fall of the Assyrian, observe,

[1.] A continuation of the similitude of the cedar. He grew very high, and extended his boughs very far; but his day comes to fall. First, This stately cedar was cropped; the terrible of the nations cut high. When God cut his high seat, his congregation disappeared. Second, It was deserted; All the people of the earth, that had fled to him for shelter, are gone down from his shadow, and have left him. When he was disabled to afford protection, they thought they no longer owed him allegiance. Let not great men be proud of the number of those that attend them, and have a dependence upon them, it is only for what they can get; when Providence frowns upon them, their retinue is soon dispersed and scattered from them. Thirdly, It was insulted over, and its full triumphed in; (v. 13.) Upon his ruin shall all the fowls of the heaven remain, to tread upon the broken branches of this cedar. Its fall is triumphed in by the other trees, who were angry to see themselves over-stript so much; All the trees of Eden, that were cut down and fallen before him, all that drank water of the same deep well, were now forced to drink of the tree of life, the top of which, when the Assyrian, in the south, is said to bow with the dew of heaven, (Dan. iv. 23.) and to bud through the scent of water; (Job xiv. 9.) all these shall be comforted in the nether parts of the earth, when they see this proud cedar brought as low as themselves. Solamen miseris socios haniisse doloris-To have companions in wo is a solace to those who suffer. But, on the contrary, the honorable cedar, being cut down, the height and strength, mourned for him, and the trees of the field fainted for him, because they could not but read their own destiny in his fall. How, fir-trees, if the cedar be shaken, for they cannot expect to stand long, Zech. xi. 2.

[2.] An explanation of the similitude of the cedar. By the cutting down of this cedar is signified the slaughter of this mighty monarch and all his adherents and supporters; they are all delivered to death, to fall by the sword, as the cedar by the axes: he and his princes, who, he said, were altogether kings, go down to the grave, to the nether parts of the earth, in the midst of the children of men, as common persons of no quality or distinction; they die like men, (Ps. lxxxii. 7.) they were carried away with a tempest, and were driven to perdition, (Isa. xxiv. 20.) and neither protect them nor descend after them. Again, (v. 16.) He was cast down to hell with them that descended into the pit; he went into the state of the dead, and was buried as others are, in obscurity and oblivion. Again, (v. 17.) They all that were his arm, on whom he stayed, by whom he acted, and exerted his power, all that dwelt under his shadow, his subjects and allies, and all that had any dependence on him, they all went down into ruin, down into the grave with him, unto them that were slain with the sword, to those that were cut off by untimely deaths before them, under the load of guilt and shame. When great men fall, a great many fall with them, as a great many in like manner have fallen before them.

[3.] What God designed, and aimed at, in bringing down this mighty monarch and his monarchy. He designed thereby, First, To give an alarm to the nations about; to put them all to a stand, to put them all to a gaze; (v. 16.) I made the nations to shake at the sound of his fall; they were all struck with astonishment to see so mighty a prince brought down thus; it gave a shock to all their confidences, and made them understand how frail and insecure all human glory is. He was not only brought down, but he went down to the grave, (v. 15.) I caused a mourning, a general lamentation, as the whole kingdom goes into mourning at the death of the king; in token of this general grief, I covered the deep for him, put that into black, gave a stop to business, in compliance to this universal mourning; I restrained the floods, and the great waters were stayed, (Isa. xlv. 16.) they were still, and dry shall be the channel, that of lamentation. Lebanon particularly, the kingdom of Syria, that was sometimes in confederacy with the Assyrian, mourned for him; as the allies of Babylon, Rev. xviii. 9. Secondly, To give an admonition to the nations about, and to their kings; (v. 14.) To the end that none of all the trees by the waters, though ever so advantageously situated, may exalt themselves above others; they shall be stripped from their borrowed; and their own dress upon them, by their own righteousness, and shall be naked, and shall show their top among the thick boughs, looking disdainfully upon others, nor stand upon themselves for their height, confiding in their own policies and powers, as they could never be brought down. Let them all take warning by the Assyrian, for he once held up his head as high, and thought he kept his footing as firm, as any of them; but his pride went before his destruction, and his evidence failed him. And, The fall of proud, presumptuous men is intended for warning to others to keep humble. It had been well for Nebuchadnezzar, who was himself active in bringing down the Assyrian, if he had taken the admonition. 2. Here is a prophecy of the fall of the king of Egypt; for though Pharaoh thought himself like the Assyrian in glory and greatness, overtopping all the trees of Eden, as the cypress does the shrubs; but thou also shalt be brought down, with the other trees that are pleasant to the sight, as those in Eden. Thou shalt be brought to the grave, to the nether or lower parts of the earth, thou shalt lie in the midst of the uncircumcised, that die in their uncleanness, and that was a curse, and among the uncircumcised, at a distance from God; then shall those whom he has trampled upon, triumph over him, saying, "This is Pharaoh and all his multitude. See how mean he looks, how low he lies; see what all his pomp and pride are come to; here is all that is left of him." Note, Great men, and great multitudes, with the great figure and great noise they make in the world, will the and coming generation there is, will soon become little, less than nothing; such as Pharaoh and all his multitude.

Vol. iv.—4 Z

CHAP. XXXII.

Still we are upon the destruction of Pharaoh and Egypt; which is wonderfully enlarged upon, and with a great deal of emphasis. When we read so very much of Egypt's ruin it is written in the several prophecies of divers times delivered concerning it, we are ready to think, Surely there is some special reason for it. And, I. Perhaps it may look as far back as the book of Genesis, where we find (ch. xxv. 14.) that God determined to judge Egypt, for oppressing his people; and though that was in part fulfilled in the plagues of Egypt, and the drowning of Pharaoh, yet, in this destruction here foretold, those old scenes are looked upon, and they shall have it in full accomplishment. II. Perhaps it may look so far forward as the book of the Revelation, where we find that the great enemy of the gospel-church, that makes war with the Lamb, is spiritually called Egypt. Rev. xi. 8. And if so, the destruction of Egypt and its Pharaoh was a type of the destruction of that proud enemy; and betwixt this prophecy of the ruin of Egypt and the prophecy of the destruction of Anti-christ there is some analogy. We have two distinct prophecies in this chapter, relating to Egypt, both in the same month, one on the first day of the month, the other that day fortnight, probably both on the sabbath-day. They are both lamentations, not only to signify how lamentable the fall of Egypt should be, but to intimate how much the prophet himself should lament it, from a generous principle of love to mankind. The destruction of Egypt is here represented under two multitudes: 1. The killing of a lion or a whale, or some such devouring creature, v. 1. 2. The funeral of a great commander or captain-general, v. 17. 32. The two prophecies of this chapter are much of the same length.

1. AND it came to pass in the twelfth 2. year, in the twelfth month, in the first day of the month, that the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, take up a lamentation for Pharaoh king of Egypt, and say unto him, Art thou not like a young lion of the nations, and thou art as a whale in the seas; and thou canst go forth with thy rivers, and troublest the waters with thy feet, and foulest the rivers. 3. Thus saith the Lord God, I will, therefore, spread out my net over thee with a company of many people; and they shall bring thee upon my net. 4. Then will I leave thee upon the land, I will cast thee forth upon the open field, and will cause all the fowls of the heaven to remain upon thee, and I will fill the beasts of the whole earth with thee. 5. And I will lay thy flesh upon the mountains, and fill the valleys with thy height. 6. I will also water with thy blood the land wherein thou swimmest, even to the mountains; and the rivers shall be full of thee. 7. And when I shall put thee out, I will cover the heaven, and make the stars thereof dim; I will cover the sun with a cloud, and the moon shall not give her light. 8. All the bright lights of heaven will I make dark over thee, and set darkness upon thy land, saith the Lord God. 9. I will also vex the hearts of many people, when I shall bring thy destruction among the nations, into the countries which thou hast not known. 10. Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee, and their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee, when I shall brandish my sword before them; and they shall tremble at every moment, every man for his own life, in the day of thy fall. 11. For thus saith the Lord God, The sword of the king of Babylon shall come upon thee. 12. By the swords of the mighty will I cause thy multitude to fall, the terrible of the nations, all of them; and they shall spoil the pomp of Egypt, and all the multitude thereof shall be destroyed. 13. I will destroy also all the beasts thereof from beside the great waters; neither shall the foot of man trouble them any more, nor the hoofs of beasts trouble them. 14. Then will I make their waters deep, and cause their rivers to run like oil, saith the Lord God. 15. When I shall make the land of Egypt desolate, and the country shall be destitute of that thereof it was full, when I shall smite all them that dwell therein, then shall they know that I am the Lord. 16. This is the lamentation wherewith they shall lament her; the daughters of the nations shall lament her; they shall lament for her, even for Egypt, and for all her multitude, saith the Lord God.
threatening, as a lion when he roars. Great potencies, if they be tyrannical and oppressive, rise, in God's account, no better than beasts of prey. He is like a man grown up in passion like a lion, a terror in the seas, very turbulent and vacillating, as the levitation that makes the deep to boil like a pot, Job xli. 31. WhenPharaoh engaged in an unnecessary war with the Cyprians, he came forth with his rivers, with his armies, troubled the waters, disturbed his own kingdom, and the neighbouring nations, faulted the rivers, and made them madly. Now, in such a day of disaster is often the world by the restless ambition and implacable resentments of proud princes. Ahab is he that troubleth Israel, and not Eliphaz.

2. He that has troubled others, must expect to be himself troubled; for the Lord is righteous, Josh. vii. 25.

(1.) This is set forth here by a comparison. IsPharaoh like a great whale, which, when it comes up the river, gives great disturbance, a levitation which Job cannot draw out with a hook? (Job xli. 1.) Yet God has a net for him, which is large enough to enmesh him, and strong enough to secure him; (v. 3.) I will spread my net over thee, even the army of the Chaldeans, a company of many people; they shall force him out of his fastnesses, dispossess him of his possessions, throw him from a great fish upon dry ground, upon the open field, (v. 4.) where, being out of his element, he must die of course, and be a prey to the birds and beasts, as was foretold, ch. xxix. 5. What can the strongest fish do to help itself, when it is out of the water, and lies gasping? The flesh of this great whale shall be laid upon the mountains, (v. 5.) and the valleys shall be filled with his height. Such numbers of Pharaoh's soldiers shall be slain, that the dead bodies shall be scattered upon the hills, and there shall be heaps of them piled up in the valleys. Blood shall be shed in such abundance as to swell the rivers in the valleys. Or, Such shall be the bulk, such the height, of this levitation, that, when he is laid upon the ground, he shall fill a valley. Such vast quantities of blood shall issue from this levitation, as shall water the land of Egypt, the land wherein now he swains, now he sports himself, v. 6. It shall reach to the mountains, and the waters of Egypt shall again be turned into blood, by this means; The rivers shall be full of thee. The judgments executed upon Pharaoh of old are expressed by the breaking of the head of leviathan against the mountains, (Ps. lviii.) and in the following verses, for the like purpose, by breaking the head of Pharaoh; and they shall go no more, now they go farther; this old serpent not only has now his head bruised, but is all crushed to pieces.

(2.) It is set forth by a prophecy of the deep impressions which the destruction of Egypt should make upon the neighbouring nations; it would put them all into a consternation, as the fall of the Assyrian monarchy did, ch. xxxix. 13, 16. When Pharaoh of old, and his harshest enemies, the harshest torments, is put out and extinguished, it shall make all about him look black, v. 7. The heavens shall be hung with black, the stars darkened, the sun eclipsed, and the moon be deprived of her borrowed light. It is from the upper world that this lower world receives its light; and therefore, (v. 8.) when the bright lights of heaven are made dark above, darkness by consequence shall cover the land of Egypt, and bring it into such desolation and darkness, that it shall be on the land of Egypt. Here the plague of darkness, which was upon Egypt of old for three days, seems to be alluded to, as, before, the turning of the waters into blood. For when former judgments are forgotten, it is just that they should be repeated. When their privy-councillors, and scribes, and those that have the direction of the public affairs, are deprived of wisdom, and made fools, and the things that belong to their peace are hid from them, their lights are darkened, and the land is in a mist. This is foretold, Isr.xix. 13. The princes of Zion are become fools.

But when the news became known upon the spreading of the report of the fall of Egypt, and the bringing of the news to remote countries, countries which they had not known, (v. 9.) people shall be much affected, and shall feel themselves sensibly touched by it. [1.] It shall fill them with vexation to see such an ancient, wealthy, potent kingdom thus humbled and brought down, and the pride of worldly glory, which they have taken so much by the means of Pharaoh, this pride will be vexed to see the word of the God of Israel fulfilled in the destruction of Egypt, and that all the gods of Egypt were not able to relieve it. Note, The destruction of some wicked people is a vexation to others. [2.] It shall fill them with admiration; (v. 10.) They shall be amazed at thee, shall wonder to see so great riches and power come to nothing, Rev. xvi. 17. Note, They that admire with complacency the pomp of this world, will admire with consternation the ruin of that pomp; which to those that know the vanity of all things here below is no surprise at all. [3.] It shall fill them with fear; Even their kings (that think it their prerogative to be secure) shall be horribly afraid for thee, concluding their own house to be in greater danger, when their neighbour's is on fire. If I shall brandish my sword before them, they shall tremble every man for his own life. Note, When the sword of God's justice is drawn against some, to cut them off, it is thereby brandished before others, to give them warning. And those that will not be admonished by it, and made to reform, shall yet be frightened by it, and made to tremble. They shall tremble at every moment, because of thy fulness. When others are ruined by sin, we have reason to quake for fear, as knowing ourselves guilty and obnoxious. Who is able to stand before this holy Lord God?

(3.) It is set forth by a plain and express prediction of the desolation itself that should come upon Egypt.

[1.] The instruments of the desolation appear very formidable. It is the sword of the king of Babylon, that warlike, that victorious prince, that shall come upon thee; (v. 11.) the swords of the mighty, even the terrible of the nations, all of them, (v. 12.) an army that there is no standing before. Note, Those that delight in war, and are upon all occasions entering into contention, may expect, some day or other, to be engaged with such instruments of destruction that will prove too hard for them. Pharaoh had been before to quarrel with his neighbour, and to come forth with his rivers, with his armies, v. 2. But God will now give him enough of it.

[2.] The instances of the desolation appear here very frightful, much the same with what we had before, ch. xxix. 10.—12. ch. xxx. 7. First, The multitude of the army, vast, and large, a multitude; and some estimated, some picked out to be made examples, but all cut off. Note, The numbers of sinners, though they be a multitude, will neither secure them against God's power, nor entitle them to his pity. Secondly, The pomp of Egypt shall be spoiled; the pomp of their court, what they have been proud of. Note, In renouncing the pomp of this world we may expect as much, that shall be cut off. There are things that are soon spoiled, and that cheat their admirers. Thirdly, The cattle of Egypt, that used to feed by the rivers, shall be destroyed, (v. 13.) either cut off by the sword, or carried off for a prey. Egypt was famous for horses, which would be an acceptable booty to the Chaldeans. The rivers shall be no more frequented as they have been by man and beast, that come thither to drink.

Fourthly, The waters of Egypt, that used to flow briskly, shall now grow deep and slow and heavy, and shall run like oil, (v. 14.) a figurative expression signifying that there should be such external address and heaviness upon the whole nation, that even the rivers should go softly and silently like mourners, and quite forget their rapid motion.

Fifthly, The whole country of Egypt shall be stripped of its wealth; it shall be destitute of that whereof it was full, (v. 13.) corn and cattle, and all the pleasant fruits of the earth; when these are smitten, the rest of their reliance, their face is turned, and that which is gathered becomes an easy prey to the invader. Note, God can soon empty those of this world's goods that have the greatest fullness of those things, and are full of them; that enjoy most, and have their hearts set upon those employments. The Egyptians were full of their pleasant and plentiful country, and its rich productions. Every one that talked with them should percei- ve how much it filled them. But God can soon make their country destitute of that whereof it is full; it is therefore our wisdom to be full of treasures in heaven. When the country is made destitute, 1. It shall be an instruction to them; Then shall they know that I am the Lord. A sensible conviction of the vanity of the world, and the fading, perishing nature of all things in it, will contribute no mean part to our right knowledge of God as our Portion and Happiness. 2. It shall be a lamentation to all about them: The daughters of the nations shall lament her, (v. 16.) either because, being in alliance with her, they share in her grievances, and suffer with her; or, being admirers of her, they at least share in her grief, and sympathize with her. They shall lament for Egypt and all her multitude; it shall excite their pity to see so great a devastation made. By enlarging the matters of our joy we increase the occasions of our sorrow.

17. It came to pass also in the twelfth year, in the fifteenth day of the month, that the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 18. Son of man, wail for the multitude of Egypt, and cast them down, even her, and the daughters of the famous nations, unto the nether parts of the earth, with them that go down into the pit. 19. Whom dost thou pass in beauty? go down, and be thou laid with the uncer- uncrescoed. 20. They shall fall in the midst of them that are slain by the sword; she is delivered to the sword: draw her and all her multitudes. 21. The strong among the mighty shall speak to him out of the midst of hell with them that help him: they are gone down, they lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword. 22. Asshur is there, and all her company; his graves are about him; all of them slain, fallen by the sword: 23. Whose graves are set in the sides of the pit, and her company is round about her grave; all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which caused terror in the land of the living. 24. There is Edam, and all her multitude round about her grave; all of them slain, fallen by the sword, which are gone down uncircumcised into the nether parts of the earth, which caused their terror in the land of the living; yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit. 25. They have set her a bed in the midst of the slain with all her multitudes: her graves are round about him; all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword: though their terror was caused in the land of the living, yet have they borne their shame with them that go down to the pit: he is put in the midst of them that be slain. 26. There is Meshech, Tubal, and all her multitude: her graves are round about him; all of them uncircum- circised, slain by the sword, though they caused their terror in the land of the living. 27. And they shall not lie with the mighty that are fallen of the uncircumcised, which are gone down to hell with their weapons of war; and they have laid their swords under their heads; but their iniquities shall be upon their bones, though they were the terror of the mighty in the land of the living.

28. Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the uncircumcised, and shalt lie with them that are slain with the sword. 29. There is Edom, her kings, and all her princes, which with their might are laid by them that were slain by the sword: they shall lie with the uncircumcised, and with them that go down to the pit. 30. There be the princes of the north, all of them, and all the Zidonians, which are gone down with the slain; with their terror they are ashamed of their might; and they lie uncircumcised with them that be slain by the sword, and bear their shame with them that go down to the pit. 31. Pharaoh shall see them, and shall be comforted over all his multitude, even Pharaoh and all his army slain by the sword, saith the Lord God. 32. For I have caused my terror in the land of the living; and he shall be laid in the midst of the uncircumcised with them that are slain with the sword, even Pharaoh, and all his multitude, saith the Lord God.

This prophecy concludes and completes the burden of Egypt, and leaves it and all its multitude in the pit of destruction. We are here invited to attend the funeral of that once flourishing kingdom, to lament its fall, and to take a view of those who attend it to the grave, and accompany it in the grave. This dead corpse of a kingdom is here,

I. Brought to the grave. The prophet is ordered to cast them down to the pit, (v. 18.) to foretell it as one that had authority, as Jeremiah was set over the kingdoms, Jer. 1. 10. He must speak in God's name, and as from him who will cast them down. Yet he shall foretell it as one that had an affectionate concern for them; he must weep for the multitude of Egypt, even when he casts them down. When Egypt is slain, let her have an honourable funeral, befitting her quality; let her be buried with the daughters of the famous nations, in their burying-places, and with the same ceremony; it is but a poor alloy to the reproach and terror of death, to be buried with those that were famous; yet this
s all that is allowed to Egypt. Shall Egypt think to exempt herself from the common fate of proud and impious nations? No, she must take her lot with them; (v. 19.) Whom dost thou pass in beauty? Art thou so much fairer than any other nation, that thou shouldest expect therefore to be excused? No, others, as fair as thou, are sunk into the pit; go down therefore, and be thou laid with the uncircumcised. Thou art like them, and must lie among them; the multitude of Egypt shall all fall in the midst of them that are slain with the sword; now that there is a general slaughter made among her people, does she drink of the bloody cup, and therefore she is delivered to the sword, to the sword of war, (but, in God’s hand, the sword of justice,) is delivered to be publicly executed. Draw her and all her multitude; either draw them as the dead bodies of great men are drawn in honour to the grave, in a hearse; or, as malesfactors are drawn in disgrace to the place of execution, on a sledge; draw them to the pit, and let them be made a spectacle to the world.

11. This corpse of a kingdom is bid welcome to the grave, and Pharaoh is made free of the congregation of the dead, and admitted into their regions, not without some pomp and ceremony, as the surprising fall of the king of Babylon is illustrated, He is made prominent among the nations, and in the midst of them conspicuous, and introduced into these mansions of darkness, Isa. xiv. 9, 8c. so here, (v. 21.) They shall speak to him out of the midst of hell, as it were congratulating his arrival, and calling him to join with them, in acknowledging that which neither he nor they would be brought to own when they were in their pomp and pride, that it is in vain to think of concerting with them, the world has hardened their hearts against him, and prospered. They shall say to him, and to him that pretended to help him, Where are you now? What have you brought your attempts to at last?

Divers nations are here mentioned as gone down to the grave before Egypt, that are ready to give her a scornful reception, and upbraid her with coming to them at last; these nations here spoken of, probably, were such as had been of late years ruined and wasted by the king of Babylon, and their princes cut off: let Egypt know that she has neighbour’s fare. When she goes to the grave, she does but migrate ad filares—migrate to the majority; there are innumerable before her. But it is observable, this is mentioned especially about this time, or a little before, utterly ruined and laid waste, yet they are not mentioned here among the nations that welcome Egypt to the pit; for though they suffered the same things that these nations suffered, and by the same hand, yet the kind intentions of their affliction, and its happy issue at last, and the mercy God had yet in reserve for them, were the provoking circumstance of their going down to the pit, as it was to the heathen; they were not smitten as others were, nor slain according to the slaughter of other nations, Isa. xxvii.

7. But let us see who they are, that are gone to the grave before Egypt, that lie uncircumcised, slain by the sword, with whom she must now take up her residence;

1. There lie the Assyrian empire, and all the princes and mighty men of that monarchy; (v. 22.) Ashur is there, and all her company; all the countries that were tributaries to, and had dependence upon, that crown. That mighty potentate, who used to lie in state, with his guards and grandees about him, now lies in obscurity, with his graves about him, and his soldiers in them, unable any longer to do him service or honour; they are all of them slain; fallen by the sword; the number of their months was cut off in the midst, and being bloody and deceitful men, they were not suffered to live out half their days. Their graves were set in the sides of the pit, all in a row, like beds in a common chamber, v. 23. All their company is such, as were slain, fallen by the sword; a vast congregation of such who had caused terror in the land of the living; but as the death of those to whom they were a terror put an end to their fears, (in the grave the prisoners rest together, and hear not the voice of the oppressor, Job. i. 18.) so the death of these mighty men puts an end to their terrors; who is afraid of a dead lion? Note, Death will be a king of terrors, to all the creature created, (Gen. vi. 14.) and those were no exceptions to others, they were not prevented from making themselves terrors, in their generation.

2. There lies the kingdom of Persia, which, perhaps, within the memory of man at that time, had been wasted and brought down; There is Elam and all her multitude, the king of Elam and his numerous armies, v. 24, 25. They also had caused their terror in the land of the living, had made a fearful noise and bluster among the nations their day. But Elam has now a grave by herself, and the graves of the common people round about her, fallen by the sword; she has her bed in the midst of the slain, that went down with uncircumcised, unsanctified, unholy, and not in covenant with God. They have borne their shame with them that go down to the pit, and as they came down, the disgrace and mortification of mankind, that they die and are buried; nay, they die under particular marks of ignominy, which God and man put upon them. Note, They who cause their terror shall, sooner or later, bear their shame, and be made a terror to themselves. The king of Elam is put in the midst of them that are slain. All the honour he can now pretend to is, that he lies in the midst of those mighty men, v. 26. There lie Meshech and Tubal, those barbarous northern nations, had lately made a descent upon the Medes, and caused their terror among them, lived among them upon five quarter for some years, making every thing their own that they could lay their hands on; but, at length, Cyaxares, king of the Medes, drew them by a wise into his power, cut off abundance of them, and obliged them to quit his country, v. 26. There lie Meshech and Tubal, and all their multitude; there is a burying-place for them, with their chief commander in the midst of them, all of them uncircumcised, slain by the sword. These Scythians, Meshech, and Tubal, they are mingled in their graves, and all other nations spoken of, in the bed of honour; (v. 27.) They shall not lie with the mighty, shall not be buried in state, as these are, even by consent of the enemy, that are slain in the field of battle, that go down to their graves with their weapons of war carried before the hearse, or trailed after it, that have particularly their swords laid by them, and their heads placed upon such a pillow; these Scythians are not buried with those marks of honour, but their iniquities shall be upon their sons; they shall, for their iniquity, be left unburied; though they were the terror even of the mighty in the land of the living.

3. There lies the kingdom of Edom, which had flourished long, but, about this time, at least before the destruction of Egypt, was made quite desolate, as was fortold, ch. xxv. 13. Among the sepulchres of the nations, there is Edom, v. 29. There lie, not dignified with monuments or inscriptions, but mingled with common dust, her kings and all her princes, her wise statesmen, (which Edom was famed for,) and her brave soldiers; these were the mighty might are laid by them that were slain by the sword; their might could not prevent it, nay, their might helped to procure it, for that both encouraged them to engage in war, and incensed their neighbours against them, who thought it necessary to curb their growing greatness. A deal of pains they took to ruin themselves as may be seen in chap. xxi. 1-31. But, with their might and all their power, they were stopt with the sword. The Edomites retained circumcision, being of the seed of Abraham. But that shall stand them in no stead, they shall lie with the uncircumcised.

3. There be the princes of the north, and all the Edomites. These were as well acquainted with maritime affairs as the Egyptians were, who relied much on that part of their strength; but they are gone down with the slain, (v. 30.) down to the pit. Now they are ashamed of their might, ashamed to think how much they boasted of it, and trusted to it; and, as the Edomites with their might, so these with their terror, are laid with them that are slain by the sword, and are forced to take their lot with them. They bear their shame with them that go down to the pit, die in as much disgrace as those that are cut off by the hand of public justice.

Lastly, All this is applied to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, who have no reason to flatter themselves with hopes of tranquillity, when they see how the wisest, and wealthiest, and strongest of their neighbours have been laid waste; (v. 28.) "Yea, thou shalt be broken in the midst of the unconverted;" when God has opened the way before them and has been their sword, they must expect to come down with them. (1.) It will be some extenuation of the miseries of Egypt, to observe that it has been the case of so many great and mighty nations before; (v. 31.) Pharaoh shall see them, and be comforted; it will be some ease to his mind, that he is not the first king that has been slain in battle; his not the first arm that has been rent in two, his not the first kingdom that has been made desolate. Mr. Greenhill observes here, "The comfort which wicked ones have after death, is poor comfort, not real, but imaginary." They will find little satisfaction in having so many fellow-sufferers; the rich man in hell dreaded it. It is only in point of honour that Pharaoh can see, and be comforted. (2.) But nothing will be an exemption from the miseries of this world. If I have caused any terror in the land of the living, Great men have caused their terror, have studied how to make every body fear them, Odetum dum mutuant—Let them hate, so that they do but fear. But now the great God has caused his terror in the land of the living; and therefore he laughs at theirs, because he sees that his day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 15. In this day of terror, Pharaoh and all his multitude shall be laid with them that are slain by the sword.

The view which this prophecy gives us of ruined states, may show us something. [1.] Of this present world, and the empire of death in it. Come, and see the calamities state of human life; see what a dying world this is; the strong die, the mighty die, Pharaoh and all his multitude. See what a killing stroke the sword of the Lord deals man with. [2.] Of the other world; though it is the destruction of nations as such, that perhaps is principally intended here, yet here is a plain allusion to the final and everlasting ruin of impious nations as such, those that are unremittent in heart, those that are slain by the sword of divine justice; their iniqutv is upon them, and with it they bear their shame. Those, Christ's enemies that would not have him to reign over them, shall be brought forth and slain before him; though they be as parricides, though they be as numerous, as Pharaoh and all his multitude.

1. A GALN the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, speak to the children of thy people, and say unto them, When I bring the sword upon a land, if the people of the land take a man of their coasts, and set him for their watchman: 3. If, when he seeth the sword come upon the land, he blow the trumpet, and warn the people: 4. Then whosoever heareth the sound of the trumpet, and taketh not warning, if the sword come and take him away, his blood shall be upon his own head. 5. He heard the sound of the trumpet, and took not warning, his blood shall be upon him: but he that taketh warning shall deliver his soul. 6. But if the watchman see the sword come, and blow not the trumpet, and the people be not warned; if the sword come and take any person from among them, he is taken away in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at the watchman's hand. 7. So thou, O son of man, I have set thee a watchman unto the house of Israel; therefore thou shalt hear the word at my mouth, and warn them from me. 8. When I say unto the wicked, O wicked man, thou shalt surely die; if thou dost not speak to warn the wicked from his way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; but his blood will I require at thy hand. 9. Nevertheless, if thou warn the wicked of his way to turn from it; if he do not turn from his way, he shall die in his iniquity; but thou hast delivered thy soul.

The prophet had been, by express order from God, taken off from prophesying to the Jews, just then when the news came that Jerusalem was invested, and that great thing to which I, ch. xxiv. 37. foretold, that Jerusalem should be taken, that is, in two years after, he is appointed again to direct his speech to them; and here his commission is renewed. If God had abandoned them quite, he would not have sent prophets to them; nor if he had not had mercy in store for them, would he have showed them such things as these. In these verses we have,
1 The office of a watchman laid down, the trust reposed in him, the charge given him, and the conditions associated with him and those that employ him.

2-6. It is supposed to be a public danger, that gives occasion for the appointing of a watchman—when God brings the sword upon a land, v. 2. The sword of war, whenever it comes upon a land, is of God's bringing; it is the sword of the Lord; his justice, how unjustly soever men draw it. At such a time the mouth of danger, though he be not in the borders of their country, where the threatened danger is expected, and is therefore well acquainted with all the avenues of it, and make him their watchman. Thus wise are the children of this world in their generation. Note, One man may be of public service to a whole country. Princes and statesmen are the watchmen of a kingdom, that are continually to employ themselves, and, if occasion be, as watchmen, to expose themselves, for the public service.

2. It is supposed to be a public trust that is lodged in the watchman, and that he is accountable to the public for the discharge of it. His business is, (1.) To discover the approaches and advances of the enemy; and therefore he must not be blind or asleep, for then he cannot see the sword coming. (2.) To give notice of them immediately by sound of trumpet, or, as sentinels among us, by the discharge of a gun, as a signal of danger. A special trust and confidence is reposed in him by those that set him to be their watchman, that he will faithfully do these two things; and they venture their lives upon his fidelity.

Now, [1.] If he do his part, if he be beseized aware of all the dangers that fall within his cognizance, and give warning of them, he has discharged his trust, and has not only delivered his soul, but earned his wages. If the people do not take warning, if they either will not believe the notice he gives them, will not believe the danger to be so great, or so near, as really it is, or will not regard it, and so are surprised by the enemy in their security, it is their own fault; the blame is not to be laid upon the watchman, but their blood is upon their own head. If any person goes presumptuously to lay the watchman to the ground, he must be ready to take the sound of the trumpet, and was told by it where the danger was, and so the sword comes, and takes him away in his folly, he is felo de se—a suicide; foolish man, he has destroyed himself. But, [2.] If the watchman do not do his duty; if he might have seen the danger and did not, but was asleep or heedless, or looking another way or, if he did see it and did not give warning, he is guilty only for his own safety, and blow not the trumpet to warn the people; so that some are surprised and cut off in their iniquity, v. 6.) cut off suddenly, without having time to cry, Lord, have mercy upon me, time to repent and make their peace with God; (which makes the matter much the worse, that the poor creature is taken away in his infidelity, for God has trusted his watchman's hand; he shall be found guilty of his death, because he did not give him warning of his danger. But if the watchman do his part, and the people do theirs, all is well; both he that gives warning and he that takes warning, have delivered their soul.

1. He is a watchman to the house of Israel. He had occasionally given warning to the nations about, but to the house of Israel he was a watchman by office, for they were the children of the prophets and the covenant nation, the chief of the nations, as the people of the land did, v. 2. (For they were not so wise for their souls, to secure the welfare of them, as they would have been for the protection of their temporal interests.) But God did it for them; he appointed them a watchman.

2. His business as a watchman is, to give warning to sinners of their misery and danger by reason of sin, v. 3. The watchman is to speak in the mouth, and speak to them. (1.) God has said, The wicked man shall surely die; he shall be miserable; unless he repent, he shall be cut off from God, and all comfort and hope in him; shall be cut off from all good. He shall fall, and lie for ever under the wrath of God, which is the death of the soul, as his favour is its life. The righteous God has said it, that he will never suffer them all the world to gainsay it, that the wages of sin is death. Sin, when it is finished, brings forth death. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven, not only against wicked nations, speaking ruin to them as nations, but against wicked persons, speaking ruin to them in their personal capacity, their personal interests which pass into the other world, and last for eternity. National interests do not. (2.) It is the will of God that the wicked man should be warned of this; warn them from me; which intimates that there is a possibility of preventing it, else it were a jest to give warning of its may, and that God is destined it should be prevented. Sinners are therefore warned of the wrath to come, that they may flee from it, Matt. iii. 7. (3.) It is the work of ministers to give him warning to say to the wicked, It shall be ill with thee, Isa. iii. 11. God says in general, The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The minister's business is, to apply this to particular persons, and to say, "O wicked man, thou shalt surely die, whoever thou art; if thou go on in sin, they will inevitably be the ruin. O adulterer, O robber, O drunkard, O swearer, O sabbath-breaker, thou shalt surely die." And he must say this, not in passion, to provoke the sinner, but in compassion, to warn the wicked from his way, warn him to turn from it, that he may live. This is to be done by the faithful preaching of the word in public, and by personal application to those whose sins are open.

3. If souls perish through his neglect of his duty, he brings guilt upon himself; if the prophet did not give him warning, he is guilty of his death, as the wicked way, that wicked man shall die in his iniquity; for though the watchman did not do his part, yet the sinner might have taken warning from the written word, from his own conscience, and from God's judgments upon others, by which his mouth shall be stopped, and God will be justified in his destruction. Note, It will not serve impotent men to say, We cannot tell; the watchman did not give them warning, that they were careless and unfaithful; for though they were so, it will be made to appear that God left not himself without witness. But he shall not perish alone in his iniquity, the watchman also shall be called to an account; His blood will I require at the hand. The blind leader shall be blind with his followers into destruction. If that a desire God has of the destruction of sinners, in that he resents it so ill, if these concerned do not what they can to prevent their destruction. And see what a great deal those ministers have to answer for another day, who palliate sin, and flatter sinners in their evil way, and by their wicked lives countenance and harden them in their wickedness, and encourage them to believe that they shall have grace to come to an end. 4. If he do his duty, he may take the comfort of it, though he do not see the success of it; (v. 9.) "If thou warn the wicked of his way, if thou tell him faithfully what will be the end thereof, and call him earnestly to turn from it, and he do not turn, but persist in it, he shall die in his iniquity, and the fair warning given him will be an aggravation of his sin and run; but thou hast delivered thy soul." Note, It is a comfort to ministers, that they may through grace save themselves, though they cannot be instrumental to save so many as they wish of those that hear them.

10. Therefore, O thou son of man, speak unto the house of Israel. Thus ye speak, saying, If our transgressions and our sins be upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we then live? 11. Say unto them, As I live, saith the Lord God, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye, from your evil ways; for why will ye die, O house of Israel? 12. Therefore, thou son of man, say unto the children of thy people, The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him in the day of his transgression: as for the wickedness of the wicked, he shall not fall thereby in the day that he turneth from his wickedness; neither shall the righteous be able to live for his righteousness in the day that he sinneth. 13. When I shall say to the righteous, that he shall surely live; if he trust to his own righteousness and commit iniquity, all his righteousness shall not be remembered; but for his iniquity that he hath committed, he shall die for it. 14. Again, when I say unto the wicked, Thou shalt surely die; if he turn from his sin, and do that which is lawful and right; 15. If the wicked restore the pledge, give again that he hath robbed, walk in the statutes of life, without committing iniquity; he shall surely live, he shall not die. 16. None of his sins that he hath committed shall be mentioned unto him: he hath done that which is lawful and right; he shall surely live. 17. Yet the children of thy people say, The way of the Lord is not equal: but, as for them, their way is not equal. 18. When the righteous turneth from his righteousness, and committeth iniquity, he shall even die thereby. 19. But if the wicked turn from his wickedness, and do that which is lawful and right, he shall live thereby. 20. Yet ye say, The way of the Lord is not equal. O ye house of Israel, I will judge you every one after his ways.

These verses are the substance of what we had before, (ch. xviii. 20, &c.) and they are so full and express a declaration of the terms on which people stand with God, (as the former were of the terms on which ministers stand,) that it is no wonder that they are here repeated, as those were, though we had the substance of them before. Observe here,

I. The cavils of the people against God's proceedings with them. God was now in his providence contending with them, but their uncontrouled hearts were not as yet humbled, for we are inducres to justify themselves, though thereby they reflected on God. Two things they insisted upon, in their reproaches of God, and in both they added indignity to their sin, and misery to their punishment.

1. They quarrelled with his promises and favours, as having no kindness or sincerity in them, v. 10. God had warned them, before they were moved by the preachers, to set it out of their reach, and therefore did but mock them with the mention of it. The prophet had said, some time ago, (ch. xxiv. 23.) Ye shall pine away for your iniquities; with that word he had concluded his threatenings against Judah and Jerusalem; and this they now upbraided him with, as if it had been spoken absolutely, to drive them to despair; whereas it was spoken conditionally, to bring them to repentance. Thus are the sayings of God's ministers perverted by men of corrupt minds, who are minded to pick quarrels. He puts them in hopes of life and happiness; and herein they would make him contradict himself; "For" (say they) "if our transgressions and our sins be upon us, as thou hast often told us they are; and if we must, as such, pine away in them, and wear out a miserable captivity in a fruitless repentance, how shall we then live?" If this be our doom, there is no remedy. "We die, we perish, we all perish." Note, It is very common for those that have been hardened with presumption when they were warned against sin, to sink into despair when they are called to repent, and to conclude there is no hope of life for them.

2. They quarrelled with his threatenings and judgments, as having no justice or equity in them. They said, The way of the Lord is not equal, (v. 17, 20.) suggesting that God was partial in his proceedings, and that with him there was respect of persons, and that he was more severe against sin and sinners than there was cause. 11. Here is a satisfactory answer given to both these ends.

1. Those that despairs of finding mercy with God, are here answered with a solemn declaration of God's readiness to show mercy, v. 11. When they spake of pining away in their iniquity, God sends the prophet to them, with all speed, to tell them that though their case was sad, it was not desperate, but there was yet hope in Israel. (1.) It is certain that God has no delight in the misery of sinners, nor does he desire it; if they will destroy themselves, he will glorify himself in it, but he has no pleasure in it, but would rather they should turn and live, for his goodness is that attribute of his which is most his glory, which is most his delight. He would rather sinners should turn and live, than go on and die. He has said it, he has sworn it; and because it is impossible for God to lie, we might have strong consolation; we have his word and his oath; and since he could swear by no greater, he swears by himself; As I live. They questioned whether they should live, though they did repent and reform; Yea, says God, as sure as I live, true penitents shall live also; for their sakes will I do it; and with Christ in God it is. It is certain that God is sincere and earnest, in the calls he gives sinners to repent; Turn ye, turn ye, from your evil way. To repent is to turn from our evil way; this God requires sinners to do; this he urges them to do, by repeated pressing instances; Turn ye, turn ye. O that they would be prevailed with to turn, to turn quickly, without delay! This he will enable them to do, if they will but frame their doings to turn to the Lord,
Hos. v. 4. For he has said, I will pour out my Spirit unto you, Prov. i. 23. And in this he will accept of them for it is not only a book of commands, but what he himself delivers. (3.) It is certain that if sinners persist in their inimiciry, it is owing to themselves; they die, because they will die; and herein they act most absurdly and unreasonably; Why will ye die, O house of Israel? God would have them heard, and they would not be heard.

2. Those that despaired of finding justice with God, are here answered with singular confidence of the case, which God would go by in dealing with the children of men, which carries along with it the evidence of its own equity; he that runs, may read the justice of it. The Jewish nation, as a nation, was now dead; it was ruined to all intents and purposes. The prophet must therefore deal with particular persons, and the rule of judging concerning them is much like that concerning a nation, Jer. xvii. 7-10. If God speak concerning it, to build and to plant; if it do wickedly, he will recall his favours, and leave it to ruin. But if he speak concerning it, to pluck up and destroy, and it repent, he will revoke the sentence, and deliver it. So it is here. In short, the most plausible professors, if they apostatize, shall certainly perish for ever: so from God's own mouth are pronounced foremost sinners, if they repent, shall certainly be happy for ever in their return to God. This is here repeated again and again, because it ought to be again and again considered, and preached over to our own hearts. This was necessary to be inculcated upon this stupid, senseless people, that said, The way of the Lord is not equal; for these rules of judging are so plainly just, that they need no other confirmation of them than the repetition of them.

(1.) If those that have made a great profession of religion, throw off their profession, quit the good ways of God, and grow loose and carnal, and sensual, and worldly, the profession they made, and all the religious performances with which they had for a great while kept up the credit of their profession, shall stand them in no stead, but they shall certainly perish in their iniquity; v. 12, 13, 18.

[1.] God says to the righteous man, that he shall surely live, v. 13. He says it by his word, by his ministers; he that lives regularly, his own heart tells him, his neighbours tell him, He shall live. Surely such a man as this cannot but be happy. And it is certain, if he proceed and persevere in his righteousness, and continue in it, if he be right and sincere in it, if he be really as good as he seems to be, he shall live; he shall continue in the love of God, and be for ever happy in that love.

[2.] Righteous men, who have very good hopes of themselves, and whom others have a very good opinion of, are yet in danger of turning to iniquity, by trusting to their righteousness. So the case is put here; If he trust to his own righteousness and commit iniquity, and come to make a trade of sin; if he not only take a false step, but turn aside into a false way, and persist in it—this may possibly be the case of a righteous man, and it is the effect of his trusting to his own righteousness. Note, Many eminent professors have been ruined by a proud conceit of themselves, and confidence in themself; and have been brought to this by his own righteousness and iniquity, and thinks he has already made God so much his debtor, that now he may venture to commit iniquity, for he has righteousness enough in stock to make amends for it; he fancies that whatever evil deeds he may do hereafter, he can be in no danger from them, having so many good deeds beforehand to balance them. Or, He trusts to the strength of his own righteousness; thinks himself now so well established in a course of virtue, that he may thrust himself into any temptation, and it cannot overcome him, and so by presuming on his own sufficiency he is brought to commit iniquity. By making bold on the confine of sin, he is drawn at length into the deserts of shame. This ruined the Pharisees, that intrusted to themselves that they were righteous, and that their long prayers, and fasting twice in the week, would atone for their devouring widow's houses.

[3.] If righteous men turn to iniquity, and return not to their righteousness, they shall certainly perish in their iniquity, and all the righteousness they have formerly done, all their prayers, and all their oaths, as the prophet says, for all deeds of righteousness made, no remembrance had, of their good deeds, they shall be overlooked, as if they had never been. The righteousness of the righteous shall not deliver him from the wrath of God, and the curse of the law, in the day of his transgression. When he becomes a traitor and a rebel, and takes up arms against God, it will not serve for him to plead, in his own defence, that formerly he was a loyal subject, and did many good services to the government: no, he shall not be able to live; the remembrance of his former righteousness shall be no satisfaction either to God's justice or his own conscience, in the day that he sins, but rather shall, in the estimate of both, highly aggravate the sin and sins of God's apostate. And therefore for the people that he concealed himself, that he could have him; 13. And again, (v. 18.) He shall even die thereby; and it is owing to himself.

(2.) If those that have lived a wicked life, repent and reform, forsake their wicked ways and become religious, their sins shall be pardoned, and they shall be justified and saved, if they persevere in their reformation.

[1.] God says to the wicked, Thou shalt surely die. The way that thou art in leads to destruction. The wages of thy sin is death, and thine iniquity will shortly be thy ruin. It was said to the righteous man, Thou shalt surely live, for his encouragement to proceed and persevere in the way of righteousness; but he made an ill use of it; and was imboldened by it to commit iniquity. It was said to the wicked man, Thou shalt surely die, for warning him not to persist in his wicked ways; and he makes a good use of it, and is quickened thereby to return to God and duty. Thus, even the threatenings of the word are to some, by the grace of God, a savour of life unto life, while even the promises of the word become to others, by their own corruption, a savour of death unto death. When God says to the wicked man, Thou shalt surely die, eternally, it is to frighten him, not out of his vices, but out of his sins.

[2.] There is many a wicked man who was hastening apace to his own destruction, who yet is wrought upon by the grace of God to return and repent, and live a holy life. He turns from his sin, (v. 10,) and is resolved that he will have no more to do with it; and, as an evidence of his repentance for wrong done, he restores the pledge (v. 15,) which he had taken uncharitably from the poor; he gives again that which he had robbed and taken unjustly from the rich. Nor does he only cease to do evil, but he learns to do well; he does that which is lawful and right, and makes conscience of his duty both to God and to his neighbour. And this, many years ago, he neither feared God nor regarded man. But many such amazing changes, and blessed ones, have been wrought by the power of divine grace; he that was going on in the paths of death and destruction, now walks in the statutes of life, in the way of God's commandments, which has life in it, (Prov. xi. 28,) and life at the end of it, Matth. xix. 17. And in this good way he perseveres, without committing iniquity; though yet free from remaining infirmity, yet under the dominion of no iniquity.
He repents not of his repentance, nor returns to the commission of those gross sins which he before allowed himself in.

[3.] He that does thus repent and return, shall escape the ruin he was running into, and his former sins shall be no prejudice to his acceptance with God. Let him not pine away in his iniquity, for if he confess and forsake it, he shall find mercy. He shall surely live, he shall not die, v. 15. Again, (v. 16.) He shall surely live. Again, (v. 19.) He has done that which is lawful and right; and shall live thereby. But will not his wickedness be remembered against him? No, he shall not be punished for them, v. 12. As for the wickedness of the wicked, though it was very heinous, yet he shall not fall thereby, in the day that he turns from his wickedness. Now that it is become his grief, it shall not be his ruin. Now that there is a settled separation between him and sin, there shall be no longer a separation between him and God. Nay, he shall not be so much as upbraided with them, v. 16. None of his sins that he has committed shall be mentioned unto him, either as a clog to his pardon, or an alloy to the comfort of it, or any blemish and diminution to the glory that is prepared for him.

Now lay all this together, and then judge whether the way of the Lord be not equal; whether this will not justify God in the destruction of sinners, and glorify him in the execution of judgements. The conclusion, then, of the whole matter is, (v. 20.) 'O ye house of Israel, though ye are all involved now in the common calamity, yet there shall be a distinction of persons made in the spiritual and eternal state, and I will judge you every one after his ways. Though they were sent into captivity by the hand, good fish and had enclosed in the common net, yet there he will separate between the precious and the vile, and will render to every man according to his works. Therefore God's way is equal and unexceptionable; but as for the children of thy people, God turns them over to the prophet, as he did to Moses; (Exod. xxxii. 7.) 'They are thy people, I can scarcely own them for mine.' As for them, their way is unequal; this way which they have got of quarrelling with God and his prophets, is absurd and unreasonable. In all disputes between God and his creatures, it will certainly be found that he is in the right, and they are in the wrong.

21. And it came to pass in the twelfth year of our captivity, in the tenth month, in the fifth day of the month, that one that had escaped out of Jerusalem came unto me, saying, The city is smitten. 22. Now the hand of the Lord was upon me in the evening, afore he that was escaped came, and had opened my mouth, until he came to me in the morning, and my mouth was opened, and I was no more dumb. 23. Then the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 24. Son of man, they that inhabit those wastes of the land of Israel speak, saying, Abraham was one, and he inherited the land: but we are many; the land is given us for inheritance. 25. Wherefore say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Ye eat with the blood, and lift up your eyes toward your idols, and shed blood: and shall ye possess the land? 26. Ye stand upon your sword, ye work abomination, and ye defile every one his neighbour's wife: and shall ye possess the land? 27. Say thou unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Is it I live, surely they that are in the wastes shall fall by the sword; and him that is in the open field will I give to the beasts to be devoured; and they that be in the forts, and in the caves, shall die of the pestilence. 28. For I will lay the land most desolate, and the pomp of her strength shall cease; and the mountains of Israel shall be desolate, that none shall pass through. 29. Then shall they know that I am the Lord, when I have laid the land most desolate, because of all their abominations, which they have committed.

Here we have,

I. The tides brought to Ezekiel of the burning of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans. The city was burnt in the eleventh year of the captivity, and the fifth month, Jer. liii. 13. Tides hereof were brought the prophet by one that was an eye-witness of the destruction, in the twelfth year, and the tenth month, (v. 21.) which was a year and almost five months after the thing was done; we may well suppose that, there being a constant correspondence, at this time more than ever, kept up between Jeremiah and Babylon, he had heard the news long before. But this was the first time he had an account of it from a refugee, from one who escaped, who could be particular, and would be faithick, in the narrative of it. And the sign given him was, the coming of such a one to him as had himself narrowly escaped the flames; (ch. xxiv. 26.) He that escapes in that day, shall come unto thee, to cause thee to hear it with thine ears, to hear it more distinctly than ever, from one that could say, Quaeque ipsae miserrima vidit—These miserable scenes I saw.

II. The divine impressions and influences he was under, to prepare him for those heavy tides; (v. 22.) The hand of the Lord was upon me before he came, and had opened my mouth to speak to the house of Israel what we had in the former part of this chapter; and now he wrote no more during this time, as he prophesied more with more freedom and boldness, and by latter events. So that the event proved a true prophetic, to the confirmation of these that contradicted him. All the prophecies from ch. 24. to this chapter, having relation partly to the nations about, it is probable that the prophet, when he received them from the Lord, did not deliver them by word of mouth, but in writing; for he could not say to the Ammonites, Say unto Tyre, etc. etc. etc. but by letters directed to the persons concerned; as Zacharias, when he could not speak, wrote; and herein he was as truly executing his prophetic office as ever. Note, Even silenced ministers may be doing a great deal of good by writing letters and making visits. But now the prophet's mouth is opened, that he may speak to the children of his people. It is probable that he had, during these years been continually speaking to them as a friend, putting them in mind of what he had formerly delivered to them, but that he never spoke to them as a prophet, by inspiration, till now, when the hand of the Lord came upon him, renewed his commission, gave him fresh instructions, and opened his mouth, furnished him with power to speak to the people as he ought to speak.

III. A particular message he was intrusted with, relating to those Jews that yet remained in the land of Israel, and inhabited the wastes of that land, v. 24. See what work sin had made; the ries of Israel were now become the wastes of Israel, for they lay all in ruins; some few that had escaped the sword and captivity, still continued
there, and began to think of re-settling. This was so long after the destruction of Jerusalem, that it was some time before this, that Gedaliah (a modest, humble man) and his friends were slain; but, pro-
ably at this time, Jeconiah, and the proud men that joined with him, were at the height, (Jer. xliii.
2) and before they came to a resolution to go into Egypt, wherein Jeremiah opposed them, it is probable that the project was to establish themselves in the wastes of the land of Israel, in which Ezekiel here opposed them, and probably despatched the message away by the person that brought him the news of Jerusalem's destruction. Or, perhaps, those here prophesied against might be some other party of Jews, that remained in the land, hoped to take root there, and to be sole masters of it, after Joha-nan and his forces were gone into Egypt.
Now here we have,
1. An account of the pride of these remaining
Jews, who dwell in the wastes of the land of Israel.
The pride of not only those who had been very humbling, and still was very threatening, yet they were intolerably haughty and secure, and promised themselves peace. He brought the news to the prophet, that Jerusalem was smitten, could not tell him (it is likely) what these people said, but God tells him, They say,
'The land is given us for our inheritance, v. 24.
Our pride in it is an inheritance to us; they consider us as occupiers; we shall now be placed alone in the midst of the earth, and have it all to ourselves.'
This argues great stupidity under the weighty hand
of God, and a reigning selfishness, and narrow-spi-ightedness; they pleased themselves in the ruin of their country as long as they hoped to find their own account of it, cared not though it were all waste;
such as that they might have the sole property; a poor in-hertance to be proud of! They have the impudence to compare their case with Abraham's, glorifying in this, 'We have Abraham to our father. 'Abraham,' say they, 'was one, one family, and he inherited
the land, and lived many years in the peaceable enjoyment of it; but we are many, many families, and have more than we can use'; which is an utter lie, or rather
'Inheritance.' (1) They think they can make out as good a title from God to this land as Abraham could; 'If God gave this land to him, who was but one worshiper of him, as a reward of his service, much more will he give it to us, who are many worshippers of him, as the reward of our service.'
This speaks the great conceit they had of their own merits, as if they were greater than those of Abraham their father, who yet was not justified by works. (2) They think they can make good the possession of this land against the Chaldeans and all other invaders, as well as Abraham could against those that were competitors with him for it; 'If he,
who was but one, could hold it, much more shall we, who are many, and have more at command than his three hundred trained servants.'
This speaks the confidence they had in their own might; they had got possession, and were resolved
to keep it.
2. A check to this pride. Since God's providences did neither humble them nor terrify them, he sends them a message sufficient to do both.
(1) To humble them, he tells them of the quick-elled foxes tip, Jeconiah, which rendered them utterly unworthy to possess this land, so that they could not expect God should give it them.
They had been followed with one judgment after another,
but they had not profited by those of grace
so as might be expected; they were still unformed, and how could they expect that they should possess the land? 'Shall ye possess the land? What! such wicked people as ye are? How shall I put thee among the children, and give thee a pleasant land?'
Jer. iii. 19. Surely you never reflect upon yourselfs, else you would rather wonder that you are in the land of the living than expect to possess this land. For they were not, as Jeremiah says, [1.]
'You make no conscience of forbidden fruit, forbidden food; you eat with the blood,' directly contrary to one of the precepts given to Noah and his sons, then when God gave them possession of the earth, Gen. ix. 4. [2.] 'Idolatry, that covenant-breaking sin, that sin which the jealous God has in a particular manner proscribed by to lay your country waste, is still the sin that most God
besees you, and which you have a strong inclination to.
'You lift up your eyes toward your idols, which is a sign that though perhaps you do not how your knee to them so much as you have done, yet you set your hearts upon them, and hanker after them.'
[3.] 'You are as fierce and cruel and barbarous as ever; you shed blood, innocent blood.' [4.] 'You are as proud as David's fierce men, who, with your own bow, and have no dependence on, or regard to,
God and his providence; you stand upon your sword, (v. 26.) you think to carry all before you, and make all your own, by force of arms.' How can they expect the inheritance of Isaac, (as these did,) who are of Ishmael's disposition, that had his hand against every man, (Gen. xvi. 12.) and Esau's prophesied to be the strongest pillars; though it was sin that first drew the sword. But, blessed be God, there are those who know better, that stand upon the support of the divine power and promise, and lay their heads in the bosom of divine love, not trusting in their own swords, Ps. xlv. 3. [5.] 'You are guilty of all manner of abominations, and, particularly, you defile every one his neighbour's wife, and shall ye possess the land? What! such vile miscreants as you?' Note, They cannot expect to possess the land, nor to enjoy any true comfort or happiness here or hereafter, who live in rebellion against the Lord.
(2.) To terrify them, he tells them of the further judgments God had in store for them, which should make them utterly unable to possess this land, so that they could not stand it out against the enemy.
Do they say that they shall possess the land? No,
God has said it, he has sworn it, As I live, saith the Lord. Though he has sworn that he delights not in the death of sinners, yet he has sworn also that those who persist in impenitency and unbelief, shall not enter into rest. [1.] They that are in the enemies' hands shall fall by them, as the first, either by the sword of the Chaldeans, who come to avenge the murder of Gedaliah, or by one another's swords, in their intestine broils. [2.] They that are in the open field, shall be devoured by wild beasts, which swarmed of course in the country, when it was despoiled, and there were none to protect them, and keep them under, Exod. xxiii. 29.
When the army of Israel were in the country, still there was no safety in it. Norwere beasts was one of the four sore judgments, ch. xiv.
15. [3.] They that are in the forts and in the caves, that think themselves safe in artificial or natural fastnesses, because men's eyes cannot discover them, or men's darts reach them, there the arrows of the Almighty shall find them out; they shall die of the pestilence. [4.] The whole land, even the land of Israel, that had been the glory of all lands, shall be most desolate, v. 28. It shall be desolation, destruction, all over as desolate as desolation itself can make it. [5.] Zion itself, the holy mountain not excepted, shall be desolate, the roads unfrequented, the houses uninhabited, that none shall pass through; as it was threatened, (Deut. xxxviii. 62.) Ye shall be left few in number. [5.] The pomp of her strength, whatever she glories in as her joy, and trusts to as her strength, shall be made to cease. [6.] All this is done, this is told; it is not made to know their dependence upon God, when all their creature-comforts fail them, and are made desolate.

30. Also, thou son of man, the children of thy people still are talking against thee by the walls, and in the doors of the houses, and speak one to another, every one to his brother, saying, Come, I pray you, and hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord. 31. And they come unto thee as the people cometh, and they sit before thee as my people, and they hear thy words, but they will not do them; for with their mouth they shew much love, but their heart goeth after their covetousness. 32. And, lo, thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument: for they hear thy words, but they do them not. 33. And when this cometh to pass, (lo, it will come,) then shall they know that a prophet hath been among them.

The foregoing verses spake conviction to the Jews who remained in the land of Israel, who were monuments of sparing mercy; and yet returned not to the Lord; in these verses, these are reproved who were now in captivity in Babylon, under divine rebukes, and yet were not returned by them. They are not indeed charged with the same gross enormities that the others are charged with: they made some show of religion and devotion; but their hearts were not right with God. The thing they were here accused of is, mocking the messengers of the Lord; one of their measure-filling sins, which brought this ruin upon them, and yet they were not cured of it.

I. By invasions, ill-natured reflections upon him, privately among themselves, endeavouring by all means possible to render him despicable. The prophet did not know it, but charitably thought that they who spake so well of him to his face, with so much seeming respect and deference, would surely not speak ill of him behind his back. But God comes, and unt buena. In their hearts they were still talking against thee, (v. 50.) or talking of thee, no good, I doubt. Note, Public persons are a common theme or subject of discourse; every one takes a liberty to censure them at pleasure; and faithful ministers know not how much ill is said of them every day; it is well that they do not; for if they did, it might prove a discouragement to them in their work, not to be easily got over. But God takes notice of all that is said against his ministers; not only what is decreed against them, or sworn against them, not only what is written against them, or ordered against them in tenor or deliberation, but of what is said against them in conversation, and among neighbours when they meet in the evening, by the walls and in the doors of their houses; where whatever freedom of speech they use, if they reproach and slander any of God's ministers, God will reckon with them for it; his prophets shall not be made the song of the drunkards always. They have often charged the prophet's charge, but they loved to talk of him in a careless, and bantering way; they said jokingly, "Come, and let us hear what is the word that cometh forth from the Lord; perhaps it will be something new, and will entertain us, and furnish us with matter of discourse." Note, Those have arrived at a great pitch of profoundness, who can make so great a priviilege, and so great a duty, as the preaching and hearing of the words of the Lord; who can make ridicule; yea, though it be not done publicly, but in private conversation among themselves. Serious things should be spoken of seriously.

II. By assembling with him in their attendance upon his ministry. Hypocrites mock God, and mock his prophets. But their hypocrisy is often before God, and the day is coming when, as here, it will be laid open. Observe here,

1. The plausible profession which these people made, and the speciousness of their pretensions. They are like those (Matth. xx. 8.) who draw nigh to God with their mouths, and honour him with their lips, but their hearts are far from him. (" They were diligent and constant in their attendance upon the means of grace. They came unto thee as the people came. In Babylon they had no temple or synagogue, but they went to the prophet's house, (ch. viii. 1.) and there, it is probable, they spent their new moons and their sabbaths in religious exercises, and their prayers as well as their worship, thus mocked and blasphemed against the Lord and his prophets."

2. They behaved themselves very decently and reverently in the public assembly; there were none of them whispering or laughing, or going about them or sleeping. But they sit before thee as my people, with all the shows of gravity, and seriousness, and composure of mind. They sit out the time, without weariness, or wishing the sermon done. (3.) They were very attentive to the word preached; "They are not thinking of something else, but they hear thy words, and take notice of what thou sayest." (4.) They pretended to have a great kindness and respect for the prophet. Though, behind his back, they could not give him a good word, yet, to his face, they showed much love to him and his doctrine; they pretended to have a great concern lest he should spend himself too much in preaching, or expose himself to the Chal
EZEKIEL, XXXIV.

The iniquities and calamities of God's Israel had been largely and pathetically lamented before, in this book. Now, in this chapter, the shepherds of Israel, the men both in church and state, are called to an account, as having been very much necessary to the sin and ruin of Israel, by their neglecting to do the duty of their place. Here is, 1. A high charge exhibited against them for their negligence, their unskilfulness and unfaithfulness in the management of public affairs, (v. 1-6.) and again, v. 8. II. Their discharge from their trust, for their insufficiency and treachery, (v. 10-16.) III. A gracious promise that God would take care of his flock, though they did not, and that it should not always suffer as it had done, by their mal-administrations, v. 11-16. IV. Another charge exhibited against the shepherds that were fat and strong, for the injuries they did to those that were weak and feeble, v. 17-22. V. Another promise, that God would in the fulness of time send the Messiah, a great and good shepherd of the sheep, who should redress all grievances, and set every thing to rights with the flock, v. 23-31.

1. And the word of the LORD came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, prophesy against the shepherds of Israel, prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God unto the shepherds, Wo be to the shepherds of Israel that do feed themselves! should not the shepherds feed the flocks? 3. Ye eat the fat, and ye clothe you with the wool, ye kill them that are fed: but ye feed not the flock. 4. The diseased have ye not strengthened, neither have ye healed that which was sick, neither have ye bound up that which was broken, neither have ye brought again that which was driven away neither have ye sought that which was lost, but with force and with cruelty have ye ruled them. 5. And they were scattered, because there is no shepherd: and they became meat to all the beasts of the field when they were scattered. 6. My sheep wandered through all the mountains, and upon every high hill: yea, my flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, and none did search or seek after them.

The prophecy of this chapter is not dated, nor any of those that follow it, till chap. xxix. It is most probable that it was delivered after the completing of Jerusalem's destruction, when it would be very seasonable to inquire into the causes of it.

1. The prophet is ordered to prophesy against the shepherds of Israel—the princes and magistrates, the priests and Levites, the great Sanhedrim or council of state, or whoever they were that had the direction of public affairs, in a higher or lower sphere; the kings especially, for there were two of them now captives in Babylon, who, as well as the people, must have their transgressions showed them, that they might repent, as Manasseh in his captivity. God has something to say to the shepherds, for they are but under shepherds, accountable to him who is the great Shepherd of Israel. And that which he says is, Ito the shepherds of Israel! Though they are shepherds, and shepherds of Israel, yet he must not spare them, must not flatter them. Note, If men's dignity and power do not, as they ought, keep them from sin, they will not serve to exempt them from reproof, to excuse their repentance, or to secure them from the judgments of God if they do not repent. We had a wo to the false shepherds, Jer. xxviii. 1. God had a particular manner reckon with them if they be false to their trust.

11. He is here directed what to charge the shepherds with, in God's name, as the ground of God's controversy with them, for it is not a causeless quarrel. Two things they are charged with.

1. That all their care was to advance and enrich themselves, and to make themselves great. Their business was to take care of those that were committed to their charge; Should not the shepherds feed the flocks? No doubt they should, but they betray their trust if they do not. Not that they are to put the meat into their mouths, but to provide it for them, and bring them to it. But these shepherds made this the least of their care, they fed themselves, coveted every thing to gratify and indulge their own appetite, and to make themselves rich and great, fat and easy. They made sure of the profits of their places, they did eat the fat, the cream; (so some:) for he that feeds a flock eats of the milk of it; (1 Cor. ix. 7.) and they made sure of the best of the milk. They made sure of the fleece, and clothed themselves with the wool, getting into their hands all manner of things in the estates of their subjects, yes, and killed them, and made them liable to the full costs of their sheep, which were taken for death for his vineyard. Note, There is a wo to those who are in public trusts, but consult only their own private interest, and are more inquisitive about the benefit than about the office, and what money is to be got than what good is to be done. It is an old complaint, All seek their own, and not the public or their own.

2. That they took no care for the benefit and welfare of those that were committed to their charge; Ye feed not the flock. They neither knew how to do it, so ignorant were they, nor would they take any pains to do it, so lazy and slothful were they; nor, they never desired or designed it, so treacherous and unfaithful were they.

(1.) They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were discomposed, did not strengthen them, or heal them, or bind them up, v. 4. When any of the flock were sick or hurt, sorrowed or wounded, it was all one to them whether they lived or died; they never looked after them. The princes and judges took no care to right those that suffered wrong, or to shelter injured innocency. They took no care to remove the poisons to see them provided for; they might starve. Nay, they took no care to instruct the ignorant, to rectify the mistakes of those that were in error, to warn the unruly, or to comfort the feeble-minded. The ministers of state took no care to check the growing distempers of the kingdom, which threatened the vitals of it. Things were amiss, and out of course, everywhere; and they were busy to fortify, and not to rectify them.

(2.) They did not do their duty to those of the flock that were dispersed, that were driven away by the enemies that invaded the country, and were forced to seek for shelter where they could find a place; or that wandered of choice upon the mountains and hills, (v. 6.) where they were exposed to the beasts of prey, and became meat to them, v. 5. Every one is ready to seize a waif and stray. Some went abroad and begged, some went abroad and traded, and thus the country became thin of inhabitants, and was weakened and impoverished, and ruined hands both in the fields of corn and in the fields of battle, both in harvest and in war; My flock was scattered upon all the face of the earth, v. 6. And they were never inquired after, were never encouraged to return to their own country; None did seek or search after them. Nay, with force and cruelty they ruled them, which drove them more away, and discouraged those that were driven from them. They were a people of bad, who have reason to expect better treatment among strangers than in their own country. It may be meant of those of the flock that went astray from God and their duty; and the priests, that should have taught the good knowledge of the Lord, used no means to convince and reclaim them, so that they became an easy prey to seducers. Thus were they scattered, because there was no shepherd, v. 5. There were those that called themselves shepherds, but really they were not. Note, Those that do not do the work of shepherds, are unworthy of the name. And if those that undertake to be shepherds, are foolish shepherds, (Zech. xi. 13. ) if they are proud and above their business, idle and do not love their business, or faithless and unconcerned about it, the case of the flock is as bad as if it were without a shepherd. Better no shepherd than such shepherds.

Christ complains that his flock were as sheep having no shepherd, when yet the Scribes and Pharisees sat in Moses's seat, Matt. ix. 36. It is ill with the patient when his physician is his worst disease; ill with the flock when the shepherds drive them away, and disperse them, by ruling them with force.

7. Therefore, ye shepherds, hear the word of the Lord; 8. As I live, saith the Lord God, surely, because my flock became a prey, and my flock became meat to every beast of the field, because there was no shepherd, neither did my shepherds search for my flock, but the shepherds fed themselves, and fed not my flock: 9. Therefore, O ye shepherds, hear the word of the Lord; 10. Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against the shepherds, and I will require my flock at their hand, and cause them to cease from feeding the flock; neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more: for I will deliver my flock from their mouth, that they may not be meat for them. 11. For thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I even I, will both search my sheep, and seek them out. 12. As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered; so will I seek out my sheep, and will deliver them out of all places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. 13. And I will bring them out from the people, and gather them from the countries, and will bring them to their own land, and feed them upon the mountains of Israel by the rivers, and in all the inhabited places of the country. 14. I will feed them in a good pasture, and upon the high mountains of Israel shall their fold be: there shall they lie in a good fold, and in a fat pasture shall they feed upon the mountains of Israel. 15. I will feed my flock, and I will cause them to lie down, saith the Lord Gop. 16. I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away, and will bind up that which was broken, and will strengthen that which was sick: but I will destroy the fat and the strong; I will feed them with judgment.

Upon reading the foregoing articles of impeachment drawn up, in God's name, against the shepherds of Israel, we cannot but look upon the shepherds with a just indignation, and upon the flock with a tender compassion. God, by the prophet, here expresses both in a high degree; and the shepherds are called upon (v. 7, 9.) to hear the word of the Lord, to hear this word. Let them hear how little he regards them who made much of themselves, and how much he regards the flock which they made nothing of; both will be humbling to them. Those that will not hear the word of the Lord giving them their direction, shall be made to hear the word of the Lord reading them their doom. Now see here,

I. How much displeased God is at the shepherds. The shepherds, v. 8. God's flock became a prey to the deceivers first that drew them to idolatry, and then to the destroyers that carried them into captivity; and these shepherds took no care to prevent either the one or the other, but were as if there had been no shepherds; and therefore God says it, (v. 10.) and confirms it with an oath; (v. 8.) I am against the shepherds. They had a commission from God to feed the flock, and they made use of his name in what they did, expecting he would stand by them; No, says God, so far from that, I am against them. Note, It is not our having the name and authority of shepherds, that will engage God for us, if we do not the work enjoined us, and be not faithful to the trust reposed in us. God is against them, and they shall know it, for he has a commission from God to feed the flock, and a word in his name which he has charged them with: I will require my flock at their hands, and charge it upon them, that so many of them are missing. Note, Those will have a great deal to answer for in the judgment-day, who take upon them the care of souls, and yet take no care of them. Ministers must watch and work, as those that must give account, (Heb. xii. 17.) 2. They shall be deprived of their wages. They shall cease from feeding the flock, from pretending to feed it. Note, It is just with God to take out of men's hands that power which they have abused, and that trust which they have betrayed. But if this were all their punishment, they could hear it well enough, therefore it is added, (v. 9.) Neither shall the shepherds feed themselves any more, for I will deliver my flock from their mouth, which, instead of protecting, they had made a prey of. Note, Those that are enlicing themselves with the spoils of the public, cannot expect that they shall always be suffered to do so. Nor will God always permit his people to be trampled upon by those that should support them, but will find a time to deliver them from the shepherds their false friends, as well as from the lions their open enemies.

II. How much concerned God is for the flock; he speaks as if he were the more concerned for them, because he saw them thus neglected, for with him the fatherless finds mercy. Precious promises are made here upon the occasion, which were to have their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity, and their re-establishment in their own land. Let the shepherds hear this word of the Lord, and know that they have no part or lot in the matter. But let the poor sheep hear it, and take the comfort of it. Note, The aged patriarchs and ministers fall in doing their part, for the good of the church, yet God will not fail in doing his; he will take the flock into his own hand, rather than the church shall come short of any kindness he has designed for it. The under shepherds may prove careless, but the Chief Shepherd neither slumbers nor sleeps. They may be false, but God abides faithful.

1. God will gather his sheep together that were scattered, and bring them back to the fold that had wandered from it: I, even I, who alone can do it, will do it, and will have all the glory of it. I will both search my sheep, and find them out, (v. 11.) as a shepherd does, (v. 12.) and bring them back as he does the stray sheep, upon his shoulders, from all the places where they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day. There are cloudy and dark days, windy and stormy ones, which scatter God's sheep; which send them hither and thither, to divers and distant places, in quest of secrecy and safety. But, (1.) Wherever they are, the eye of God will find them out; for his eyes run to and fro through the earth, in favour of them, I will seek for my sheep, and will not let any of them be lost, though driven ever so far off, shall be lost. The Lord knows them that are his; he knows their work, and where they dwell, (Rev. ii. 13.) and where they are hidden. (2.) When his time is come, his arms will fetch them home; (v. 13.) I will bring them out from the people. God will both incline their hearts to come by his grace, and will by his providence open the way for them. God will search for and recover the sheep that lies in the way. They shall not return one by one, clandestinely stealing away, but they shall return in a body; I will gather them from the countries into which they are dispersed; not only the most considerable families of them, but every particular person, v. 16. I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away.

2. God's people shall be brought out triumphantly out of Babylon, under the conduct of Zerubbabel, Ezra, and others. When those that have gone astray from God into the paths of sin, are brought back by repentance, when those that erred come to the acknowledgment of the truth, when God's outcasts are gathered and restored, and religious assemblies, that were dispersed, rally together, upon them, and remove every difficulty that lies in the way. They shall not return one by one, clandestinely stealing away, but they shall return in a body; I will gather them from the countries into which they are dispersed; not only the most considerable families of them, but every particular person, v. 16. I will seek that which was lost, and bring again that which was driven away. This will be the scene of the great national reformation, when the churches have rest and liberty, then this promise has a further accomplishment.

2. God will feed his people as the sheep of his pasture, that had been famished. God will bring the returning captives safe to their own land, (v. 13.) will feed them upon the mountains of Israel, and that is a good pasture, and a fat pasture; (v. 14.) there shall sheaf for sheaf, and there shall be no more to make them afraid. Ps. xxiii. 2. He makes, me to lie down in green pastures. Compare this with the like promise, (Jer. xxxi. 5, 4.) when God restored them not only to the milk and honey of their own land, to the enjoyment of its fruits, but to the privileges of his sanctuary on mount Zion, the chief of the mount.
tains of Israel; when they had an altar and a temple again, and the benefit of a settled priesthood, then they were fed in a good pasture.

3. He will succour those that are hurt, will bind up that which was broken, and strengthen that which was sick, will comfort those that mourn in Zion and with Zion. If ministers, who should speak peace to those who are of a sorrowful spirit, neglect their duty, yet the Holy Ghost the Comforter will be faithful to his office. But, as it follows, the fat and the strong shall be destroyed. He that has rest for disquieted saints, has terror to speak to presumptuous sinners. As every valley shall be filled, so every mountain and hill shall be brought low, Luke iii. 3.

17. And as for you, O my flock, thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I judge between cattle and cattle, between the rams and the he-goats. 18. Soweth it a small thing unto you to have eaten up the good pasture, but ye must tread down with your feet the residue of your pastures? and to have drunk of the deep waters, but ye must foul the residue with your feet? 19. And as for my flock, they eat that which ye have trodden with your feet; and they drink that which ye have fouled with your feet. 20. Therefore, thus saith the Lord God unto them, Behold, I, even I, will judge between the fat cattle and between the lean cattle. 21. Because ye have thrust with side and with shoulder, and pushed all the diseased with your horns, till ye have scattered them abroad; 22. Therefore will I save my flock, and they shall no more be a prey; and I will judge between cattle and cattle. 23. And I will set up one Shepherd over them, and he shall feed them, even my servant David; he shall feed them, and he shall be their shepherd. 24. And I the Lord will be their God, and my servant David a prince among them; I the Lord have spoken it. 25. And I will make with them a covenant of peace, and will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land; and they shall dwell safely in the wilderness, and sleep in the woods. 26. And I will make them, and the places round about my hill, a blessing; and I will cause the shower to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing. 27. And the tree of the field shall yield her fruit, and the earth shall yield her increase, and they shall be safe in their land, and shall know that I am the Lord, when I have broken the bands of their yoke, and delivered them out of the hand of those that served themselves of them. 28. And they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, neither shall the beasts of the land devour them: but they shall dwell safely, and none shall make them afraid. 29. And I will raise up for them a Plant of renown, and they shall be no more consumed with hunger in the land, neither bear the shame of the heathen any more. 30. Thus shall they know that I the Lord their God am with them, and that they, even the house of Israel, are my people, saith the Lord God. 31. And ye, my flock of my pasture, are men, and I am your God, saith the Lord God. The prophet has no more to say to the shepherds, but he has now a message to deliver to the flock. God had ordered him to speak tenderly to them, and to assure them of the mercy he had in store for them. But here he is ordered to make a difference between them and others of the same name, as between the precious and the vile, and then to give them a promise of the Messiah, by whom this distinction should be effectually made, partly at his first coming, for, for judgment he came into this world, (John xi. 39,) to fill the hungry with good things, and to send the rich empty away, Luke i. 53. But this distinction shall be completely made at his second coming, when he shall, as it is here said, judge between cattle and cattle, when he shall divide between the precious and the vile, and shall set the sheep on his right hand, and the goats on his left, (Matt. xxv. 32, 33,) which seems to have reference to this. We have here, 1. Conviction spoken to those of the flock that were fat and strong, the rams and the he-goats, v. 17. Those that, though they had not power, as shepherds and rulers, to oppress widows, yet, being rich and wealthy, made use of the opportunity which this gave them, to bear hard upon their poor neighbours. Those that have much, would have more, and, if they set to it, will have more, so many ways have they of encroaching upon their poor neighbours, and forcing from them the one ewe-lamb, 2 Sam. xii. 4. Do not the rich oppress the poor merely with the help of their riches, and draw them before the judgment-seats? Jam. ii. 6. Poor servants and tenants are hardly used by their rich lords and masters. The rams and the he-goats not only kept all the good pasture to themselves, ate the fat and drank the sweet, but they would not let the poor of the flock have any comfortable enjoyment of the little that was left them; they trod down the residue of the pastures, and fouled the good streams with their feet, so that the flock was fain to eat that which they had trodden into the dirt, and drink that which they had muddied, v. 18, 19. This intimates that the great men, not only by extortion and oppression made and kept their neighbours poor, and scarcely left them enough to subsist on, but were so vexatious to them, that what little course fare they had, was illibtered to them. And this seemed a small thing to them: they thought there was no harm in it, as if it were the privilege of their quality to be injurious to all their neighbours. Note, Many that live in pomp and at ease themselves, care not what straits those about them are reduced to, so they may but have every thing to their mind. Those that are at ease, and the proud, grudge that any body should live by them with any contentment. But this was not all; they not only robbed the poor, to make them poorer, but were troublesome to the sick and weak of the flock; (v. 21,) they thrust with side and shoulder those that were feeble, (for the weakest goes to the wall,) and pushed the diseased with their horns, because they knew they could be too hard for them, when they durst not meddle with their match. It has been observed concerning sheep, that if one of the flock be sick and faint, the rest will secure it as they can, and shelter it from the scorching heat of the sun; but these, on the contrary, were most injurious to the diseased. That those they could not serve themselves of, did they what they could to rid the country of, and so scattered them abroad, as if the poor, whom Christ says we must have always with us, were public nuisances, not to be relieved, but sent far away from us. Note, It is a barbarous thing to add affliction to the afflicted. Perhaps these rams and he-goats were springing to the means of the Scribes and Pharisees, for they are such troublers of the church as Christ himself must come to deliver it from; (v. 23.) they devoured widows’ houses, took away the key of knowledge, corrupted the pure water of divine truths, and oppressed the consciences of men with the traditions of the elders; besides, they were continually vexations and injurious to the flock by the flock that waited on the Lord, Zech. xi. 11. Note, It is no new thing for the flock of God to receive a great deal of damage and mischief from those that are themselves of the flock, and in eminent stations in it, Acts xx. 30. 11. Comfort spoken to those of the flock that are poor and beggarly, and that wait for the consolation of Israel; (v. 22.) “I will save my flock, and they shall hear my voice; and I will set up shepherds over them, and of their own beasts of prey, by their own shepherds, or by the rams and he-goats among themselves.” Upon this occasion, as is usual in the prophets, comes in a prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his kingdom, and the exceeding great and precious benefits which the church should enjoy under the protection and influence of that kingdom. Observe, What God does for the benefit of the Messiah himself. (1.) He shall have his commission from God himself: I will set him up, v. 23. I will raise him up, v. 29. He sanctified and sealed him, appointed and anointed him. (2.) He shall be the great Shepherd of the sheep, who shall do that for his flock which no one else could do. He is the one Shepherd, under whom Jews and Gentiles should be one fold. (3.) He is God’s Servant, employed by him and for him, and doing all in obedience to his will, with an eye to his glory; his Servant, to reestablish his kingdom among men, and advance the interests of that kingdom. (4.) He is David; one after God’s own heart, set as his King upon the holy hill of Zion, made the head of the corner; with whom the covenant of royalty is made, and to whom God promises that he shall be the Lord’s anointed, and is both the Root and Offspring of David. (5.) He is the Plant of renown, because a righteous Branch, (Jer. xxxiii. 5.) a Branch of the Lord, that is beautiful and glorious, Isa. iv. 2. He has a name above every name, a throne above every throne, and may therefore well be called a Branch of renown. Some understand it of the church, the planting of the Lord, Isa. lix. 3. Its name shall be remembered, (Ps. cvi. 17.) and Christ’s in it. 2. Concerning the great charter by which the kingdom of the Messiah should be incorporated, and upon which it should be founded; (v. 25.) I will make with them a covenant of peace. The covenant of grace is a covenant of peace. In it God is at peace with us, speaks peace to us, and assures us of it, through the whole world, and the good we need to make us happy. The tenor of this covenant is; “I the Lord will be their God, a God all-sufficient to them, (v. 24.) will own them, and will be owned by them; in order to this, my Servant David shall be a Prince among them, to reduce them to their allegiance, to receive their homage, and to reign over them, in their own names.” Note, First, That God, by his grace and promises, that he will have the Lord Jehovah for their God, and that they will have the Lord Jesus for their Prince, have the Lord Jehovah for their God. And then they, even the house of Israel, shall be my people. If we take God to be our God, he will take us to be his people.

From this covenant between God and Israel there results communion; “I the Lord their God am with them, to converse with them; and they shall know it, and have the comfort of it.” 3. Concerning the privileges of those that are the faithful subjects of this kingdom of the Messiah, and interested in the covenant of peace. These are set forth figuratively, as the blessings of the flock. But we have a key to it, v. 31. They that be from the house of David, the house of the shepherds, are really men; men that have the Lord for their God, and are in covenant with him. Now to them is promised, (1.) That they shall enjoy a holy security, under the divine protection. Christ, our good Shepherd, has caused the evil beasts to cease out of the land, (v. 33.) having vanquished all our spiritual enemies, broken their power, and triumphed over them; the roaring lion is not a roaring devouring lion to them; they shall no more be a prey to the heathen, nor the heathen a terror to them; neither shall the beasts of the land devour them; sin and Satan, death and hell, are conquered. And then they shall dwell safely, not only in the folds, but in the fields, in the wilderness, in the woods, where the beasts of prey are; they shall dwell without fear, but they shall dwell safely there; which denotes not only that the beasts being made to cease, there shall be no danger, but, their consciences being purified and pacified, they shall be in no apprehension of danger; not only safe from evil, but quiet from the fear of evil. Note, Those may lay them down and sleep securely, sleep at ease, that have Christ for their Prince; for he will bestow their Prince upon them, and make them to dwell in safety. None shall hurt them, none shall make them afraid. If God be for us, who can be against us? Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed. Through Christ, God delivers his people not only from the things they have reason to fear, but from their fear even of death itself, from all that fear that has torment. This safety from evil is promised; (v. 27.) They shall be safe in their land, in no danger of being invaded and enslaved, though their great plenty be a temptation to their neighbors to desire their land; and that which shall make them think themselves safe is, their confidence in the wisdom, power, and goodness of God; They shall know that I am the Lord. All our disquieting fears arise from our ignorance of God, and mistakes concerning his ways; the effect of this care concerning them encourages their confidence in him: “I have broken the bands of their yoke, with which they have been brought, and held down, under oppression, and have delivered them out of the hands of those that served themselves of them. Whence they shall argue, He that has delivered, does and will, therefore will we dwell safely.” This is explained, and applied to our gospel-state, (Luke iv. 74.) That we, being delivered out of the hand of our enemies, might serve him without fear, as those may do, that serve him in faith. (2.) That they shall enjoy a spiritual plenty of all good things, the best things, for their comfort and happiness; They shall no more be consumed with hunger in the land, v. 29. Famine and scarcity, which have been the experience of his people, and look as much to their reproach among the heathen as to any other, because the fruitfulness of Canaan was so much talked of. But now they shall not bear that shame of the heathen any more. For the showers shall come down in their season, even showers of blessings, v. 26. Christ is a Shepherd that will feed his people with the fat of the field. They shall go in and out, and find himself; [1.] That he shall be the Prince, for he shall not be put off with the world for a portion, which is not bread, which satisfies not, and which occasions those that are put off with it to be consumed with hunger. The ordinances of the ceremonial law are called beggarly elements, for there was little in them, compared with the Christian institutes whereunto the mower fills his hand, and he that binds sheaves, his bosom. They that hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled with that hunger, for they shall be filled. And he that drinks of the water that Christ gives him, the still waters by which he leads his sheep, shall never thirst. [2.] Showers of blessings shall come upon them, v. 26, 27. The heavens shall yield their dew, the trees of the field also shall yield their fruit. The seat of this plenty is God's hill, his holy hill of Zion, for on that mountain, the Lord, he said, that God was made man, nations a feast; to that those must join themselves, who partake of gospel-benches. The cause of this plenty is, the showers that come down in their season, that descend upon the mountains of Zion; the graces of Christ, his doctrine that drops as the dew; the graces of Christ, and the gifts and comforts of his Spirit, by which we are made fruitful in the fruits of righteousness. The instances of this plenty and the blessings of heaven poured down upon us, and the productions of grace brought forth by us; our comfort in God's favour, and God's glory in our fruit-bearing. The extent of this plenty is very large, to all the places round about my hill for out of Zion shall go forth the law, shall go forth light to a dark world, and the river that shall water a dry and desert world; all that are in the neighbourhood of Zion, shall draw waters out of the fountains of salvation; and the nearer the church, the nearer its God. And lastly, The effect of this plenty, is, I will make them a blessing, eminently and exemplarily blessed, patterns of happiness, Isa. xix. 24. Or, They shall be blessings to all about them, diffusively useful. Note, Those that are the blessed of the Lord must study to make themselves blessings to the world. He that is good, let him also judge: and he that has received the gift, the grace, let him minister the same.

Now this promise of the Messiah and his kingdom spoke much comfort to those to whom it was then made, for they might be sure that God would not utterly destroy their nation, how low soever it might be brought, as long as that blessing was in the womb of it, Isa. lxxv. 8. But it speaks much more comfort to us, to whom it is fulfilled, who are the heirs of this promise. Surely, God has fed in his pavilions, and blessed with all spiritual blessings in heavenly things by him.

CHAP. XXXV.

It was promised, in the foregoing chapter, that when the time to favour Zion, yea, the set time, should come, especially the time for sending the Messiah, and setting up his kingdom in the world, God would cause the enemies of the church to cease, and the blessings and comforts of the church to abound. This chapter enlarges upon the former promise, concerning these blessings and comforts. But this next chapter upon the latter promise, the replenishing of the church with blessings. Mount Seir, that is, Edom, is the enemy prophesied against in this chapter, but fully put here, as in the prophecy of Obadiah, for all the enemies of the church; for as they all walked in the way of Cain that hated Abel, so they all walked in the way of Esau, who hated Jacob, but over whom Jacob, by virtue of a particular blessing, was ultimately the conqueror. Now it is hereby charged upon the Edomites, and that was, their spite and malice to Israel, v. 5, 10, 13. II. The ruin threatened, that should come upon them for this sin. God will bring upon them (v. 9.) and to their children, they shall be laid waste, (v. 4.) depopulated, and made quite desolate, (v. 6-9.) and left so when other nations that had been wasted, should recover themselves, v. 14, 15.

1. MOREOVER, the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, set thy face against mount Seir, and prophesies, against it, 3. And say unto it, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O mount Seir, I am against thee, and I will stretch out my hand against thee, and I will make thee most desolate. 4. I will lay thy cities waste, and thou shalt be desolate; and thou shalt know that I am the Lord. 5. Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred, and hast shed the blood of the children of Israel by the force of the sword in the time of their calamity, in the time that their iniquity had an end: 6. Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord God, I will prepare thee unto blood, and blood shall pursue thee: sith thou hast not hated blood, even blood shall pursue thee. 7. Thus will I make mount Seir most desolate, and cut off from it him that passeth out, and him that returneth. 8. And I will fill his mountains with his slain men: in thy hills, and in thy valleys, and in all thy rivers, shall they fall that are slain with the sword. 9. I will make thee perpetual desolations, and thy cities shall not return; and ye shall know that I am the Lord.

Mount Seir was mentioned as partner with Moab in one of the threatenings we had before; (ch. xxv. 8.) but here it is convicted and condemned by itself, and has wees of its own. The prophet must boldly set his face against Edom, and prophesy particularly against it; for the God of Israel has said, O mount Seir, I am against thee. Note, Those that have God against them, have the word of God against them, and the face of his ministers, nor dare they prophesy any good to them, but evil. The prophet must tell the Edomites that God has a controversy with them, and let them know,

1. What is the cause and ground of that controversy, v. 5. God espouses his people's cause, and will plead it; takes what is done against them as done against himself, and will reckon for it; and it is upon their account that God now contends with the Edomites. (1.) Because of the enmity they had against the seed of God, though not the whole of God, but only the part of God that was weakest in the heart; "Then hast had a perpetual hatred to them, to the very name of an Israelite." The Edomites kept up an hereditary malice against Israel, the same that Esau bore to Jacob, because he got the birthright and the blessing. Esau had been reconciled to Jacob, had embraced and kissed him; (Gen. xxviii.) and we do not find that ever he was quarrelled with him again. Now it is hereby charged upon the Edomites, and that was, their spite and malice to Israel, which is, their hatred against them, v. 5. Because thou hast had a perpetual hatred to them, to the very name of an Israelite. Therefore the Lord God contends with the Edomites, that they may not be able to obviate the bad influence of it upon their children. It is strange how deeply rooted national antipathies sometimes are, and how long they last; but it is not to be wondered at, that profane Edomites hate pious Israelites, since the old enmity that was put between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent (Gen. iii. 15.) will continue to the end. Marvel not if the world hate you. (2.) Because of the injuries they had done to the people of God; they shed their blood by the force of the sword, in the threescore of their calomny; they did not attack them as fair and open enemies, but laid wait for them, to cut off those of them that had escaped; (Obad. 14.) or, they drove them back upon the sword of the pursuers, by which they fell. It was cowardly, as well as barbarous, to take advantage of their distress; and for neighbours, with whom they had lived peaceably, to smite them over the head, when strangers openly beset them. It was in the time that their unrighteousness had an end, when the measure of it was full, and destruction came. Note, Even those that suffer justly, and for their sins, are yet to be pitied, and not trampled upon. If the father corrects one child, he expects the rest should tremble at it, not triumph in it.

2. What should be the effect and issue of that condemnation? If God stricken out his hand against the country of Edom, he will make it more desolate, v. 3. Desolation and desolation. (1.) The inhabitants shall be slain with the sword; (v. 6.) I will prepare thee unto blood. Edom shall be gradually weakened, and so be the more easily conquered, and the enemy shall gather strength, the more effectually to subdue it. Thus preparation is in the making a great while before the judgment.

3. The sword shall not pass through Edom; it implies, "Thou hast delighted in it, and thirsted after it. Those that do not keep up a rooted hatred of sin, when a temptation to it is very strong, will be in danger of yielding to it. Some read it, "Unless thou hast hatred, that is, "unless thou hast repent, and put off this bloody disposition, blood shall pursue thee." And then it is an intimation that they may be prevented by a thorough reformation. If the turn not, he will wither his sword, Ps. vii. 12. But if he turn, he will lay it by. Blood shall pursue thee, the guilt of the blood which thou hast shed, or the judgment of blood; thy bloodthirsty enemies shall pursue thee, which way soever thou seestek to make thy escape. A great and general slaughter shall be made of the Edomites, as had been foretold; (Isa. xxxiv. 6.) the mountains and hills, the valleys and rivers, shall be filled with slain, v. 8. The pursuers shall overtake those that flee, and shall give noquarter, but put them all to the sword. Note, When God comes to make inquisition for blood, those that have shed the blood of his Israel shall have blood given them to drink, for they are worthy. Satis te sanguine eum sitis—Gissi thyself with blood, which thou hast thirsted. (2.) The country shall be laid waste. The cities shall be destroyed, (v. 4.) the country made desolate; (v. 7.) for God will cut off from both him that passes out, and him that returns; and when the inhabitants are cut off, that should keep the cities in repair, they will decay, and go into ruins; and those are cut off that should till the land, that will soon overrun with brutes and wild beasts. Note, Those that help forward the desolations of Israel, may expect to be themselves made desolate. And that which completes the judgment is, that Edom shall be made perpetual desolations, (v. 9.) and the cities shall never return to their former state, nor the inhabitants of them come back from their captivity and dispersion. Note, Those that are enemies to God and his people, as the carnal mind hath, can expect no other than to be made a perpetual desolation. Implacable malice will justly be punished with irreparable ruin.

10 Because thou hast said, These two nations, and these two countries, shall be mine, and we will possess it; whereas the Lord was there: 11. Therefore, as I live, saith the Lord God, I will even do according to thine anger, and according to thine envy, which thou hast used out of thy hatred against them; and I will make myself known among them, when I have judged thee. 12. And thou shalt know that I am the Lord, and that I have heard all thy blasphemies which thou hast spoken against the mountains of Israel, saying, They are laid desolate, they are given us to consume. 13. Thus with your mouth ye have boasted against me, and have multiplied your words against me: I have heard them. 14. Thus saith the Lord God, When the whole earth rejoiced, I will make thee desolate. 15. As thou diest rejoice at the inheritance of the house of Israel, because it was desolate, so will I do unto thee: thou shalt be desolate, O mount Seir, and all Idumea, even all of it; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

Here is, 1. A further account of the sin of the Edomites, and their bad conduct toward the people of God. We find the church complaining of them for setting on the Babylonians, and irritating them against Jerusalem, saying, Raze it, raze it, down with it, down with it; (Ps. cxlvii. 7.) inflicting a rage that needed no spur; here it is further charged upon them, that they triumphed in Jerusalem's ruin, and in the desolations of the country. Many blasphemies they spake against the mountains of Israel, saying, with pride and pleasure, They are laid desolate, v. 12. Note, The troubles of God's church, as they give proofs of the constancy and fidelity of its friends, so they discover and draw out the corruptions of its enemies, in whom there then appears more brutish malice than one would have thought of.

Now their triumphing in Jerusalem's ruin is here said to proceed, (1.) From a sinful passion against the people of Israel; from anger and envy, and hatred against them, (v. 11.) that perpetual hatred spoken of, v. 5. Though they were not a match for them, and therefore could not do them a mischief themselves, yet they were glad when the Chaldaeans came, and were a blame. (2.) From the natural appetite to the land of Israel. They pleased themselves with hopes that when the people of Israel were destroyed, they should be let into the possession of their country, which they had so often grudged and envied them. They thought they could make out something of a title to it, ob destructum sancti—so many of the heathens. If Jacob's issue fail, they think, they will next in the entail, and that the remainder will be to his brother's issue; "These two nations of Judah and Israel shall be mine. Now is the time for me to put in for them," however, they hope to come in as first occupants, being near neighbours; We will possess it, when it is deserted; Ceditur occupantibus—Let us get possession, and that will be title enough. Note, These have a spirit like the Edomites towards their next of kin, and others, because they hope to get by them, or are pleased with their failing, because they expect to come into their business. When we see the vanity of the world in the dispossessions, losses, and crosses that others meet with in it, instead of showing ourselves, upon such an occasion, greedy of it, we should rather be made thereby to sit more loose to it, and both take our affections off it, and our expectations from it. But in this case of the Edomites' coveting the land of Israel, and gaping
EZEKIEL, XXXVI.

We have done with mount Seir, and left it desolate, and likely to continue so, and must now turn ourselves, with the prophet, to the mountains of Israel, which we find desolate too, but hope, before we have done with the chapter, to leave it in better plight. Here are two distinct prophecies in this chapter: 1. Here is one that seems chiefly to relate to the temporal estate of the Jews, wherein their unjust defeatable exiles is described, and the triumphs of their neighbours in it; but it is promised that their grievances shall be all redressed, and that in due time they shall be settled again in their own land, in the midst of peace and plenty, v. 1-5. 2. Here is another that seems chiefly to concern their spiritual estate; wherein they are reminded of their former sins, and God's judgments upon them, to humble them for their sins and under God's might hard, v. 6-19. But it is promised, 1. That God would glorify himself in showing mercy to them, v. 21-24. 2. That he would sanctify them by giving them his grace, and fitting them for his service; and this for his own name's sake, and in answer to his prayers, v. 25-28.

1. Also, thou son of man, prophesy unto the mountains of Israel, and say, Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord: 2. Thus saith the Lord God; Because the enemy had said against you, Aha, even the ancient high places are ours in possession; 3. Therefore prophesy and say, Thus saith the Lord God; Because they have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession unto the residue of the heathen, and ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people: 4. Therefore, ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord God; Thus saith the Lord God to the mountains, and to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys, to the desolate wastes, and to the cities that are forsaken, which became a prey and derision to the residue of the heathen that are round about; 5. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Surely in the fire of my jealousy have I spoken against the residue of the heathen, and against all Idumea, which have appointed my land into their possession with the joy of all their heart, with desipteful minds, to cast it out for a prey. 6. Prophesy therefore concerning the land of Israel, and say unto the mountains, and to the hills, to the rivers, and to the valleys, Thus saith the Lord God: Behold, I have spoken in my jealousy and in my fury, because ye have borne the shame of the heathen: 7. Therefore thus saith the Lord God; I have lifted up my hand, Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame. 8. But ye, O mountains of Israel, ye shall shoot forth your branches, and yield your fruit to any people of Israel; for they are at hand to come. 9. For behold, I am for you, and I will turn unto you, and ye shall be tilled and sown: 10. And I will multiply men upon you, all the house of Israel, even all of it: and the cities shall be inhabited, and the wastes shall be built: 11. And I will multiply upon you man and beast; and they shall increase and bring fruit: and I will settle you after your old estates, and will do better unto you than at your beginnings: and ye shall know that I am the Lord. 12. Yea, I will cause men to walk upon you, even my people Israel; and they shall possess thee, and thou shalt be their inheritance, and thou shalt no more henceforth bereave them of men. 13. Thus saith the Lord God: Because they say unto you, Thou land devourst up men, and hast bereaved thy nations; 14. Therefore thou shalt devour men no more, neither bereave thy nations any more, saith the Lord God. 15. Neither will I cause men to hear in thee the shame of the heathen any more, neither shalt thou hear the reproach of the people any more, neither shalt thou cause thy nations to fall any more, saith the Lord God.

The prophet had been ordered to set his face toward the mountains of Israel, and prophesy against them, ch. vi. 2. Then God was coming forth to contend with his people; but now that God is returning in mercy to them, he must speak good words and comfortable words to these mountains, v. 1. And again, (v. 4.) Ye mountains of Israel, hear the word of the Lord; and what he saith to them, he saith to the hills, to the rivers, to the valleys, to the desolate wastes, in the country, and to the cities that are forsaken. 4. 4.) The people were gone, some one way, and some another; nothing remained there to be spoken to but the places, the mountains, and valleys; these the Chaldeans could not carry away with them; The earth abides for ever. Now, to show the mercy God had in reserve for the people, he is to speak of him as having a dormant kindness for the place; which if the Lord had been pleased for ever to abandon, he would have called upon it to hear the word of the Lord, nor would, at this time, have showed it such things as these. Here is, 1. The compassionate notice God takes of the present deplorable condition of the land of Israel. It is become both a prey and a derision to the heathen that are round about, v. 4. 1.) It is become a prey to them; even they are all enriched with the plunder of it. When the Chaldeans had conquered them, all their neighbours flew to the spoil as to a shipwreck, every one thinking all his own that he could lay his hands on; (v. 5.) They have made you desolate, and swallowed you up on every side, that ye might be a possession to the heathen; to the rest of them, even such as had escaped the like desolation. No one thought it any crime to strip an Israelite; Turbo Romae sequitur fortunam ut semper—The mob of Rome still raise the elevated, and despise the fallen. It is the common cry, when a man is down, Down with him. 2. It is become a derision to them. They took all they had, and laughed at them when they had done. The enemies said, "Ah, even the ancient high places are ours in possession, v. 2. Neither the antiquity, nor the dignity, nor the sanctity, nor the fortifications, of the land of Israel are its security, but we are become masters of it all." The more honours that land had been adorned with, and the greater figure it had made among the nations, the more pride and pleasure did they take in making a sport of it; where the grandeur of a high and holy profession; for the more glorious the prosperity was, the more heinous is the adversity. God takes notice of it here as an aggravation of the present calamity of Israel; Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are an infamy of the people, v. 3. All the talk of the country about was concerning the overthrow of the Jewish nation; and every one that spake of it had some prevish, ill-natured reflection or other upon them. They were the scornings of them that were at ease, and the contempt of the proud, Ps. cxiii. 4. There are some that are noted for talkers, that have something to say of every body, but cannot find in their hearts to speak well of any body; God's people, among such people, were sure to be a reproach when the crown was fallen from their head. Thus it was the lot of Christianity, in its suffering days, to be everywhere spoken against. 2. The expressions of God's just displeasure against those who triumphed in the desolations of the land of Israel, as many of its neighbours did, even the residue of the brethren, and Idumea particularly. Let us see, 1. How they dealt with the Israel of God; they carved out large possessions to themselves out of their land; out of God's land; for so indeed it was; "They have appointed my land into their possession," (v. 3.) and so not only invaded their neighbour's property, but intrenched upon God's prerogative. It was the holy land which they had their sacrilegious hands upon. God spake of nothing but God's interest; if they had any dependence upon God, as the God of that land, nor acknowledge any remaining interest that Israel had in it, but cast it out for a prey, as if they had won it in a lawful war. And this they did without any dread of God and his judgments, and without any compassion for Israel and their calamities, but with the joy of all their hearts, because they got by it, and with despicable minds to Israel, that had lost by it. Increasing wealth, by right or wrong, is all the joy of a worldly heart; and the calamities of God's people all the joy of a despiteful mind. And those that had not an opportunity of making a prey of God's people, made a reproach of them; so that they were the shame of the heathen, v. 6. Every body ridiculed them, and made a jest of them; and the truth is, they had been more evident to themselves than that God was righteous herein, but men were unrighteous and very barbarous.

2. How God would deal with them who were thus in word and deed abusive to his people. He has spoken against the heathen; he has passed sentence upon them, he has determined to reckon with them for it, and this in the fire of his zeal, both for his own honour, and for the honour of his people, v. 5. Having a love for both, strong as death, he has a jealousy for both, cruel as the grave. They speak in their malice against God's people, and he will speak in his jealousy against them; and it is easy to say which will speak most powerfully. God will speak in his jealousy and in his fury, v. 6. Fury is in God; but he will first visit and handle them, and handle them as severely as men do when they are in a fury. He will so speak to them in his wrath as to vex them in his sore displeasure. What he says, he will stand to, for it is backed with an oath. He has lifted up his hand, and sworn by himself, has sworn, and will not repent. And what is it that is said with so much heat, and yet with so much deliberation? It is this, (v. 7.) Surely the heathen that are about you, they shall bear their shame. Note, The righteous God, to whom vengeance belongs, will render shame for shame. Those that put contempt and reproach upon God's people, will, sooner or later, have it turned upon themselves; perhaps in this world, either their follies or their calamities, their miscarriages or their mischances, shall be their reproach; at furthest, in that day, when God's displeasure shall rise to shame and everlasting contempt.

III. The promise of God's favour to his Israel, and assurances given of great mercy God had in store for them. God takes occasion from the outrage and insolence of their enemies, to show himself so much the more concerned for them, and ready to do them good; as David hoped that God would recompense the good for Shimei's cursing him. Let them curse, but bless them. In this we as well as others, the enemies of God's people do them real service, even by the injuries they do them, against their will, and beyond their intention. We shall have no reason to complain, if, the more unkind men are, the more kind God is; if, the more kindly he speaks to us by his word and Spirit, the more kindly he acts for us in his providence. The promise of mercy is for them, and will turn to them, v. 9. As the curse of God reaches the ground for man's sake, so does the blessing. Now that which is promised is,

1. That their rightful owners should return to the possession of them; My people Israel are at hand to come, v. 9. Though they are at a great distance from their own country, though they are dispersed in many countries, and though they are detained by the power of their enemies, yet they shall come again to their own border, Jer. xxxiii. 17. The time is at hand for their return. Though there were above forty years of the seventy, (perhaps fifty;) yet remaining, it is spoken of as near, because it is sure, and there were some among them that should live to see it. The Jews, says Dr. Ch];ow, were not one day. The mountains of Israel are now desolate; but God will cause men to walk upon them again, even his people Israel, not as travellers passing over them, but as inhabitants, not tenants, but freeholders; They shall possess them, not for term of life, but for themselves and their heirs; thou shalt be their inheritance. It was a type of the heavenly Canaan, where children are heirs, even Israelite indeed, and into which they shall shortly be all brought together, out of the countries where they are now scattered.

2. That they should afford a plentiful, comfortable maintenance for their owners, at their return. When the land had enjoyed her sabbath for so many years, it should be so much the more fruitful afterward, as we should be after rest, especially a sabbath-rest; Ye shall be lifted and sown, (v. 9.) and shall yield your fruit to my people Israel, v. 8. Note, It is a blessing to the earth, to be made serviceable to men, especially to good men, that will serve God with cheerfulness in the use of those good things which the earth serves up to them.

3. That the people of Israel should have not only a comfortable sustenance, but a comfortable settlement in their own land; The cities shall be inhabited, the wastes shall be built, v. 10. And I will settle the captivity after the former captivity, 11. Their own land had unsettled them, but now God's favour shall resettle them. When the prodigal son is become a penitent, he is settled again in his father's house, according to his former estate; Bring hither the first robe, and put it on him. Nay, I will do better unto you now than at your beginnings. There is more joy for the sheep that is brought back than there would have been if it had never gone astray. And God sometimes multiplies his people's comforts in proportion to the time that he has afflicted them. Thus God blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning, and doubled to him all he had.

4. That the people, after their return, should be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the land, so that it should not only be inhabited again, but as thickly inhabited, and as tillable, people, as ever. God will bring back the people to their own land, and to the property of it; observe what an emphasis is laid upon that, (v. 10.) all whose spirits God stirred up to return; and those only were reckoned of the house of Israel, the rest had cut themselves off from it; or, though but few, in comparison, returned at first, yet afterward, at divers times, they all returned; and then (says God) I will multiply these men. (v. 16.) multiply men and beasts; or there should never be any more occasion for the seasons of calamity. The Canaan was got into a bad name. It had of old sinned out the inhabitants, (Lev. xviii. 28.) the natives, the Aborigines, which was turned to its reproach by these that should have put another construction upon it, Numb. xiii. 32. It had of late delivered the Israelites, and sinned them out too; so that it was commonly said of it, It is a land, which, instead of supporting its natives or tribes that inhabit it, bereaves them, overthrows them, and causes them to fall; it is a torment which breaks all the tenants that come upon it. This character it had got among the neighbours; but God now promises that it shall be so no more; Thou shalt no more bereave them of men, (v. 12.) shalt no more wear them to death, v. 14. But the inhabitants shall live to a good old age, and not have the number of their months cut off in the land. God will make them like a fruitful country.

Note. God will take away the reproach of his people by taking away that which was the occasion of it. When the nation is made to flourish in peace, plenty, and power, then they hear no more the shame of the heathen, (v. 13.) especially when it is reformed, when sin, which is the reproach of any people, particularly of God's professing people, is taken away, they shall hear no more reproach from the heathen.

5. That the depopulation and desolation of their land would be no more than a temporary destruction; I will turn to thee, I will turn to thee, saith the Lord, v. 11. I will turn to thee, saith the Lord, for that reason, that I will turn again, that is, return to their land. Note, When God returns in mercy to a people that return to him in duty, all their grievances will soon be redressed, and their honour recovered.

6. Moreover the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 17. Son of man, when the house of Israel dwelt in their own land, they defiled it by their own way and by their doings: their way was before me as the uncleanness of a removed woman. 18. Wherefore I poured my fury upon them for the blood that they had shed upon the land, and for their idols whereby they had polluted it: 19. And I scattered them among the heathen, and they were dispersed through the countries: according to their way and according to their doings I judged them. 20. And when they entered unto the heathen, whither they went, they profaned my holy name, when they said to them, These are the people of the Lord, and are gone forth out of his land. 21. But I had pity for my holy name, which the house of Israel had profaned among the heathen, whither they went. 22. Therefore say unto the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God: I do not this for your sakes, O house of Israel, but for my holy name's sake, which ye have profaned among the heathen, whither ye went. 23. And I will sanctify my great name, which was profaned among the heathen, when ye shall be sanctified in you before their eyes. 24. For I will take you from among the heathen, and gather you out of all countries, and will bring you into your own land.

When God promised the poor captives a glorious return, in due time, to their own land, it was a great discouragement to their hopes, that they were unworthy, utterly unworthy, of such a favour; therefore, to remove that discouragement, God here shows them that he would do it for them purely for his own name's sake, that he might be glorified in it, and by it, and that he might magnify his mercy and goodness, that attribute which of all others is most his glory. And the restoration of that people being typical of our redemption by Christ, this is intended further to show that the ultimate end aimed at in our salvation, to which all the steps of it were made subservient, was the glory of God; to this end Christ directly did, in that short prayer, Father, glorify the name, and God declared it was his end in all he did, in the immediate answer given to that prayer, by a voice from heaven; I have glorified it, and I will glorify it yet again, John xii. 28. Now observe here,

1. How God's name had suffered both by the sins and by the miseries of Israel; and this was more to be regretted than all their sorrow, which they had brought upon themselves; for the honour of God lies nearer the hearts of good men than any interests of their own.

1. God's glory had been injured by the sin of Israel when they were in their own land, v. 17. It was a good land, a holy land, a land that had the eye of God upon it. But they defiled it by their own way, their wicked way; that is our own way, the way of our own choice; and we ourselves must bear the blame and shame of it. The sin of a people defiles their land; renders it abominable to God, and uncomfortable to themselves; so that they cannot have any holy communion with him or with one another. What was unpleasant might not be made use of; by the abuse of the gifts of God's bounty to us, we forfeit the use of them; and, the mind and conscience being defiled with guilt, no comfort is allowed us, nothing is pure to us. Their way in the eye of God was like the pollution of a woman during the days of her separation, which shut her out from the sanctuary, and made every thing she touched ceremonially unclean, Lev. xx. 19. Sin is that abominable thing that was in the midst of the earth, he cannot endure to look upon. They shed blood, and worshipped idols, (v. 18.) and with these sins defiled the land. For this, God poured out his fury upon them, scattered them among the heathen; their own land was sick of them, and they were sent into other lands. Herein God was righteous, and was justified in what he did; none could say that he did them any wrong, nor, did justice to his own name, for he judged them according to their way and according to their doings, v. 19. And yet, the matter being not rightly understood, he was not glorified in it; for the enemies did say, as Moses pleaded the Egyptians would say, if he had destroyed them in the wilderness, that for mischief he brought them forth. Their neighbours considered them rather as an unfruitful seed of the earth, and took occasion from the calamities they were in, instead of glorifying God, as they might justly have done, to reproach him, and put contempt upon him; and God's name was continually every day blasphemed by their oppressors, Isa. li. 5.

2. When they entered into the land of the heathen, God had no glory by them; but, on the contrary, his name was profaned, v. 20. (1.) It was profaned by the sins of Israel; they were no credit to their profession wherever they went, but, on the contrary, a reproach to it. The name of God and his holy religion was blasphemed through them, Rom. ii. 24. When these that pretended to be in relation to God, in covenant and communion with him, were found corrupt in their morals, slaves to their appetites and passions, dishonest in their dealings, and false to their words, and the trusts reposed in them, the enemies of the Lord had thereby great occasion given them to blaspheme, especially when they quarrelled with their God for correcting them, than which nothing could be more scandalous. (2.) It was profaned by the sufferings of them, for, by the sufferings of them, one occasion to reproach God, as unable to protect his own worshippers, and to make good his own grants. They said, in scorn, These are the people of the land, these wicked people; yea see he could not keep them in their obedience to his precepts; these miserable people, you see he could not keep them in the enjoyment of his favours. These are the people that came out of Jehovah's land, they are the very scum of the nations. Are these the that had statutes so righteous, whose lives are so unrighteous? Is this the nation that is so much celebrated for a wise and understanding people, and that is said to have God so nigh unto them? Do these belong to that brave, that holy nation, who appear here so vile, so abject? Thus God sold his people, and did increase his wealth by their captivity, Num. xxxvi. The reproach they were under reflected upon him.

11. Let us see how God would retrieve his honour, secure it, and advance it, by working a great reformation upon them, and then working a great salvation for them. He would have scattered them among the heathen, were it not that he feared the wrath of the enemy. For, though they were unworthy of his compassion, yet he had pity for his own holy name, and a thousand pities it was that that should be trampled upon and abused. He looked with compassion on his own honour, which by bleeding among the heathen, on that jewel which was trodden in the dirt, which the house of Israel, even in the land of their captivity, had profaned, v. 21. In pity to that, God brought them out from the heathen, because their sins were so scandalous than they had been in their own land. "Therefore will I gather you out of all countries, and bring you into your own land, v. 24. Not for your sake, because you are worthy of such a favour, for you are most unworthy; but for my holy name's sake, that the name of my great name," v. 23. Observe, by the way, God's holy name is his great name; his holiness is his greatness; so he reckons it himself; nor does any thing make a man truly great but being truly good, and partaking of God's holiness. God will magnify his name as a holy name, for he will sanctify it; will sanctify my name which you have profaned." When God gives that which he has sworn by his holiness, then he sanctifies his name. The effect of this shall be very happy: The heathen shall know that I am the Lord, when I shall be sanctified in you before their eyes and yours. When God proves his own holy name, and his saints praise it, then he is sanctified in them, and this contributes to the propagating of the knowledge of him. Observe, 1. God's reasons of mercy are all fetched from within himself, he will bring his people out of Babylon not for their sakes, but for his own name's sake, because he will be glorified. 2. God's goodness takes occasion from men's badness to appear so much the more illustrious; therefore he will sanctify his name by the pardon of sin, because it has been profaned by the commission of sin. 25. Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. 26. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you: and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. 27. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments, and do them. 28. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God. 29. I will also save you from all your uncleannesses: and I will call for the corn, and will increase it, and lay no famine upon you. 30. And I will multiply the fruit of the tree, and the increase of the field, that ye shall receive no more reproach of famine among the heathen. 31. Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and your doings that were not good, and shall hate yourselves in your own sight for your iniquities, and for your abominations. 32. Not for your sakes do I this, saith the Lord God, be it known unto you: he ashamed and confounded for your own ways, O house of Israel. 33. Thus saith the Lord God; In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities, I will also cause you to dwell in the cities, and the wastes shall be builded. 34. And the desolate land shall be tilled, whereas it lay desolate in the sight of all that passed by. 35. And they shall say, This land that was desolate is become like the garden of Eden; and the waste, and desolate, and ruined cities, are become fenced, and are inhabited. 36. Then the heathen, that are left round about you, shall know that I the Lord build the ruined places, and plant that that was desolate: I the Lord have spoken it, and I will do it 37. Thus saith the Lord God, I will yet for this be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them; I will increase them with men like a flock. 38. As the holy flock, as the flock of Jerusalem in her solenn feasts, so shall the waste cities be filled with flocks of men; and they shall know that I am the Lord. The people of God might be discouraged in their hopes of a restoration, by the sense not only of their unworthiness of such a favour, (which was answered, in the foregoing verses, with this, that God, in doing it, would have an eye to his own glory, not to their worthiness,) but of their unfitness for such a service; being still corrupt and sinful; and that is answered, in these verses, with a promise that God would by his grace prepare and qualify them for the mercy, and then bestow it on them. And this was in part fulfilled in that wonderful effect which the captivity in Babylon had upon the Jews there, that it effectually cured them of their inclination to idolatry. But it is further intended as a drought for the covenant of grace, and a specimen of those spiritual blessings with which we are blessed in heavenly things by that covenant. As, (ch. xxxiv.) after a promise of their return, the prophecy insensibly slid into a promise of the coming of Christ, the great Shepherd, so here it insensibly slides into a promise of the Spirit, and his gracious influences and operations; which we have as much need of for our sanctification as we have of Christ's merit for justification.
versal change. Note, All that have an interest in the new covenant, and a title to the new Jerusalem, have a new heart and a new spirit, and these are necessary in order to their walking in newness of life. This is that divine nature which believers are by the promises made partakers of. (3.) That, instead of a heart of stone, insensible and inflexible, we are to receive any divine impressions, and to return any devout affections, God would give a heart of flesh, a soft and tender heart, that has spiritual senses exercised, conscious to itself of spiritual pains and pleasures, and complying in every thing with the will of God. Note, Renewing grace works as great a change in the soul as the turning of a dead stone into a living thing. (4.) It is promised (v. 1.) that his perpetual inclination to sin, we complain of an inability to do our duty, God will cause them to walk in his statutes, will not only show them the way of his statutes before them, but incline them to walk in it, and thoroughly furnish them with wisdom, and will, and active powers, for every good work. In order to this, he will put his Spirit within them; as a Teacher, Guide, and Sanctifier. Note, God does not force men to walk in his statutes by external violence, but causes them to walk in his statutes by an internal principle. And observe what use we ought to make of this gracious power and principle promised us, and put within us: Ye shall keep my judgments. (5.) If God will do his part according to the promise, we must do ours according to the precepts that are promised: so order your walk and do your duty, as we have an interest in saving grace, you shall engage and quicken our constant care and endeavour to do our duty. God's promises must drive us to his precepts as our rule, and then his precepts must send us back to his promises for strength, for without his grace we can do nothing.

And here promises that he will take them into covenant with himself. The sum of the covenant of grace we have, v. 28. Ye shall be my people, and I will be your God. It is not, "If you will be my people, I will be your God," (though it is very true that we cannot expect to have God to be to us a God, unless we be to him a people;) but he who has chosen us, and loved us first, not we him; therefore the condition is of grace, is by promise, as well as the evidence of it. Thus it is promised, (v. 28.) that they shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers. God will, in bringing them back to it, have an eye not to any merit of theirs, but to the promise made to the fathers; for therefore he gave it them at first, Deut. vii. 7. 8. Therefore he is gracious, because he has selected them, and hath chosen them. (33.) Then they shall enjoy a plenty of all good things; when they are saved from their uncleanness, from their sins which kept good things from them, then will I call for the corn, and will increase it, v. 29. Plenty comes at God's call, and the plenty he calls for shall be still growing; and when he speaks the word, the fruit both of the tree and of the field, shall multiply. As the inhabitants multiply, the productions shall multiply for their maintenance; for he that sends mouths will send meat. Famine was one of the judgments which they had laboured under, and it had been as much as any other a reproach to them, that they should be starved in a land of uncounted abundance. But now I will lay no famine upon you; and none are under that rod, without having it laid on by him. Then they shall receive no more reproach of famine, shall never be again upbraided with that: nor shall it ever be said that God is a Master that keeps his servants to short allowance. Nay, they shall not only be cleared from reproach, but shall be gloried in, shall be a sight of Truth, a sight of the Ridder of the right path; and God shall be praised and magnified, in the midst of his people, for his people to be crowned with, sufficient to balance the contempt they are now loaded with, and in them he will be honoured. This wonderful increase both of the people of the land and of its products is compared (v. 38.) to the large flocks of cattle that are brought to Jerusalem, to be sacrificed at one of the solemn feasts. Even the cities that now have not flocks shall be filled in parts, and not like the flocks with which the pastures are covered over, (Ps. lxxv. 13.) but like the holy flock which is brought to the courts of the Lord's house.

Note, Then the increase of the numbers of a people is honourable and comfortable indeed, when they are all dedicated to God as a holy flock, to be presented to him for living sacrifices. Crowds are a lively sight. (6.) He shows what shall be the happy effects of this blessed change. (1.) It shall have a happy effect upon the people of God themselves, for it shall bring them to an ingenuous repentance for their sins; (v. 31.) Then shall ye remember your own evil ways, and shall loathe yourselves. See here what sin is; it is an abomination, a loathsome thing that abominable thing which the Lord hates. See what is the first step toward repentance; it is remembering our own evil ways, reflecting seriously upon the sins we have committed, and being particular in recapitulating them. We must remember against ourselves not only our gross enormities, our own evil ways, but our defects and infirmities, our doings that were not good, not so good as they were, but that they were not so good as they might have been; this is the first step in the true blessed reformation God would work among them; (v. 33.) "In the day that I shall have cleansed you from all your iniquities, and so shall have made you meet for the inheritance, I will cause you to dwell in the cities, and so put you in possession of the inheritance." This is God's method of mercy indeed, first to part men from their sins, and then to restore them to the enjoyment of their inheritance. (2.) They shall enjoy a plenty of all good things; when they are saved from their uncleanness, from their sins which kept good things from them, then shall I call for the corn, and I will increase it, v. 29. Plenty comes at God's call, and the plenty he calls for shall be still growing; and when he speaks the word, the fruit both of the tree and of the field, shall multiply. As the inhabitants multiply, the productions shall multiply for their maintenance; for he that sends mouths will send meat. Famine was one of the judgments which they had laboured under, and it had been as much as any other a reproach to them, that they should be starved in a land of uncounted abundance. But now I will lay no famine upon you; and none are under that rod, without having it laid on by him. Then they shall receive no more reproach of famine, shall never be again upbraided with that: nor shall it ever be said that God is a Master that keeps his servants to short allowance. Nay, they shall not only be cleared from reproach, but shall be gloried in, shall be a sight of Truth, a sight of the Ridder of the right path; and God shall be praised and magnified, in the midst of his people, for his people to be crowned with, sufficient to balance the contempt they are now loaded with.
God should overcome our badness, and lead us to repentance. The more we see of God's readiness to receive us into favour upon our repentance, the more reason we shall see to be ashamed of ourselves that we could ever sin against so much love. That heart is hard indeed, that will not be thus melted. (2.) It shall have a happy effect upon their neighbours, for God will manifest his clear knowledge of God; (v. 36.) "Then the heathen that are left round about you, that spake ignorantly of God, (for so all those that speak ill of him,) when they saw the land of Israel desolate, shall begin to know better, and to speak more intelligently of God, being convinced that he is able to rebuild the most desolate cities, and to reestablish the most desolate countries; and that those who thought that his favours to his people may be obtained for a time, they shall not be cut off for ever. They shall be made to know the truth of divine revelation, by the exact agreement which they shall discern between God's word which he has spoken to Israel, and his works which he has done for them; The Lord have spoken it, and I will do it. With us, saying and doing are two things, but they are not so with God. God impresses these things upon them, not as the recompense of their merits, but as the return of their prayers. (1.) Let them not think that they have deserved it; Not for your sakes do I this, be it known to you; (v. 22, 32.) no, be you ashamed and confounded for your own ways. God is doing this, all this which he has promised; it is as sure to be done as if it were done for their sakes or the sakes of good deeds, not because God had any need of them, or expected any benefit by them. No, in showing mercy, he acts by prerogative, not for our deserts, but for his own honour. See how emphatically this is expressed; Be it known to you, it is not for your sakes; which intimates that we are apt to entertain a high conceit of our own merits, and are with difficulty persuaded to disclaim a concern for the welfare of others. Then, as a condition of it, God will make all his favourites to know and own that it is his grace, and not their goodness, his mercy, and not their merit, that made them so; and that therefore not unto them, but unto him, is all the glory due. (2.) They must repent of the sin of their own evil ways. They must own that the mercies they receive from God, are not only not merited, but that they are a thousand times forfeited; and therefore they must be so far from boasting of their good works, that they must be ashamed and confounded for their evil ways, and then they are best prepared for mercy. (2.) Yet let them know that they must desire and expect it; (v. 37.) I will set for this be inquired of by the house of Israel. God has spoken, and he will do it; and he will give them a thousand times more than they expected, which requires that his people should seek unto him, and he will incline their hearts to do it, when he is coming toward them in ways of mercy. [1.] They must pray for it, for by prayer God is sought unto, and inquired after. What is the matter of God's promises, must be the matter of our prayers. By asking, by the thing promised we must give glory to the Donor, express a value for the gift, own our dependence, and put honour upon prayer, which God has put honour upon. Christ himself must ask, and then God will give him the heathen for his inheritance; must pray the Father, and then he will send the Comforter; much more must we ask, that we may receive. (2.) They must consult the oracles of God, and thus God is sought unto, and inquired after. The mercy must be, not an act of providence only, but a child of promise; and therefore the promise must be looked at, and prayer made for it with an eye of faith fastened upon the promise, which makes it both the guide and the ground of our expectations. Both these ways we find God inquired of by Daniel, in the name of the house of Israel, then when he was about to do these great things for them; he consulted the oracles of God, for he understood by books, the book of the prophet Jeremiah, both what was to be expected, and when; and then he set his face to seek God by prayer, Dan. ii. 3. 4. No true agreement with God must be kept up by the word and prayer in all the operations of his providence concerning us, and in both he must be inquired of.

CHAP. XXXVII.

The threatening of the destruction of Judah and Jerusalem for their sins, which we had in the former part of this book, and which God has, by his hand, begun to execute, is here begun to be counteracted by the restoration and deliverance for the glory of God, which we have here in the latter part of the book, are as comfortable, and as those were illustrated with many visions and similitudes, for the encouragement of God's people in these, for the encouraging of an humble faith. God had assured them, in the foregoing chapter, that he would gather the house of Israel, even all of it, and would bring them out of their captivity, and return them to their own land; but there were two things that rendered this very unlikely. 1. That they were so dispersed among their enemies, so destitute of all helps and advantages which should have been of use to them, that their recovery was likewise in their own minds; upon all these accounts they are here, in vision, compared to a valley full of the dry bones of dead men; which should be brought together and set in their own place in life. This is the subject of vision, (v. 1. 10.) and the explication of it, with its application to the present case, v. 11. 14. 2. That they were so divided among themselves, too much of the old enmity between Judah and Ephraim remaining even in their captivity. But as to this, by a sign of two sticks made one in the hand of the prophet, is foreshowed the happy coalition that should be, at their return, between the two nations of Israel and Judah, v. 15. 22. In this there was a type of the unifying of Jews and Gentiles, Jews and Samaritans, in Christ and his church. And so the prophet elides into a prediction of the kingdom of Christ, which should be ushered in by the captivity of his people, and their restoration to the land of promise, v. 23. 28.

1. The hand of the Lord was upon me, and carried me out in the Spirit of the Lord, and set me down in the midst of the valley which was full of bones, 2. And caused me to pass by them round about: and, behold, there were very many in the open valley; and, lo, they were very dry. 3. And he said unto me, Son of man, can these bones live? And I answered, O Lord God, thou knowest. 4. Again he said unto me, Prophesy upon these bones, and say unto them, O ye dry bones, hear the word of the Lord. 5. Thus said the Lord God unto these bones, Behold, I will cause breath to enter into you, and ye shall live: 6. And I will lay sinews upon you, and will bring up flesh upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and ye shall live: 7. And ye shall know that I am the Lord. 8. So I prophesied as I was commanded: and as I prophesied there was a noise, and, behold, a shaking, and the bones came together, bone to his bone. 8. And when I beheld, lo, the sinews and the flesh came up upon them, and the skin covered them above: but there was no breath in them. 9. Then said he unto me, Prophesy unto the wind, prophesy, son of man, and say to the wind, Thus saith the Lord God, Come from the four winds, O breath, and breathe upon these slain, that they may live. 10. So I prophesied as he commanded me, and the breath came into them, and they lived, and stood upon their feet, an exceeding great army. 11. Then he said unto me, Son of man, these bones are the whole house of Israel: behold they say, Our bones are dried, and our hope is lost; we are cut off for our parts. 12. Therefore prophesy, and say unto them, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, O my people, I will open your graves, and cause you to come up out of your graves, and bring you into the land of Israel. 13. And ye shall know that I am the Lord, when I have opened your graves, O my people, and brought you up out of your graves. 14. And shall put my Spirit in you, and ye shall live; and I shall place you in your own land: then shall ye know that I the Lord have spoken it, and performed it, saith the Lord.

Here is,

1. The vision of a resurrection from death to life, and it is a glorious resurrection. This is a thing so utterly unknown to nature, and so contrary to its principles, (A privation ad habemum non datur resurrection—From privalgion to possession there is no return,) that we could have no thought of it but by the word of the Lord; and that it is certain by that word, that there shall be a general resurrection of the dead, some have urged from this vision: “For” (say they) “otherwise it would not properly be made a sign for the confirming of their faith in the prophecies of the Lord Jesus, or for the confirming of the coming of the Messiah is mentioned for the confirming of their faith teaching a former deliverance,” Is. vii. 14. But whether it be a confirmation or no, it is, without doubt, a most lively representation of a threefold resurrection, beside that which it is primarily intended to be the sign of. 2. The resurrection of souls from the death of sin by the life of grace, to a new, holy, spiritual, and divine life, by the power of divine grace going along with the word of Christ, John v. 24, 25. 3. The resurrection of the gospel-church, or any part of it, from an afflicted, persecuted state, especially under the yoke of the New Testament Babylon, to liberty and peace. 3. The resurrection of the body at the great day of God, that is, the bodies of believers that shall rise to life eternal. Let us observe the particulars of this vision.

(1.) The deplorable condition of these dead bones; the prophet was made, [1.] To take an exact view of them. By a prophetic impulse and a divine power he was, in vision, carried out and set in the midst of a valley, probably that plain spoken of, ch. iii. 22, where God then talked with him; and it was full of bones, of dead men’s bones; not piled up on a heap, as in a charnel-house, but scattered upon the face of the ground, as if some bloody battle had been fought here, and the slain left unburied till all the flesh was devoured or putrefied, and nothing left but bones, mingled and piled one another and dispersed. He passed by them round about, and he observed not only that they were very many, (for there are multitudes gone to the congregation of the dead,) but that, lo, they were very dry, having been long exposed to the sun and wind. The bones that had been moistened with marrow, (Job xxi. 24,) when they have been any while dead, and left without their flesh, and not covered with dust; the body is now fenced with bones, (Job x. 11,) but then they will themselves be defenceless. The Jews in Babylon were like these dead and dry bones, unlikely ever to come together, to be so much as a skeleton, less likely to be formed into a body, and least of all to be a living body. However, they lay unburied in the open valley, which encouraged the hopes of their resurrection, as of the two witnesses, Rev. xi. 8, 9. The bones of Gog and Magog shall be buried, (ch. xxxix. 12, 15,) for their destruction is final; but the bones of Israel are in the open valley, under the eye of Heaven, for there is hope in their end. [2.] He was made to own their case deplorable, and not to be helped by any power less than that of God himself; (v. 5.) For the keeping of these bones so long dry, likely? Can they devise how it should be done? Can thy philosophy reach to put life into dry bones, or thy policies to restore a captive nation? “No,” says the prophet, “I know not how it should be done, but thou knowetb.” He does not say, “They cannot live,” lest he should seem to limit the Holy One of Israel; but, “Lord, thou knowest whether they can, and whether they shall; if then thou dost put life into them, it is certain that they cannot live.” Note, God is perfectly acquainted with his own power and his own purposes, and will have us to refer all to them, and to see and own that his wondrous works are such as could not be effected by any counsel or power but his own.

(2.) The means used for the bringing of these dispersed bones together, and these dead and dry bones to life. It must be done by prophecy. Ezekiel is ordered to prophesy upon these bones; (v. 4. and again, v. 9,) Prophesy to the wind. So he prophesied as he was commanded, v. 7, 10. [1.] He must preach, and he did so; and the dead bones lived by a power that went along with the word of God which he preached. [2.] He must pray, and he did so; he cried aloud to the Lord, that he might give an answer to prayer; for a spirit of life entered into them. See the efficacy of the word and prayer, and the necessity of both, for the raising of dead souls. God bids his ministers prophesy upon the dry bones; Say unto them, Live; yea, say unto them, Live; and they do as they are commanded, calling to them again and again, O dry bones, live. But we call in vain, still they are dead, still they are very dry; we must therefore be earnest with God in prayer for the working of the Spirit with the word; Come, O breath, and breathe upon them. God’s grace can save souls without our preaching, but our preaching cannot save them without God’s grace, and that grace must be manifested by the ministers of God, and by the faithful and diligently use the means of grace, even with those that there seems little probability of gaining upon. To prophesy upon dry bones seems as great a penance as to water a dry stick; and yet, whether they will hear or forbear, we must discharge our trust, must prophesy as we are commanded, in the name of him who raises the dead, and is the Fountain of life.

(3.) The wonderful effect of these means. Those that do as they are commanded, as they are commiss-sioned, in the face of the greatest discouragements, need not doubt of success, for God will own and enroll as his own with delight, and all that were by.

First, That which he had to say to them was, that God would infallibly raise them to life: Thus saith the Lord God unto these bones, Ye shall live, v. 5. and again, Ye shall live, v. 6. And he that speaks the word, shall thereby do the work; he that says it, shall see it done. Thus the dry bones of Job, and all that were by, will clothe them with skin and flesh, (v. 6.) as he did at first, Job x. 11. He that made us so fearfully and wonderfully, and curiously wrought us, can in like manner new-make us, for his arm is not shortened.

Secondly, That which was immediately done for them was, that they were moulded anew into shape. We may well suppose it was with great liveliness and vigour that the prophet spake, especially when he found what he said began to take effect. Note, The opening, scaling, and applying of the promises, are the ordinary means of our participation of a new and divine nature. As Ezekiel prophesied in this vision, there was a noise, a word of command, from heaven, seconding what he said; or, it signified the motion of the angels that were to be employed in the work of resurrection; and the evidence in the deliverance of the Jews, and we read of the noise of their singing, (Ezek. i. 24.) and the sound of their going, 2 Sam. v. 24. And behold, a shaking, or commotion, among the bones; even dead and dry bones begin to move, when they are called to hear the word of the Lord. This was fulfilled when, upon Cyrus's proclamation of liberty, those whose spirits God had stirred up, began to think of making up that liberty, and getting ready to be gone; when there was a noise, behold, a shaking; when David heard the sound of the going on the tops of the mulberry-trees, then he stirred himself; then there was a shaking. When Paul heard the voice saying, Why persecutest thou me? Behold, a shaking of the dry bones; he trembled and was astonished. But this was not all, The bones came together bone to his bone, under a divine direction; and though there are in man a multitude of bones, yet of all the bones of all these numerous slain not one was missing, not one missed its way, not one missed its place, but, as it were by instinct, each knew and found its fellow; the dispersed bones came together, and the displaced bones were knit together; the divine power supplying that to these dead bones which might have been very necessary in the case.

Thus shall it be in the resurrection of the dead; the scattered atoms shall be arranged and marshalled in their proper place and order, and every bone come to his bone, by the same wisdom and power by which the bones were first formed in the womb of her that is with child. Thus it was in the return of the Jews; they that were scattered in several parts of the province of Babylonia, came to their own land, and were reunited and collected, in consent, to the general rendezvous, in order to their return. By degrees sinews and flesh came upon these bones, and the skin covered them, v. 8. This was fulfilled when the captives got their effects about them, and the men of their place helped them with silver and gold, and whatever they needed for their remove, Ezra iv. 4. But still there was no breath in them, and they were not yet alive, but only animated;

may live. In answer to this request, the breath immediately came into them, v. 16. Note, The spirit of life is from God; 1 Thes. v. 23. and breathing into man the breath of life, and so he will at last in the resurrection. The dispirited, despairing captives were wonderfully animated with resolution to break through all the discouragements that lay in the way of their return, and applied themselves to it with all imaginable vigour. And they stood up upon their feet, an exceeding great army; not only a mighty, but effective, man, fit for service in the wars, and formidable to all that gave them any opposition. Note, With God nothing is impossible. He can out of stones raise up children unto Abraham, and out of dead and dry bones lev up an exceeding great army to fight his battles and plead his cause.

II. The application of this vision to the present calamitous condition of the Jews in captivity. These bones are the whole house of Israel, both the ten tribes and the two, as in what we see in this state, and what they shall be.

1. The depth of despair to which they are now reduced, v. 11. They all give up themselves for lost and gone; they say, Our bones are dried, our strength exhausted, our spirits gone, our hope is cut off. (v. 12.) Oh, let one strong man, but effectual man, rise, and free us from these miseries! For service in the wars, and formidable to all that gives them any opposition. Note, When troubles continue long, hopes have been frustrated, and all creature-confidences fail, it is not strange if the spirits sink; and nothing but an active faith in the power, promise, and providence of God, will keep them from dying away quite.

2. The height of prosperity, to which, notwithstanding this, they shall be advanced. Therefore, because things are come thus to the last extremity, prophesy to them, and tell them, now is God's time to appear for them, Jehovah-jireh, in the midst of the land of the Lord it shall be seen, v. 12.-14. Tell them, (1.) That they shall be brought out of the land of their enemies, where they are as it were buried alive; I will open your graves. These shall be restored, not only whose bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, (Ps. cxli. 7.) but who are buried in the grave; though the power of the enemy is like the bars of the pit, which one would think it impossible to break through, strong as death, and cruel as the grave, yet it shall be conquered; God can bring his people up from the depths of the earth, Ps. lxxvi. 20. (2.) That they shall be brought into their own land, where they shall live in prosperity. I will bring you into the land of Israel, (v. 12.) and place you there, (v. 13.) and will put my Spirit in you, and then ye shall live. Note, Then God puts spirit in us to good purpose, and so that we shall indeed live, when he puts his Spirit in us. And (lastly) in all this God will be glorified; Ye shall know that I am the Lord, (v. 13.) that I have spoken it, and made you to hear it, and all the earth shall know and be ashamed that none among the Chaldeans will quench the dead renews more than any thing to his honour, and to the honour of his word, which he has magnified above all his names; and will magnify more and more by the punctual accomplishment of every tittle of it.

15. The word of the Lord came again unto me, saying, 16. Moreover, thou son of man, take one stick, and write upon it, For Judah, and for the children of Israel his companions: then take another stick, and write upon it, For Joseph, the stick of Ephraim, and for all the house of Israel his companions: 17. And join them one to another into one stick, and they shall become one in thy hand. 18. And when the children of thy people shall speak unto thee, saying, Wilt thou not shew us what thou meanest by these? 19. Say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD, Behold, I will take the stick of Joseph, which is in the hand of Ephraim, and the tribes of Israel his fellows, and will put them with him, even with the stick of Judah, and make them one stick, and they shall be one in my hand. 20. And the sticks whereinon thou wittest shall be in thy hand before their eyes. 21. And say unto them, Thus saith the Lord GOD, Behold, I will take the children of Israel from among the heathen, wherein they be gone, and will gather them on every side, and bring them into their own land: 22. And I will make them one nation in the land upon the mountains of Israel; and one king shall be king to them all: and they shall be no more two nations, neither shall they be divided into two kingdoms any more at all: 23. Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, nor with their detestable things, nor with any of their transgressions: but I will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned, and will cleanse them: so shall they be my people, and I will be their God. 24. And David my servant shall be king over them: and they all shall have one shepherd: they shall also walk in my judgments, and observe my statutes, and do them. 25. And they shall dwell in the land that I have given unto Jacob my servant, wherein your fathers have dwelt; and they shall dwell therein, even they and their children, and their children's children, for ever; and my servant David shall be their prince for ever. 26. Moreover, I will make a covenant of peace with them; it shall be an everlasting covenant with them: and I will place them, and multiply them, and set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore. 27. My tabernacle also shall be with them: yea, I will be their God, and they shall be my people. 28. And the heathen shall know that I the Lord do sanctify Israel, when my sanctuary shall be in the midst of them for evermore.

Here are more exceeding great and precious promises made of the happy state of the Jews after their return to their own land; but they have a further reference to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the glories of gospel-times.

1. It is here promised, that Ephraim and Judah shall be happily united in brotherly love and mutual services; so that, whereas, even since the desertion of the ten tribes from the house of David under Jeroboam, there had been continual feuds and animosities between the two kingdoms of Israel and Judah, and it is to be feared, there had been some clashings between them even in the land of their captivity, (Ephraim upon all occasions envying Judah, and Judah vexing Ephraim,) now it should be no longer, but there should be a coalition between them, and, notwithstanding the old differences that had been between them, they should agree to love one another, and to do one another all good offices. This is here illustrated by a sign; the prophet was to take two sticks, and write upon one, For Judah, and upon the other, For Joseph, including Benjamin; these of the children of Israel that were his companions; upon the other, For Joseph, including the rest of the tribes, v. 16. These two sticks must be so framed as to fall into one in his hand, v. 17. The people took notice of this, and desired him to tell them the meaning of it, for they knew he did not play with sticks for his diversion, as other men did. The meaning, should ask the meaning, of the word of God, which they read and hear, and of the instituted signs by which spiritual and divine things are represented to us; the minister's lips should keep the knowledge hereof, and the people should ask it at their mouth, Mal. ii. 7. It is a necessary question for grown people, as well as children, to ask, What mean ye by this service, by this sign? Ezek. xii. 18. The meaning was, that Judah and Israel should be come one in the hand of God, v. 19. (1.) They shall be one; one nation, v. 22. They shall have no separate interests, and, consequently, no divided affections. There shall be no mutual jealousies and animosities, no remembrance, no remains, of their former discord. But there shall be a perfect harmony between them; a good understanding one of another, a good disposition one to another, and a readiness to all good offices and services for one another's credit and comfort. They had been two sticks crossing and thwattering one another, nay, beating and bruising one another; but now they shall become one, supporting and strengthening one another. (2.) It is a propheciedy more efficient. Behold, how good and how pleasant a thing it is to see Judah and Israel, that had long been at variance, now dwelling together in unity. Then they shall become acceptable to their God, amiable to their friends, and formidable to their enemies, Isa. xl. 13, 14. (2.) They shall be one in God's hand: by his power they shall be united, and being by his hand, and the power of that hand, they shall be had together, so that they shall not fly off, to be separated again. They shall be one in his hand, for his glory shall be the centre of their unity, and his grace the cement of it. In him, in a regard to him, and in his service and worship, they shall unite, and so shall become one. Both sides shall agree to put themselves into his hand, and so they shall be one. Qui conveniunt in alippe tertii, inter se conveniunt—Those who agree in a third, agree with each other. Note, Those are best united, that are one in God's hand; whose union with each other results from their union with Christ, and their communion with God through him, Eph. i. x. One in us, John xvii. 21. (3.) They shall be one in their return out of captivity; v. 21. I will take them from among the heathen, and gather them on every side, and bring them together incorporated into one body to their own land. They shall be one in their separation from the heathen with whom they had mingled themselves: they shall both agree to part from them, and take their affections off from them, and no longer to comply with their usages, and then they will soon agree to part together in walking according to the rule of God's word. Their having been joint sufferers will contribute to this blessed comprehension, when they begin to come to themselves, and to consider things. Put many pieces of metal together into the furnace, and when they are melted, they will run all together. Likewise their being joint sharers in the favour of God, and the great and common deliverness wrought out for them all, should help to unite them. God's loving them all was a good reason why they should love one another. Times of common joy, as well as times of common suffering, should be healing, loving times. (4.) They shall all be the subjects of one God, shall come under one covenant. The Jews, after their return, were under one government, and not divided as formerly. But this certainly looks further, to the kingdom of Christ; he is that One King, in allegiance to whom all God's spiritual Israel shall cheerfully unite, and under whose protection they shall all be gathered. All believers unite in one Lord, one faith, and one baptism. And the unification of Christ's church (as they are called) by their becoming one fold under Christ the one great Shepherd, is doubtless the union that is chiefly looked at in this prophecy. By Christ the partition-wall between them was taken down, and the enmity slain, and of them \\

2. It is here promised that the Jews shall by their captivity be cured of their inclination to idolatry; this shall be the happy fruit of that affliction, even away taking of their sin; (v. 23.) Neither shall they defile themselves any more with their idols, those detestable, defiling things, no, nor with any of their former transgressions. Note, When one sin is sincerely parted with, all sin is abandoned too, for he that hates sin, as sin, will hate all sin. And those that have had a habit of continuing in idolatry, it is impossible for them to continue in the same, to make the same approaches to the world and the flesh, that no longer make a god of their money, or their belly, have a happy blow given to the root of all their transgressions. Two ways God will take to cure them of their idolatry; (1.) By bringing them out of the way of temptation to it; “I will save them out of all their dwelling-places wherein they have sinned, but where they met with idolatry, from their own allurements to it.” Note, It is our wisdom to avoid the places where we have been overcome by temptations to sin, not to remain in them, or return to them, but to save ourselves out of them, as we would out of infected places; See Zech. ii. 7. Rev. xviii. 4. And it is a great mercy when God, in his providence, saves us out of the dwelling-places where we have tempted him, keeps us from harm, by keeping us out of harm’s way in answer to his word, “Lead us not into temptation,” but deliver us from evil. (2.) By changing the disposition of their mind; “I will cleanse them;” (v. 28.) I will sanctify them, will work in them an aversion to the pollutions of sin, and a complacency in the pleasures of holiness; and then you may be sure they will not defile themselves any more with their idols.” Whom God has cleansed he will keep clean.

3. It is here promised that they shall be the people of God, as their God, and the subjects and sheers of Christ their King and Shepherd. These promises we had before, and they are here repeated, (v. 25, 24.) for the encouragement of the faith of Israel; They shall be my people, to serve me, and I will be their God, to save them, and to make them happy. David, my servant, shall be king over them, to hight their battles, to protect them from injury, and to rule them, and overrule all things that concern them for their good. He shall be their Shepherd, to guide, and provide for them; Christ is David, Israel’s King of old; and those whom he subdues to himself, and makes willing in the day of his power, he makes to be his in all his covenants, and to keep his statutes. 4. It is here promised that they shall dwell comfortably, v. 25, 26. They shall dwell in the land of Israel; for where else should Israelites dwell? And many things will concur to make their dwelling agreeable. (1.) They shall have it by covenant; they shall come in again upon their old title of the grant made unto Jacob, God’s servant. As Christ was David, God’s servant, so the church is Jacob, his servant too; and the members of the church shall come in for a share, as born in God’s house. He will make a covenant of peace with them, (v. 26.) and, in pursuance of that covenant, he will make to them a covenant of Good-kingdom. Temporal mercies are then doubly sweet, when they are the promise of the covenant, and not merely from common providence. (2.) They shall come to it by prescription; “It is the land wherein your fathers have dwelt, and for that reason you cannot but have a special kindness for it, which God will graciously grant.” It was the inheritance of their ancestors, and therefore the portion of all posterity, and of those who are their fathers’ sons. (3.) They shall have it entailed upon them and the heirs of their body, and shall have their families built up, so that it shall not be lost for want of heirs. They shall dwell therein all their time, and never be turned out of possession, and they shall leave it for an inheritance to their children, and their children’s children for ever, who shall enjoy it when they are gone, the prospect of which will be a satisfaction to them. (4.) This shall be under a good government, which will contribute very much to the comfort of their lives; My servant David shall be their Prince for ever. This can be no other than Christ, of whom it was said, when he was brought into the world, He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever, Luke i. 33. Note, It is the overreigning Prince, after all God’s faithful promises, that as his kingdom is everlasting, so he is an everlasting King; he lives to reign for ever and ever, and as sure and as long as he lives and reigns, they shall live and reign also. (5.) The charter by which they hold all their privileges, is indefeasible. God’s covenant with them shall be an everlasting covenant; so the covenant of grace is, for it secures to us an everlasting habitation. They have a heaven to live in, and a heaven of God to come from, when that heaven is their church.

5. It is here promised that God will dwell among them; and this will make them dwell comfortably indeed; I will set my sanctuary in the midst of them for evermore; my tabernacle also shall be with them, v. 26, 27. (1.) They shall have the tokens of God’s special presence with them, and his gracious residence among them. God will in very deed dwell with them upon the earth, for where his sanctuary is, he is, and there is God. They shall be God’s sanctuary, and he took it from them, (Isa. lv. 11.) but now that they are purified, God will dwell with them again. (2.) They shall have opportunity of conversing with God, of hearing from him, speaking to him, and keeping up communion with him, which will be the comfort of their lives. (3.) They shall have the means of grace. By the oracles of God in his tabernacle they shall be made wiser and better, and all their children shall be taught of the Lord. (4.) Thus their covenant-relation to God shall be improved, and the bond of it strengthened; “I will be their God, and they shall be my people, and they shall know it by having my sanctuary among them, and shall have the comfort of it.”

6. Both God and Israel shall have the honour of this among the heathen, v. 26. Now the heathen observe how Israel had profaned their own crown by their sins, and God has profaned it by his judgments; but when Israel is reformed, and God is returned in mercy to them, the very heathen shall be made to know that the Lord sanctifies Israel, has a title to them, and an interest in them, more than other people, because his sanctuary is, and shall be, in the midst of them. Note, God designates the sanctification of these among whom he sets up his sanctuary. And blessed and holy are they who, enjoying the privileges of the sanctuary, give such proofs and evidences of their sanctification, that the heathen may know it is no less than the almighty
This chapter, and that which follows it, are concerning Gog and Magog, a powerful enemy to the people of Israel, that should make a formidable descent upon them, and put them into a consternation; but their army should be routed, and their design defeated; and this prophecy, it is most probable, had its accomplishment some time after the return of the people of Israel out of their captivity, as the scriptures tell us, the vessels that had fled with the king of Syria, especially Antiochus Epiphanes, or perhaps in some other way not recorded, we cannot tell. If the sacred history of the Old Testament had reached as far as the prophecy, we should have been better able to understand these chapters, but, for want of that key, we are locked out of the meaning of them. God had by the prophet assured his people of happy times after their return to their own land; but lest they should mistake the promises which related to the kingdom of the Messiah, and the spiritual privileges of that kingdom, as if from them they might promise themselves an uninterrupted prosperity, he here tells them, as Christ told his disciples, to prevent the like mistake, that in the world they should have tribulation, but they may be of good cheer, for they shall be victorious at last. This prophecy here of Gog and Magog without doubt, alluded to in that prophecy which relates to the latter days, and which seems to be yet unfulfilled, Rev. xx. 8. That Gog and Magog shall be gathered to battle against the church, as the Old Testament prophecies of the destruction of Babylon are alluded to, Rev. xvi. But in both, the Old Testament prophecies had their accomplishment in the Jewish church, as the New Testament prophecy, or rather the latter part of it, which comes to the Christian church. In this chapter, we have intermixed, I. The attempt that Gog and Magog shall make upon the lands of Israel, the vast army they should bring into the field, and their vast preparations. Their project and design in it, v. 6-13. God's hand in it, v. 14. II. The great terror that this should strike upon the land of Israel, v. 15, 16, 18, 19. III. The divine restraint that these enemies should be under, v. 20. And again, v. 14. IV. The defeat that should be given to these enemies by the immediate hand of God, v. 21-23. which shall be more of in the next chapter.

1. AND the word of the Lord came unto me, saying, 2. Son of man, set thy face against Gog, the land of Magog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal, and prophesy against him. 3. And say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal: 4. And I will turn thee back, and put hooks into thy jaws, and I will bring thee forth, and all thine army, horses and horsemen, all of them clothed with all sorts of armour, even a great company with bucklers and shields, all of them handling swords. 5. Persia, Ethiopia, and Libya with them; all of them with shield and helmet: 6. Gomer, and all his bands; the house of Togarmah of the north quarters, and all his bands; and many people with thee. 7. Be thou prepared, and prepare for thyself, thou, and all thy company that are assembled unto thee, and be thou a guard unto them. 8. After many days thou shalt be visited: in the latter years thou shalt come into the land that is brought back from the sword, and is gathered out of many people, against the mountains of Israel, which have been always waste: but it is brought forth out of the nations, and they shall dwell safely all of them. 9. Thou shalt ascend and come like a storm, thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, thou and all thy bands, and many people with thee. 10. Thus saith the Lord God, It shall also come to pass, that at the same time shall things come into thy mind, and thou shalt think an evil thought: 11. And thou shalt say, I will go up to the land of unwalled villages; I will go to them that are at rest, that dwell safely, all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bars nor gates, 12. To take a spoil, and to take a prey; to turn thy hand upon the desolate places that are now inhabited, and upon the people that are gathered out of the nations, which have gotten cattle and goods, that dwell in the midst of the land. 13. Sheba, and Dedan, and the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof, shall say unto thee, Art thou come to take a spoil? hast thou gathered thy company to take a prey? to carry away silver and gold, to take away cattle and goods, to take a great spoil.

The critical expositors have enough to do here to inquire out Gog and Magog: we cannot pretend either to add to their observations, or to determine their controversies; Gog seems to be the king, and Magog the kingdom: so that Gog and Magog are like Pharaoh and the Egyptians. Some think they find them afar off, in Scythia, Tartary, and Russia. Others think they find them nearer the land of Israel, in Syria, and Asia the less. Ezekiel is appointed to prophesy against Gog, and to tell him that God is against him, even as Needom is against the others that are now the enemies of his church, and set himself against them, but he foresees these that will be so, and lets them know by his word that he is against them too, and yet is pleased to make use of them to serve his own purposes, for the glory of his own name; surely their wrath shall praise him, and the remainder thereof he will restrain, Ps. cxlv. 9. Let us observe, 1. The confusion which God designed to put this enemy to; it is remarkable, that this is put first in the prophecy; before it is foretold that God will bring him forth against Israel, it is foretold that God will put hooks into his jaws, and turn him back, (v. 4.) that they might have assurance of their deliverance before they had the prospect given them of their danger. Thus he designs God is the comfort of his people, thus careful that they may not be frightened; even before the trouble begins, he tells them it will end well. 2. The undertaking which he designed to engage him in, in order to this defeat and disappointment. 1. The nations that shall be confederate in this enterprise against Israel, are many, and great, and mighty; Gog, and Persia, Ethiopia, &c. Antiochus had an army made up of all the nations here named, and many others. These people had been at variance with one another, and yet in combination against Israel. How are they increased that trouble God's people!
2. They are well furnished with arms and ammunition, and bring a good train of artillery into the field; horses and horsemen, (v. 4.) bravely equipped with all sorts of armour, bucklers and shields
for defence, and all handling swords for offence.
Orders are given to their leaders, to go and attack
this expedition; (v. 7.) "Be thou prepared, and do thou prepare. See what warlike preparations thou hast already in store, and, lest that should not suffice, make further preparation, thou and all thy company." Let Gog himself be a guard to the rest of the confederates. As commander in chief,
let him engage to take care of them and their safety;
let him pass his word for their security, and take their lives upon his heart; the leaders of an army, instead of exposing their soldiers needlessly and presumptuously, and throwing away their lives upon desperate undertakings, should study to be a guard to them, and, whenever they send them forth in danger, should contrive to support and cover them. This call to prepare seems to be ironical; Do thy worst, but I will turn thee back; like the Jews, (v. 9.) Gird yourselves, and ye shall be broken in pieces.
3. Their design is against the mountains of Israel,
(v. 8.) against the land that is brought back from the sword. It is not long since it was harassed with the sword of war, and it has been always wasted, more or less, with one judgment or other; it is but newly gathered out of many people, and brought forth out of the nations; it has enjoyed comfort only for a short while-time, has not recovered any strength since it was brought down by war and captivity; and therefore its neighbours need not fear its being too great, nay, and therefore it is very barbarous to pick a quarrel with it so soon.
It is a people that dwell safely, all of them, in unvalled villages, very secure, and having neither bars nor gates, v. 11. It is a certain sign that they intend no mischief to their neighbours, for they fear no mischief from them. It cannot be thought that they will offend others, who do not take care to defend themselves; and it aggravates the sin of these invaders. It is base and barbarous to devise evil against thy neighbour, while he dwells securely by thee, and has no distrust of thee, Prov. iii. 29. But see here how the clouds return after the rain in this world, and what little reason we have ever to be secure of the integrity of the children of Israel. Israel was brought back from the sword of one eneymy, and beheld, the sword of another is drawn against it; former troubles will not excuse us from further troubles; but when we think we have put off the harness, at least for some time, by a fresh and sudden alarm we may be called to gird it on again; and therefore we must never boast, or be off
our guard.
4. That which the enemy has in view, in forming his project, is, to enrich himself, and to make himself master, not of the country, but of the wealth of it, to spoil and plunder it, and make a prey of it; At the same time that God intends to bring this matter about, things shall come into the mind of this enemy, and he shall think an evil towards thee, v. 10. Note, All the mischief we do, and particularly the mischief we do to the church of God, arises from evil thoughts that come into their mind; ambitious thoughts, covetous thoughts, slyful thoughts to those that are good, for the sake of their goodness. It came into Antiochus's mind what a singular people these religious Jews were,
and how their worship witnessed against and condemned the idolatries of their neighbours, and therefore, in enmity to their religion, he would plague them. It came into his mind what a wealthy people they were, that they had gotten cattle and goods in the midst of the land, (v. 12.) and withal
how weak they were, and how unable to make any resistance, and how easy it would be to carry off
what they had, and how much glory this rapin
would add to his victorious sword; these things coming into his mind, and one evil thought drawing another, (v. 11, 12.) "I will go up to the land of uninvalled villages; yea, that I will, it will cost me nothing to make them all my own; I will go, and disturb them that are at rest, without giving them any notice; not to crush
their growing greatness, or chastise their insolence, or make reprisals upon them for any wrong they have done us; (they had none of these pretences to make them, for they were; but purely to take a prey, and to take a prey," (v. 12.) in open defiance to all the laws of justice and equity, as much as the high-wayman's killing the traveller, that he may take his money. These were the thoughts that came into the mind of this wicked prince, and God knew them; nay, he knew them before they came into his mind, for he understands our thoughts afar off,
Ps. cxvii. 2.
5. According to the project thus formed, he pours in all his forces upon the land of Israel; and finds
those that are ready to come in to his assistance, with the same prospects; (v. 9.) "Thou shalt ascend, and come like a storm, with all the force and fury and fierceness imaginable, and thou shalt be like a cloud to cover the land, to darken it, and to threaten it. Thou, and not only all thy bands, all thy horsemen, but the force thou must bring into the land, but many people with thee," (such as are spoken of, v. 15.) "Sheba and Dedan, the Arabians and Edomites,
and the merchants of Tarshish, of Tyre and Sidon,
and other maritime cities, they and their young lions that are greedy of spoil and live upon it, they shall say, Art thou come to take the spoil of this land?" Yes, he is. And therefore they wish him success; or perhaps they envy him, or grudge it
him. "Art thou come for riches, who art thyself such rich already?" Or, knowing that God was on Israel's side, they thus ridicule his attempts, foreseeing that they would be baffled, and that he would be disappointed of the prey he promised himself.
Or, if he be come to take the prey, they will come, and join with him, and add to his forces.
When Lycurgus, who was general of Antiochus's army, came, they bid the neighboring nations joined with him, (1 Mac. iii. 41.) to share in the guilt, in hopes to share in the prey. When thou sewst a thief, then thou consentedst with him.

14. Therefore, son of man, prophesy and say unto Gog, Thus saith the Lord God, In that day when my people of Israel dwelleth safely, shalt thou not know it? 15. And thou shalt come from thy place out of the north parts, thou, and many people with thee, all of them riding upon horses, a great company, and a mighty army: 16. And thou shalt come up against my people of Israel as a cloud to cover the land; it shall be in the latter days, and I will bring thee against my land, that the heathen may know me, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, before their eyes. 17. Thus saith the Lord God, Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time by my servants the prophets of Israel, which prophesied in those days many years, that I would bring thee against them? 18. And it shall come to pass at the same time, when Gog shall come against the land of Israel, saith the Lord God, that my fury shall come up in my face. 19. For in my jealousy, and in the fire of my wrath, have I spoken. Surely in that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel; 20. So that the fishes of the sea, and the fowls of the heaven, and the beasts of the field, and all creeping things that creep upon the earth, and all the men that are upon the face of the earth, shall shake at my presence; and the mountains shall be thrown down, and the steep places shall fall, and every wall shall fall to the ground. 21. And I will call for a sword against him throughout all my mountains, saith the Lord God: every man's sword shall be against his brother. 22. And I will plead against him with pestilence and with blood; and I will rain upon him, and upon his bands, and upon the many people that are with him, an overflowing rain, and great hailstones, fire and brimstone. 23. Thus will I magnify myself, and sanctify myself; and I will be known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

The latter part of the chapter is a repetition of the former; the dream is doubled, for the thing is certain, and to be very carefully regarded. 1. It is here again foretold that this seditious enemy should make a formidable descent upon the land of Israel; (ver. 15.) Thou shalt come out of the north parts (Syria lay on the north of Canaan) with a mighty army, shalt come like a cloud, and cover the land of my people Israel, v. 16. These words, (ver. 14.) When my people Israel dwell safely, shalt thou not know it? may be taken two ways; either, 1. As speaking of the people of Israel, and to this they answer, Thou shalt have intelligence between thee and thy heart, securely, and therefore how carelessly, the people of Israel dwell, which shall give rise to thy project against them; for when thou knowest not only what a rich, but what an easy prey they are likely to be, thou wilt soon determine to fall upon them. 2. Note, God's providence is to be acknowledged in the occasional, the small occasion, perhaps, that is given, and that not designately wither, to those first thoughts from which great enterprises take their original. God, to bring about his own purposes, lets men know that which yet he knows they will make bad use of; as here. Or, 2. As speaking his disappointment in this attempt; which here, as before, the prophecy begins with; When my people Israel dwell safely, not in their own appreension only, but in reality, forasmuch as they dwell safely under the divine protection, shalt thou not be made to know it by the fruitfulness of thine endeavours to destroy them? Thou shalt soon find that there is no enchantment against Jacob, that no weapon formed against them shall prosper; thou shalt know thy cost, shalt know to thy shame, that though they have no want of arms to smite thee, they have God himself, a Wall of fire, round about him, and that he who touches them, touches the apple of his eye; whatsoever meddles with them, meddles to his own hurt. And it is for the demonstrating of this to all the world that God will bring this mighty enemy against his people. They that gathered themselves against Israel, said, Let us take the spoil, and take the prey, but they knew not the thoughts of the Lord, Mic. iv. 11, 12. I will bring thee against my land; This is strange news, that God will not only permit his enemies to come against his own children, but will himself bring them upon them. Therefore, when we shall be well reconciled even to this, it is, that the heathen may know me to be the only living and true God, when I shall be sanctified in thee, O Gog, in thy defeat and destruction before their eyes; that all the nations may see, and say, There is none like unto the God of Jeshurun, that rides on the heavens, for the help of his people. Note, God therefore brings his people into danger and calamity, that he may have the honour of bringing about their deliverance; and therefore suffers the enemies of his church to prevail awhile, though they profane his name by their sin, that he may have the honour of prevailing at last, and sanctifying his own name in their ruin. Now it is said, This shall be in the latter days, in the latter days of the Old Testament church; so the rashishness of the nation of Israel, was; but in the latter days of the New Testament church, another like enemy should arise, that should in like manner be defeated. Note, Effectual securities are treasured up in the word of God against the troubles and dangers the church may be brought into a great while hence, even in the latter days.

II. Reference is here had to the predictions of Jeremiah respecting this event, (Jer. xxxvii.) Art thou he of whom I have spoken in old time, of whom messias spake in his prophecy of the latter days? (Deut. xxxiii. 43.) He will render vengeance to his adversaries; and David, (Ps. ix. 15.) The heathen are sunk down into the pit that they made; and often elsewhere in the Psalms. This is the leviation of whom Isaiah spake, (Isa. xxvii. 1.) that congress of the nations of which Joel spake, Joel iii. 1. Many of the prophets had perhaps spoken particularly of this event, though it be not written; as they all had spoken, and written too, that which is applicable to it. Note, There is an amiable, admirable harmony and agreement between the Lord's prophets, though they lived in several ages, for they were all guided by one and the same Spirit. As, it is said, that this furious, formidable enemy should be utterly cut off in this attempt upon Israel, and that it should issue in his own ruin. This is supposed by many to have its accomplishment in the many defeats given by the Macedeans to the forces of Antiochus, and the remarkable judgments of God executed upon his own person, for he died of sore diseases. But these things are here foretold as usual, in figurative expressions, which we are not to look for the literal accomplishment of, and yet they might be fulfilled nearer the letter than we know of.

1. God will be highly displeased with this bold invader; When he comes up in pride and anger against the land of Israel, and thinks to carry all before him with a high hand, then God's fury shall come up in his face; which is an allusion to the manner of men who look for the literal accomplishment of what some high affront is offered them, and they are resolved to show their resentments of it, v. 18. God will speak against them in his jealousy for his people, and in the fire of his wrath against his and their enemies, v. 19. See how God's permitting sin, his laying occasions of sin before men, and his using them to serve his own purposes, consist with his hatred of sin, and his rendering it by punishment for it. God brings this enemy against his land, letting him know what an easy prey it might be, and determining thereby to glorify himself; and yet, when

of the vastness of that destruction, in three consequences of it: the burning of their weapons, (v. 8. 10.) the burying of their slain, (v. 11. 16.) and the feasting of the fowls with the dead bodies of those that were unhumbled, (v. 17. 22.)

1. A declaration of God's gracious purposes concerning his people Israel, in this and his other providences concerning them, and a promise of further mercy that he had yet in store for them, (v. 23. 29.)

THEREFORE, thou son of man, prophesy against Gog, and say, Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Gog, the chief prince of Meshech and Tubal; 2. And I will turn thee back, and leave but the sixth part of thee, and will cause thee to come up from the north parts, and will bring thee upon the mountains of Israel: 3. And I will smite thy bow out of thy left hand, and will cause thine arrows to fall out of thy right hand.

4. Thou shalt fall upon the mountains of Israel, thou, and all thy bands, and the people that is with thee: I will give thee unto the ravenous birds of every sort, and to the beasts of the field, to be devoured. 5. Thou shalt fall upon the open field; for I have spoken it, saith the Lord God. 6. And I will send a fire on Magog, and among them that dwell carelessly in the isles; and they shall know that I am the Lord.

7. So will I make my holy name known in the midst of my people Israel; and I will not let them pollute my holy name any more; and the heathen shall know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel.
be able to maintain, and upon the open field he shall not find a road that he shall be able to make his escape by. He, and his bands, his regular troops, and the people that are with him, that follow the camp to share in the plunder, these shall all fall with him. Note, Those that cast in their lot among wicked people, (Prov. 1. 14.) that they may have one purse with them, must expect to lose it all with them, and fare as they fare, taking the worse with the better. There shall be such a general slaughter made, that but a sixth part shall be left, (v. 2.) the other five shall all be cut off. Never was army so totally routed as this. And, for its greater infinity and reach, their bodies shall be a feast to the birds of prey, v. 4. Compare v. 17. Thou shalt fall, for I have spoken it. Note, Neither shall be the most illustrious princes, (Antiochus was called Elyphanes, the illustrious,) and the most numerous armies, fall to the ground, than any word of God; for he that has spoken, will make it good.

3. His country also shall be made desolate; I will send a fire on Magog, (v. 6.) and among them that dwell carelessly, or confidently, in the isles, the nations of the Gentiles. He designed to destroy the land, but shall not, but shall be defeated in that design, but shall have his own destroyed by some fire, some consuming judgment or other. Note, Those who invade other people's rights, justly lose their own.

4. God will by all this advance the honour of his own name. (1.) Among his people Israel; they shall hereby know more of God's name, of his power and goodness, his care of them, his faithfulness to them; his providence concerning them, and they shall have a better acquaintance with him; every providence should do so, as well as every ordinance; I will make my holy name known in the midst of my people. In Judah is God known; but those that know much of God, should know more of him; we should especially increase in the knowledge of his name as a holy name. Know him as a God of perfect purity and rectitude, and that hates all sin. And then it follows, I will not let them pollute my holy name any more. Note, Those that rightly know God's holy name, will not dare to profane it; for it is through ignorance of it that men make light of it; and make bold with it. And this is God's method of dealing with men; first, to enlighten their understandings, and by that means to influence the whole manner of men to know his holy name, and so keeps us from polluting it, and engages us to honour it. And this is here the blessed effect of God's glorious appearances on the behalf of his people. Thus he completes his favours, thus he sanctifies them, thus he makes them blessings indeed; by them he instructs his people, and reforms them. When the Almighty scattered kings for her, she was white as snow in Salomon, Ps. lxviii. 14. (2.) Among the heathen; those that never knew it, or would not own it, shall know that I am the Lord, the Holy One in Israel. They shall be made to know by dear-bought experience, that he is a God of power, and his people's God and Saviour; and it is in vain for the greatest potentates to contend with him; none ever hardened their heart against him, and prospered.

8. Behold, it is come, and it is done, saith the Lord Gon; this is the day whereof I have spoken. 9. And they that dwell in the cities of Israel shall go forth, and shall set on fire and burn the weapons, both the shields and the bucklers, the bows and the arrows, and the hand-staves, and the spears, and they shall burn them with fire seven years. 10. So that they shall take no wood out of the field, neither cut down any out of the forests; for they shall burn the weapons with fire; and they shall spoil those that spoiled them, and rob those that robbed them, saith the Lord Gon. 11. And it shall come to pass in that day, that I will give unto Gog a place there of graves in Israel, the valley of the passengers on the east of the sea, and it shall stop the noses of the passengers: and there shall they bury Gog, and all his multitude; and they shall call it, The valley of Hamon-gog. 12. And seven months shall the house of Israel be burying of them, that they may cleanse the land. 13. Yea, all the people of the land shall bury them; and it shall be to them a renown, the day that I shall be glorified, saith the Lord Gon. 14. And they shall sever out men of continual employment, passing through the land, to bury with the passengers those that remain upon the face of the earth, to cleanse it; after the end of seven months shall they search. 15. And the passengers that pass through the land, when any seeth a man's bone, then shall he set up a sign by it, till the burners have buried it in the valley of Hamon-gog. 16. And also the name of the city shall be Hamonah. Thus shall they cleanse the land. 17. And thou, son of man, thus saith the Lord Gon, Speak unto every feathered fowl, and to every beast of the field, Assemble yourselves, and come; gather yourselves on every side to my sacrifice that I do sacrifice for you, even a great sacrifice upon the mountains of Israel, that ye may eat flesh, and drink blood. 18. Ye shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth, of rams, of lambs, and of a goats, of bullocks, all of them fatlings of Bashan. 19. And ye shall eat fat till ye be full, and drink blood till ye be drunken, of my sacrifice which I have sacrificed for you. 20. Thus ye shall be filled at my table with horses and chariots, with mighty men, and with all men of war, saith the Lord Gon. 21. And I will set my glory among the heathen, and all the heathen shall see my judgment that I have executed, and my hand that I have laid upon them. 22. So the house of Israel shall know that I am the Lord their God from that day and forward. Though this prophecy was to have its accomplishment in the latter days, yet it is here spoken of as if it were already accomplished, because it is certain; (v. 8.) * Behold, it is come, and it is done; it is as sure to be done, when the time is come, as if it were done already; this is the day whereof I have long and often spoken, and though it has been long in coming, yet at length it is come." Thus it was said unto John, (Rev. xxxi. 6). It is done.

To represent the routing of the army of Gog as very great, here are three things specified as the consequences of it. It was God himself that gave them the defeat; we do not find that the people of Israel drew a sword, or struck a stroke: but,

I. They shall burn their weapons; their swords, and their arrows, (v. 3.) their shields and bucklers, their javelins, spears, leading-staves, truncheons and half-plies, every thing that is combustible. They shall not lay them up in their armories, or reserve them for their own use, lest they should be tempted to put a confidence in them, but they shall burn them; not all at once, for a bonfire, (to what purpose would that be?) but, as the fire had once, so to use them for fuel in their houses, instead of other fire-wood, so that they should have no occasion to take wood out of the field or forests, for seven years together; (v. 10.) such vast quantities of weapons shall there be left upon the open field, where the enemy fell, and in the roads, which they passed in their flight. The weapons were dry, and fitter for fuel than green wood; and by saving the wood in their coppices and forests, they could grow. Though the mountains of Israel produce plenty of all good things, yet it becomes the people of Israel to be good husbands of their plenty, and to save what they can for the benefit of those that come after them, as Providence shall give them opportunity to do so. We may suppose that when they who dwelt in the cities of Israel came forth to spoil those who spoiled them, and made reprisals upon them, they found not iron, silver, and gold, and ornaments; yet no mention is made of any thing particularly that they converted to their own use, but the wood of the weapons for fuel, which is one of the necessaries of human life; to teach us to think it enough if we be well supplied with those, though we have but little of the delights and gaieties of it, and of those things which we may very well live without. And, even then, they put fuel to the fire, and warmed themselves at it, they would be put in mind of the number and strength of their enemies, and the imminent peril they were in of falling into their hands, which would help to enlarge their hearts in thankfulness to that God who had so wonderfully, so seasonably, delivered them. As they sat by the fire with their children about them, (their fire-side,) they might from it take occasion to tell them what great things God had done for them.

II. They shall bury their dead. Usually, after a battle, when many are slain, the enemy desire time to bury their own dead. But here the slaughter shall be so general, that there shall not be a sufficient number of the enemies left alive to bury the dead; and besides, the slain lie so dispersed on the mountains of Israel, that it would take a work of time to find them out. It is left to the house of Israel to bury them as a piece of triumph in their overthrow.

1. A place shall be appointed on purpose for the burying them, the valley of the passengers, on the east of the sea, either the salt sea, or the sea of Tiberias, a valley through which there was great passing and repassing of travellers between Egypt and Canaan, wherein there is such a dead bodies, putrefying above ground, with such a loathsome stench, that the travellers who go that way, shall be forced to stop their noses. See what vile bodies ours are; when the soul has been a little while from them, the smell of them becomes offensive, no smell more nauseous, or more noxious. There, therefore, where the greatest number lay slain, shall the burying-place be appointed.

And it shall be called, The valley of Hamon-gog, that is, of the multitude of Gog; for that was the thing which was in a particular manner to be had in remembrance. How numerous the forces of the enemies were which God defeated and destroyed for the defence of his people Israel!

2. A considerable time shall be spent in burying them, no less than seven months; (v. 12.) which is a further intimation that the slain of the Lord in this action should be many; and that great care should be taken by the house of Israel to leave none unburied, that so they might cleanse the land from the ceremonial pollution it contracted by the lying of so many dead corpses unburied in it; for the prevention of which it was appointed that those who were hanged on a tree, should be speedily taken down, and their carcasses burned; and that the intimation that times of eminent deliverances should be times of reformation. The more God has done for the saving of a land from ruin, the more the inhabitants should do for the cleansing of the land from sin.

3. Great numbers shall be employed in this work; All the people of the land shall be ready to lend a hand, and to be employed in both. In number of the army, and in the number of them that contribute the utmost he can in his place toward the cleansing of the land from the pollutions of it, and from every thing that is a reproach to it. Sin is a common enemy which every man shall take up arms against. In publico discrimine uniusque homo miles est.—In the season of public danger every man becomes a soldier. And whoever shall assist in this work, it shall be to them a reward; though they be strangers and enemies to the commonwealth of the country, seem but mean, yet, when it is for the cleansing and purifying of the land from dead works, it shall be mentioned to their honour. Note, Acts of humanity add much to the renown of God's Israel; it is a credit to religion, when those that profess it are ready to every good work; and a good work it is to bury the dead, yea, though they be strangers and enemies to the commonwealth of Israel, for even they shall rise again. It shall be a recompense to them in the day when God will be glorified. Note, It is for the glory of God when his Israel do that which adorns their profession; others will see their good works, and glorify their Father, Matth. v. 16. And when God is honoured, he will put honour upon his people. His glory is their renown.

4. Some particular persons shall make it their business to search out the dead bodies, or any part of them that should remain unburied. The people of the land will soon grow weary of burying the pollutions of the country, and therefore they shall appoint men of continual employment, that shall apply themselves to it, and do nothing else till the land be thoroughly cleansed; for otherwise, that which is every one's work, should seem the burden of his own. Note, Those that are engaged in public work, especially for the cleansing and reforming of a land, ought to be men of continual employment, men that will stick to what they undertake, and go through with it, men that will apply themselves to it; and these that will do good according to their opportunities, will find themselves continually employed.

5. Even the passengers shall be ready to give information to those whose business it is to cleanse the land of what public nuisances they meet with, which call for their assistance; They that pass through the land, though they will not stay to bury the dead themselves, lest they should contract a ceremonial pollution, will yet give notice of these that they find unburied. If they but discover any thing that is set up a sign, that the buriers may come, and bury it; and that, till it is buried, others may take heed of touching it; for which reason their sepulchres among the Jews were whitened, that people might keep at a distance from them. Note, When good work is to be done, every one should lend a hand to further it, even the passengers themselves, who must not think themselves unconcerned in a common calamity, or a common iniquity, to put a stop to it.

Those whose work it is to cleanse the land must not content themselves with any thing in it that is defiling; though it were not the body, but only the bone, of a man, that was found unburied, they must encourage those who shall give information of it, private information, by a sign, concealing the informer, that they may take it away, and bury it out of sight. Nay, after the end of seven months, which was allowed for this work, when all is taken away that appeared at first view, they shall search for more, that what is hidden may be brought to light; they shall search out iniquity till they find none. In memory of this, they shall give a new name to their city. It shall be called Hamonah—The multitude.

O what a multitude of our enemies have we of this city buried! Thus shall they cleanse the land, with all this labor and care, and the while they are conquering there must be cleansing. Moses appointed those Israelites that had been employed in the war with the Midianites, to purify themselves, Numb. xxxi. 24. Having received special favours from God, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness.

III. The birds and beasts of prey shall rest upon the carcasses of the slain while they remain unburied, and also upon those that are cut up. We find a great slaughter represented by this figure, Rev. xiv. 17, &c. which is borrowed from this.

1. There is a general invitation given, v. 17. It is to the feast of every venge, and to every feast of the field, from the greatest to the least, that prey upon carcasses, from the eagle to the raven, from the lion to the dog; let them all gather themselves on every side, here is meat enough for them, and they are all welcome. Let them come to God's sacrifice, to his feast; so the margin reads it. Note, The judgments of God, executed upon sin and sinners, are both a sacrifice and a feast; a sacrifice to the justice of God, and a feast to the faith and hope of God's people. When God brake the head of levitation, he gave him to be meat to Israel, Ps. lxxiv. The righteous shall rejoice as at a feast, and they see the vengeance, and shall wash his foot, as at a feast, in the blood of the wicked. This sacrifice is upon the mountains of Israel; these are the high places, the altars, where God has been dishonourd by the idolatry of the people, but where he will now glorify himself in the destruction of his enemies.

2. There is great preparation made; They shall eat the flesh of the mighty, and drink the blood of the princes of the earth, v. 18, 19. (1.) It is the flesh and blood of men that they shall be treated with. This has sometimes been an instance of the rebellion of the inferior creatures against man their master, which is an effect of his rebellion against God his Maker. (2.) It is the flesh and blood of great men, here called rams, and bullocks, and great goats, all of them failings of Bashan. It is the blood of the princes of the earth that they shall regale themselves with. What a mortification is this to the princes of the blood, as they call themselves, that God can make that blood, that royal blood which swells their veins, a feast for the birds and beasts of prey! (3.) It is the flesh and blood of wicked men, the enemies of God's church and people, that they are invited to. They had accounted the Israel of God as sheep for the slaughter, and now they shall themselves be so accounted; they had thus used the dead bodies of God's servants.

(Ps. lxxix. 2.) or would have done, and now it shall come upon themselves.

3. They shall all be fed, they shall all be feasted to the full; (v. 19, 20.) You shall eat fat, and drink blood, which are satiating, surfeiting things. The sacrifice is great, and the feast upon the sacrifice is accordingly; You shall be filled at my table. Note, He that keeps his table moral and religious will always keep his table rich, and it will always be filled. Thus shall you keep food for all flesh; the eyes of all wait upon him, and he satisfies their desires, for he keeps a plentiful table. And if the birds and beasts shall be filled at God's table, which he has prepared for them, much more shall his children be abundantly satisfied with the goodness of his house, even of his holy temple. They shall be filled with horses and chariots that is, those who ride in the chariots, mighty men, and men of war, who trample upon nations, are now themselves triumphed over by the ravens of the valley and the young eagles, Prov. xxx. 17. They thought to have made an easy prey of God's Israel, and now they are themselves an easy prey to the birds and beasts. See how evil pursues sinners even after death. This exposing of their bodies to be a prey is but a type and sign of the terrible death that shall overtake them after death. God's enemies, even his unprofitable servants, shall be made to witness their iniquity, while they are made to witness the destruction of others. Thus God has made the wicked bear the judgment of others, and he will now make them bear the judgment of themselves. This is a measure for measure, and a just vengeance.

IV. This shall redound very much both to the glory of God and to the comfort and satisfaction of his people.

1. It shall be much for the honour of God, for the heathen shall hereby be made to know that he is the Lord; (v. 21.) All the heathen shall see and observe my judgments that I have executed, and thereby my glory shall be set among them. This principle shall be admitted and established among them more than ever, that the God of Israel is a great and glorious God. He is known to be so even among the heathen, that have not, or read not, his written word, by the judgments which he executes.

2. It shall be much for the satisfaction of his people; for they shall hereby be made to know that he is their God; (v. 22.) The house of Israel shall know, abundantly to their comfort, that I am the Lord their God from that day and forward. (1.) He will be so from that day and forward. God's judgments upon his enemies will make the whole body of his people to rejoice, and be glad in his holy name, and live in his victory. (2.) They shall know it with more satisfaction from that day and forward. They had sometimes been ready to question whether the Lord was with them or no; but the events of this day shall silence their doubts, and, the matter being thus settled and made clear, it shall not be doubted of for the future. As boasting in themselves is hereby for ever excluded, so boasting in God is hereby for ever secured.

23. And the heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity: because they trespassed against me, therefore hid I my face from them, and gave them into the hand of their enemies; so fell they all by the sword. 24. According to their uncleanness, and according to their transgressions, have I done unto them, and hid my face from them. 25. Therefore thus saith the Lord God, Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob, and have mercy upon the whole house of Israel, and will be jealous for my holy name; 26. After
That they have borne their shame, and all their trespasses, whereby they have trespassed against me, when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid. 27. When I have brought them again from the people, and gathered them out of their enemies' lands, and am sanctified in them in the sight of many nations; 28. Then shall they know that I am the Lord their God, which caused them to be led into captivity among the heathen: but I have gathered them unto their own land, and have left none of them any more there. 29. Neither will I hide my face any more from them: for I have poured out my Spirit upon the house of Israel, saith the Lord God.

This is the conclusion of the whole matter going before, and has reference not only to the predictions concerning Gog and Magog, but to all the prophecies of this book concerning the captivity of the house of Israel, and then concerning their restoration and return out of their captivity.

When God gives up the meaning of his people's troubles, and rectify their mistake concerning them, who took occasion from the troubles of Israel to reproach the God of Israel, as unable to protect them, and untrue to his covenant with them. When God, upon their reformation and return to him, turned again their captivity, and brought them back to their own land, and, upon their perseverance in their reformation, wrought such great salvation upon them, that from the attempts of Gog upon them, then it will be made to appear, even to the heathen that will but consider and compare things, that there was no ground at all for their reflection; that Israel went into captivity, not because God could not protect them, but because they had by sin forfeited his favour, and thrown themselves out of his protection; (v. 23, 24.) The heathen shall know that the house of Israel went into captivity for their iniquity, that iniquity which they learned from the heathen their neighbours; because they trespassed against God. That was the true reason why God hid his face from them, and gave them into the hand of their enemies. It was according to their uncleanness, and according to their transgressions. Now the evident of this will not only silence their reflections on God, but will redound greatly to his honour; when the troubles of God's people are over, and we see the end of them, we shall better understand them than we did at first. And it will appear much for the glory of God, when the world is made to know, 1. That God punishes sin, even in his own people, because he hates it most in those that are nearest and dearest to him, Amos iii. It is the praise of justice, it will be in due season, v. 7. When God gives up his people for a prey, it is to correct them and reform them, not to gratify their enemies, Isa. x. 7.—xiii. 24. Let not them therefore exalt themselves. 3. That no sooner do God's people humble themselves under the rod, than he returns in mercy upon them.

11. God will give his own people to know what great favour he has in store for them, notwithstanding the troubles he had brought them into; (v. 25, 26.) Now will I bring again the captivity of Jacob. 1. Why now? Now God will have mercy upon the whole house of Israel; (1.) Because it is time for him to stand up for his own glory, which suffers in their sufferings; Now will I be jealous for my holy name, that that may no longer be reproached. (2.) Because they now repent of their sins; They have borne their shame, and all their trespasses; when sinners repent, and take shame to themselves, God will have mercy upon them, and will not take vengeance of their sins; but will see that they do repent, and will be reconciled to them. It is particularly pleasing to God, that these penitents take a great way back in their penitential reflections, and are ashamed of all their trespasses which they were guilty of, when they dwelt safely in their land, and none made them afraid. The remembrance of the mercies they enjoyed in their own land, and the divine protection they were under, is a source of great satisfaction to them, and the sins they committed in that land; they dwelt safely, and might have continued to dwell so, and none should have given them any disquiet or disturbance, if they had continued in the way of their duty. Nay, therefore they trespassed, because they dwelt safely; outward safety is often a cause of inward security, and that is an inlet to all sin, Ps. lxxii. Now they are willing to bear the shame of, and acknowledge that God has justly brought them into a land of trouble, where every one makes them afraid, because they had trespassed against him in a land of peace, where none made them afraid. And when they thus humble themselves under humbling providences, God will bring again their captivity and,

2. What then? When God has gathered them out of their enemies' hands, and brought them home again;

(1.) Then God will have the praise of it; I will be sanctified in them in the sight of many nations, v. 27. As God was reproached in the reproach they were under during their captivity, so he will be sanctified in their reformation, and the making of them a holy people again, and will be glorified in their restoration, and the making of them a happy glorious people again.

(2.) Then they shall have the benefit of it; (v. 28.) They shall know that I am the Lord their God. Note, The providences of God concerning his people, that are designed for their good, have the grace of God going along with them, to teach them to eye God as the Lord, and their God, in all; and then they do them good. They shall see him as the Lord, and their God. [1.] In their calamities, that it was he who caused them to be led into captivity; and therefore they must not only submit to his will, but endeavour to answer his end in it. [2.] In their comfort, that it is he who has gathered them to their own land, and left none of them among the heathen. Note, By the variety of events that befal us, if we look up to God in all, we may come to acquaint ourselves better with his attributes and designs.

(3.) Then God and they will never part, v. 29. [1.] God will pour out his Spirit upon them, to prevent their departures from him, and returns to folly again, and to keep them close to their duty. And then, [2.] He will never hide his face any more from them, will never suspend his favour as he had done: he will never turn from doing them good, and, in order to prevent their enemies, he will never turn from doing him service. Note, The indwelling of the Spirit is an infallible pledge of the continuance of God's favour. He will hide his face no more from those on whom he has poured out his Spirit. When therefore we pray that God would never cast us away from his presence, we must as earnestly pray that, in order to that, he would never take his Holy Spirit away from us, Ps. li. 11.

CHAP. XL.

The waters of the sanctuary which this prophet saw in vision, (ch. iv. 4.) are a most sublime representation of this prophet. Hilheto, the waters have been sometimes but to the ankles, in other places to the knees, or to the loins, but now the waters are risen and are become a river which cannot be passed over. Here is one con
1. IN the five and twentieth year of our captivity, in the beginning of the year, in the tenth day of the month, in the fourteenth year after that the city was smitten, in the self-same day the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brought me thither. 2. In the visions of God brought he me into the land of Israel, and set me upon a very high mountain, by which was as the frame of a city on the south. 3. And he brought me thither, and, behold, there was a man, whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, with a line of flax in his hand, and a measuring-rod; and he stood in the gate. 4. And the man said unto me, Son of man, behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, and set thy heart upon all that I shall shew thee; for to the intent that I might shew them unto thee art thou brought thither: declare all that thou seest to the house of Israel.

Here is, 1. The date of this vision. It was in the 25th year of Ezekiel's captivity, (v. 1.) which some compute to be the 33d year of the first captivity, and is here said to be the 14th year after the city was smitten. See how reasonably the clearest and fullest prospects of their deliverance were given, then when they were in the depth of their distress; and an assurance of the return of the morning, when they were in the midst of their captivity: "Then the hand of the Lord was upon me, and brought me thither to Jerusalem, now that it was in ruins, desolate and deserted"—a suitable sight to the prophet.

2. The scene where it was had. The prophet was brought, in the visions of God, to the land of Israel, v. 2. And it was not the first time that he had been brought thither in vision; we had him carried to Jerusalem, to see it in its iniquity and shame; (ch. viii. 3.) here he is carried thither, to have a pleasing prospect of it in its glory, though its present aspect, now that it was quite depopulated, was desolate. He was set upon a very high mountain, as Moses upon the top of Pisgah, to view this land, which was now a second time to be possessed. From the top of this mountain he saw as the frame of a city, the plan and model of it; but this city was temple as large as a city. The new Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 22.) had no temple therein; this here is all temple, which comes much to one. It is a city for men to dwell in; it is a temple for God to dwell in; for in the church on earth God dwells with men, in that in heart in fashion as a man, he is squared and framed in the counsel of God, framed by infinite wisdom, and all very good.

3. The particular discoveries of this city (which he had at first a general view of) were made to him by a man whose appearance was like the appearance of brass, (v. 3.) not a created angel, but Jesus Christ, who should be found in fashion as a man, that he might redeem and build the temple. He brought him to this city, for it is through Christ that we have both acquaintance with, and access to, the benefits and privileges of God's house. He is that he shall build the temple of the Lord, Zech. vi. 13. His appearing like brass intimates both his brightness and his strength. John, in vision, saw his feet like unto fine brass, Rev. i. 13.

4. The dimensions of this city, or temple, and the several parts of it, were taken with a line of flax, and a measuring-reed, or rod; (v. 3.) as carpenters have both their line and a wooden measure. The temple of God is built by line and rule; and those that would let others into the knowledge of it, must do it by that line and rule. The church is formed according to the scripture; the pattern in the mount. That is the line and the measuring-reed that is in the hand of Christ; with that doctrine and laws ought to be measured, and examined by that; for then peace is upon the Israel of God, when they walk according to that rule.

5. Directions are here given to the prophet to receive this revelation from the Lord, and transmit it pure and entire to the church, v. 4. (1.) He must carefully observe every thing that was said and done in this vision. His attention is raised and engaged. (v. 4.) "Behold with thine eyes all that is showed thee; do not only see it, but look intently upon it; and hear with thine ears all that is said to thee, diligently hearken to it, and be sure to set thine heart upon it; attend with a fixedness of thought, and a close application of mind." What we see of the works of God, and what we hear of the word of God, will do us no good, unless we set our hearts upon them. Those who reckon themselves nearly concerned in it, and expect advantage from our souls by it. (2.) He must faithfully declare it to the house of Israel, that they may have the comfort of it; therefore he receives, that he may give. Thus the Revelation of Jesus Christ was lodged in the hands of John, that he might signify it to the churches, Rev. i. 1. And because he is to declare it as a messenger from God, he must therefore be fully apprised of it himself, and much affected with it. Note, Those who are to preach God's word to others, ought to study it well themselves, and set their hearts upon it. Now the reason given why he must both observe it himself and declare it to the house of Israel, is, because to this intent he is brought thither, and has it showed him. Note, When the things of God are showed us, it concerns us to consider to what intent they are showed us; and when we are sitting under the ministry of the word, to consider to what intent we are brought thither, that we may answer the end of our coming, and may not receive the grace of God, in showing us such things, in vain.

5. And, behold, a wall on the outside of the house round about, and in the man's hand a measuring-reed of six cubits long, by the cubit; and a hand-breadth: so he measured the breadth of the building one reed, and the height one reed. 6. Then came he unto the gate which looketh toward the east, and went up the stairs thereof, and measured the threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad, and the other threshold of the gate, which was one reed broad. 7. And every little chamber was one reed long, and one reed broad; and between the little chambers were five cubits; and the threshold of the gate, by the porch of the gate within, was one reed. 8. He measured also the porch of the gate within, one reed. 9. Then measured he the porch of the gate, eight cubits; and the posts thereof, two cubits; and the porch of the gate was inward. 10. And the little chambers of the gate eastward were three on this side, and three on that side; they three were of one measure; and the posts had one measure on this side and on that side. 11. And he measured the breadth of the entry of the gate, ten cubits and the length of the gate, thirteen cubits. 12. The space also before the little chambers was one cubit on this side, and the space was one cubit on that side; and the little chambers were six cubits on this side, and six cubits on that side. 13. He measured then the gate from the roof of one little chamber to the roof of another; the breadth was five and twenty cubits, door against door. 14. He made also posts of threescore cubits, even unto the post of the court round about the gate. 15. And from the face of the gate of the entrance, unto the face of the porch of the inner gate, were fifty cubits. 16. And there were narrow windows to the little chambers, and to their posts within the gate round about, and likewise to the arches; and windows were round about inward: and upon each post were palm-trees. 17. Then brought he me into the outward court, and, lo, there were chambers, and a pavement made for the court round about: thirty chambers were upon the pavement. 18. And the pavement by the side of the gates, over against the length of the gates, was the lower pavement. 19. Then he measured the breadth, from the fore-front of the lower gate unto the fore-front of the inner court without, a hundred cubits eastward and northward. 20. And the gate of the outward court, that looked toward the north, he measured the length thereof, and the breadth thereof. 21. And the little chambers there were three on this side, and three on that side; and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, were after the measure of the first gate: the length thereof was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 22. And their windows, and their arches, and their palm-trees, were after the measure of the gate that looketh toward the east; and they went up unto it by seven steps: and the arches thereof were before them. 23. And the gate of the inner court was over against the gate toward the north, and toward the east; and he measured from gate to gate a hundred cubits. 24. After that he brought me toward the south, and, behold, a gate toward the south: and he measured the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, according to these measures. 25. And there were windows in it, and in the arches thereof round about, like those windows: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 26. And there were seven steps: to go up to it, and the arches thereof were before them: and it had palm-trees, one on this side, and another on that side, upon the posts thereof.

The measuring-reed which was in the hand of the surveyor-general, was mentioned before, v. 3. Here we are told, (v. 5.) what was the exact length of it, which must be observed, because the house was to be serviceable. It became to reckon, not by the common cubit, but the cubit of the sanctuary, the sacred cubit, by which it was fit that this holy house should be measured, and that was a hand-breath, four inches, longer than the common cubit. The common cubit was eighteen inches, this twenty-two, see ch. xliii. 13. yet some of the critics contend, that this measuring-reed was but six common cubits, four and a half, and some hand-breath added to the whole. The former seems more probable. Here is an answer.

I. Of the outer wall of the house, which compassed it round, which was three yards thick, and three yards high, which denoted the separation between the church and the world on every side; and the divine protection which the church is under. If a wall of this thickness will not secure it, God himself will be a Wall of fire round about it; whoever attack it, it is at their peril.

II. Of the several gates with the chambers adjoining to them. Here is no mention of the outer court of all, which was called the court of the Gentiles; some think, because in gospel-times there should be such a vast confluence of Gentiles to the church, that their court should be left unmeasured, to signify that the worshippers in that court should be unnumbered, Rev. vii. 9, 11, 12.

1. He begins with the east gate, because that was the usual way of entering into the lower end of the temple; the holy of holies being at the west end, in opposition to the idolatrous heathen that worshipped toward the east. Now, in the account of this gate, observe,

(1.) That he went up to it by stairs, (v. 6.) for the gospel-church was exalted above that of the Old Testament, and when we go to worship God, we must ascend; so is the call, Rev. iv. 1. Come up hither; Sursum corda—Up with your hearts.

(2.) That the chambers, adjoining to the gates were but little chambers, about ten feet square, v. 7. These were for those to lodge in, who attended the service of the house. And it becomes such as are made spiritual priests to God, to content themselves with little chambers, and not to seek great things to themselves; so that we may but have a place within the verge of God's court, we have reason to be thankful though it be in a little chamber, a mean apartment, though we be but door-keepers there.

(3.) The chambers, as they were each of them four-square, denoting their stability and due proportion, and their exact agreement with the rule, (for they were each of them one reed large, and one reed broad,) so they were all of one measure, so that there might be an equality among the attendants on the service of the house.

(4.) The chambers were very many; for in our Father's house there are many mansions, (John xiv. 2.) in his house above, and in that here on earth. In the secret of his tabernacle shall those be hid, and in a safe pavilion, whose desire is to dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of their life, Ps. xxxvii. 4, 5. Some make these chambers to represent the particular congregations of believers, which are parts of the great temple, the universal church, which are gathered and must be framed by the scriptural line and rule, and which Jesus Christ takes the measure of, that is, takes cognizance of, for he walks in the midst of the seven golden candlesticks.

(3.) It is said, (v. 14.) He made also the posts. He that now measured them was the same that made them; for Christ is the Builder of his church, and therefore is best able to give us the knowledge of it. And his reducing them to the rule and standard is called his making of them, for no account is made of them further than they agree with that; To the law, and to the testimony.

(6.) Here are posts of sixty cubits, which, some think, was to full fill what Cymus, in his edict for rebuilding the temple at Jerusalem, ordered that the height thereof should be sixty cubits, that is, thirty yards, and more. Ezra vi. 3.

(7.) Here were windows to the little chambers, and windows to the posts and arches, to the cloisters below, and windows round about, (v. 16.) to signify the light from heaven with which the church is illuminated and attire, and to put us in mind of instruction, direction, and comfort to those that dwell in God's house; light to walk by, light to walk by, light to see themselves and one another by. There were lights to the little chambers; even the least, and least considerable parts and members of the church, shall have light afforded them. All thy children shall be taught of the Lord. But they are no way to be thrown among the vulgar, as Kings vi. 4. The discoveries made to the church of Christ are but narrow and scanty, compared with what shall be in the future state, when we shall no longer see through a glass darkly.

(8.) Divers courts are here spoken of; an outermost of all, then an outer court, then an inner, and then the innermost of all, into which the priests only were admitted; we see, how gradually, as it were, the diversities of the degrees of glory, the several members of Christ's mystical body are here; as of the several degrees of glory in the courts and mansions of heaven; as there are stars in several spheres, and stars of several magnitudes, in the fixed firmament.—English Annotations.

Some draw nearer to God than others, and have a more intimate acquaintance with divine things; but to a child of God a day in any of his courts is better than a thousand elsewhere. These courts had porches, or piazzas, round them, for the shelter of those that attended in them, from wind and weather; for when we are in the way of our duty to God, we may believe ourselves to be under his special protection, that he will graciously provide for us, nay, that he will himself be a Covert from the storm and tempest.

(9.) On the posts were palm-trees engraven, (v. 16.) to signify that the righteous shall flourish like the palm-tree, in the courts of God's house, Ps. xcii. 12. The more they are depressed with the burden of affliction, the more strongly do they grow, as they say of the palm-trees. It likewise intimates the saints' victory and triumph over spiritual enemies; they have palms in their hands; (Rev. vii. 9.) but lest they should drop these, or have them snatched out of their hands, they are here engraven upon the posts of the temple as perpetual monuments of their honour; Thanks be to God who always causes us to triumph. Nay, believers shall themselves be made pillars in the temple of our God, and shall go no more out, and shall have his name engraven on their foreheads to be their brightest ornament and honour, Rev. iii. 12.

(10.) Notice is here taken of the pavement of the court, v. 17, 18. The word intimates that the pavement was made of porphyry-stone, which was of the colour of burning coals; for the brightest and most sparkling glories of this world should be put and kept under our feet when we draw near to God, and all the foreign ornaments, as it were, the burning coals, or stones of a fiery colour, with which the pavement of God's celestial temple is laid; and if the pavement of the court be so bright and glittering, how glorious must we conclude the mansions of that house to be!

2. The gates that looked toward the north, (v. 20.) and toward the south, (v. 24.) with their porticoes, are much the same with that toward the east, after the measure of the first gate, v. 21. But the description is repeated very particularly. And thus largely was the structure of the tabernacle related in Exodus, and of the temple in the books of Kings and Chronicles, to signify the special notice God does take, and his ministers should take, of all that belong to his church; his delight is in them, his eye is upon them. He knows all that are his, all his living temples, and all that belongs to them. Observe,

(1.) This temple had not only a gate toward the east, to let in the children of the east, that were famous for their wealth and wisdom; but it had a gate to the north, and another to the south, for the admission of the poor and less civilized nations. The new Jerusalem has twelve gates, three towards each quarter of the world; (Rev. xxi. 13.) for many shall come from all parts, to sit down there, Matth. viii. 11.

(2.) To those gates they went up by steps, seven steps, (v. 22.-26.) which, as some observe, may remind us of the necessity of advancing in grace and holiness, adding one grace to another; going from step to step, from strength to strength, still pressing forward toward perfection; upward, upward, toward heaven, the temple above.

27. And there was a gate in the inner court toward the south: and he measured from gate to gate toward the south a hundred cubits. 28. And he brought me to the inner court by the south gate: and he measured the south gate according to these measures; 29. And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, according to these measures: and there were windows in it, and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 30. And the arches round about were five and twenty cubits long, and five cubits broad: 31. And the arches thereof were toward the outer court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof: and the going up to it had eight steps. 32. And he brought me into the inner court toward the east: and he measured the gate according to these measures. 33. And the little chambers thereof, and the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, were according to these measures; and there were windows therein, and in the arches thereof round about: it was fifty cubits long, and five and twenty cubits broad. 34. And the arches thereof were toward the outward court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof, and on this side and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 35. And he brought me to the north gate, and measured it according to these measures: 36. The little chambers thereof, the posts thereof, and the arches thereof, and the windows to it round about: the length was fifty cubits, and the breadth five and twenty cubits. 37. And the posts thereof were toward the outer court; and palm-trees were upon the posts thereof, on this side, and on that side: and the going up to it had eight steps. 38. And the chambers, and the entries thereof, were by the posts of the gates, where they washed the burnt-offering.

In these verses, we have a delineation of the inner court; The survey of the outer court ended with the south side of it. This of the inner court begins with the south side, (v. 27.) proceeds to the east, (v. 32.) and so to the north; (v. 33.) for here is no gate either of the outer or inner court toward the west; it should seem that in Solomon's temple there were gates westward, for we find porters toward the west, 1 Chron. ix. 54.—xxvi. 18. But Josephus says, that in the second temple there was no gate on the west side. Observe,

1. These gates into the inner court were exactly uniform with those into the outer court; the dimensions the same, the chambers adjoining the same, the galleries or rows round the court the same, the arches over the doors the same. The work of grace, and its workings, are the same, for substance, in grown Christians that they are in young beginners, only that the former are got so much nearer their perfection. The faith of all the saints is alike precious, though it be not alike strong. There is a great resemblance between one child of God and another; for all they are brethren, and bear the same image.

2. The ascent into the outer court at each gate was by seven steps, but the ascent into the inner court at each gate was by eight steps. This is expressly taken notice of, (v. 31, 34, 37.) to signify that the nearer we approach to God, the more we should rise above this world and the things of it. The people, who worshipped in the outer court, must rise seven steps above other people, but the priests, who attended in the inner court, must rise eight steps above them; must exceed them at least one step more than they exceed other people.

39. And in the porch of the gate were two tables on this side, and two tables on that side, to slay thereon the burnt-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering. 40. And at the side without, as one goeth up to the entry of the north gate, were two tables; and on the other side, which was at the porch of the gate, were two tables. 41. Four tables were on this side, and four tables on that side, by the side of the gate; eight tables, whereupon they slew their sacrifices. 42. And the four tables were of hewn stone for the burnt-offering, of a cubit and a half long, and a cubit and a half broad, and one cubit high: whereupon also they laid the instruments, wherewith they slew the burnt-offering and the sacrifice. 43. And within were books, a hand broad, fastened round about: and upon the tables was the flesh of the offering. 44. And without the inner gate were the chambers of the singers in the inner court, which was at the side of the north gate; and their prospect was toward the south; one at the side of the east gate, having the prospect toward the north. 45. And he said unto me, This chamber, whose prospect is toward the south, is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the house. 46. And the chamber whose prospect is toward the north is for the priests, the keepers of the charge of the altar: these are the sons of Zadok, among the sons of Levi, which come near to the Lord to minister unto him. 47. So he measured the court, a hundred cubits long, and a hundred cubits broad, foursquare, and the altar that was before the house. 48. And he brought me to the porch of the house, and measured each post of the porch, five cubits on this side, and five cubits on that side: and the breadth of the gate was three cubits on this side, and three cubits on that side. 49. The length of the porch was twenty cubits, and the breadth eleven cubits: and he brought me by the steps whereby they went up to it; and there were pillars by the posts, one on this side, and another on that side.

In these verses we have an account, 1. Of the tables that were in the porch of the gates of the inner court. We find no description of the altars of burnt-offerings in the midst of that court, till ch. xliii. 13. But because the one altar under the law was to be exchanged for a multitude of tables under the gospel, here is early notice taken of the tables, at our entrance into the inner court, till we come to partake of the table of the Lord, we are but professors at large; our admission to that is our entrance into the inner court. But in this gospel-temple we meet with no altar, till after the glory of the Lord has taken possession of it, for Christ is our Altar, that sacrificeth every gift. Here were eight tables provided, whereon to set the criptic sacrifices, and the tables for this purpose, either in the tabernacle, or in Solomon's temple. But here they are provided, to intimate the multitude of spiritual sacrifices that should be brought to God's house in gospel-times, and the multitude of hands that should be employed in offering up these sacrifices. Here were the shambles for the altar; here were the dressers on which they did the flesh of the sacrifices, the knives with which they cut it up, and the hooks on which they hung it up, that it might be ready to be offered on the altar, (v. 43.) and there also they washed the burnt-offerings, (v. 38.) to intimate that before we draw near to God's altar, we must have every thing in readiness; must wash our hands, our hearts, those spiritual garments, with gifts; 2. The use that some of the chambers mentioned before, were put to. (1.) Some were for the singers, v. 44. It should seem, they were first provided for before any other that attended this temple-service, to intimate, not only that singing of psalms should still continue a gospel-ordination, but that the gospel should furnish all that embrace it with abundant matter for joy and praise, and give them occasion to break forth into singing, which is often foretold concerning gospel-times, Ps. xcvii. 1.—cxxxviii. 1. (2.) Others were for the priests; both those that kept the charge of the house, to cleanse it, and to see that none came into it to pollute it, and to keep it in good repair, (v. 45.) and those that kept the charge of the charge of the altar. (v. 46.) The Lord to minister to him. God will find convenient lodging for all his servants. Those that do the work of his house, shall enjoy the comforts of it.

3. Of the inner court; the court of the priests, which was fifty yards square, v. 47. The altar that was before the house, was placed in the midst of this court, over against the three gates, so that coming in on any side of the outer court, when the gates were set open, all the people in the outer court might through them be spectators of the service done at the altar. Christ is both our Altar and our Sacrifice, to whom we must look with an eye of faith in all our approaches to God, and he is Salvation in the midst of the earth, (Is. lxiv. 12.) to be looked unto from all quarters.

The temple is called the house, emphatically, as if no other house were worthy to be called so. Before this house there was a porch, to teach us not to rush hastily and inconsiderately into the presence of God, but gradually, that is, gravely, and with solemnity, passing first through the outer court, then the inner, then the porch, and so we come to the place where the altar is. This porch and the altar was a place where the priests used to pray, Joel ii. 17. In this porch, beside the posts on which the doors were hung, there were pillars, probably for state and ornament, like Jachin and Boaz; He will establish; in him is strength, v. 49. In the gospel-church, every thing is strong and firm, and every thing ought to be kept in its place, and to be done decently and in order.

Chap. xlii.

An account was given of the porch of the house, in the close of the foregoing chapter, this brings us to the temple itself; the description of which here given creates much difficulty to the critical expositors, and occasions diversities among them. Those must consult them, who are nice in their inquiries into the meaning of the particulars of this delineation; It shall suffice us to observe. I. The dimensions of the house, the posts of it, (v. 1.) the door, (v. 2.) the walls of it, (v. 4.) the pillars, (v. 5.) the foundations and wall of the chambers, their doors, (v. 8.) and the house itself, (v. 13.) ii. The dimensions of the oracle, or most holy place, v. 3. 4. 11. III. An account of another of the doors between the porch and the rate place, v. 12. 15. 4. The manner of the building of the house, v. 7. 16. 17. V. The ornaments of the house, v. 18. 20. VI. The altar of incense, and the table, v. 24. 25. VII. The doors between the house and the oracle, v. 29. 36. There is so much difference both in the terms and in the rules of architecture between one age and another, one place and another, that it ought not to be any stumbling-block to us, that there is so much in these descriptions dark, and hard to be understood, about the meaning of which the learned are not agreed. To one not skilled in mathematics, the mathematical description of a temple, in the midst of a heathen city, is incomprehensible; and yet to a common carpenter or mason among the Jews at that time, we may suppose that this, in the literal sense of it, was easy enough.

1. Afterward he brought me to the temple, and measured the posts, six cubits broad on the one side, and six cubits broad on the other side, which was the breadth of the tabernacle. 2. And the breadth of the door was ten cubits; and the sides of the door were five cubits on the one side, and five cubits on the other side; and he measured the length thereof, forty cubits, and the breadth, twenty cubits. 3. Then went he inward, and measured the post of... the door two cubits, and the door six cubits, and the breadth of the door seven cubits. 4. So he measured the length thereof, twenty cubits, and the breadth, twenty cubits, before the temple; and he said unto me, This is the most holy place. 5. After he measured the wall of the house six cubits; and the breadth of every side-chamber four cubits, round about the house on every side. 6. And the side-chambers were three, one over another, and thirty in order; and they entered into the wall, which was of the house for the side-chambers round about, that they might have hold, but they had not hold in the wall of the house. 7. And there was an enlarging and a winding about still upward to the side-chambers; for the winding about of the house went still upward round about the house: therefore the breadth of the house was still upward, and so increased from the lowest chamber to the highest by the midst. 8. I saw also the height of the house round about: the foundations of the side-chambers were a full reed of six great cubits. 9. The thickness of the wall, which was for the side-chamber without, was five cubits; and that which was left was the place of the side-chambers that were within. 10. And between the chambers was the wideness of twenty cubits round about the house on every side. 11. And the doors of the side-chambers were toward the place that was left, one door toward the north, and another door toward the south; and the breadth of the place that was left was five cubits round about.

We are still attending a prophet that is under the guidance of an angel, and therefore attend with reverence, though we are often at a loss to know both what this is, and what it is to us. Observe here,

1. After the prophet had observed the courts, he was at length brought to the temple; v. 1. If we diligently attend to the instructions given us in the plainer parts of religion, and profit by them, we shall be led further, into an acquaintance with the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. They that are willing to dwell in God's courts, shall at length be brought into his temple. Ezekiel was himself a priest, but by the iniquity and calamity of the times was cut short of his birthright-privilege, of ministering in the temple; but God makes up the loss to him, by introducing him into this prophetic, evangelical, court of the temple, and employing him to transmit a description of it to the church, in which he was dignified above all the rest of his order.

2. When our Lord Jesus spoke of the destroying of this temple, which his hearers understood of this second temple of Jerusalem, he spake of the temple of his body; (John ii. 19, 21.) and with good reason might he speak so ambiguously, when Ezekiel's vision had a joint respect to them both together, including also his mystical body the church, which is called the house of God, (1 Tim. iii. 15.) and all the members of that body, which are living temples, in whom the Spirit dwells.

3. The very posts of this temple, the door-posts, were as far one from the other, and, consequently, the door was as wide, as the whole breadth of the tabernacle of Moses, (v. 1.) Twelve cubits, Exod. xxvi. 16, 22, 25. In comparison with what had been under the law, we may say, This is the gate which leads into the church; the ceremonial law, that wall of partition which had so much straitened the gate, being taken down.

4. The most holy place was an exact square, twenty cubits each way, v. 4. For the New Jerusalem is exactly four-square, (Rev. xxi. 16.) denoting its stability; for we look for a city that cannot be moved.

5. The upper stories were larger than the lower, v. 7. The walls of the temple were six cubits thick at the bottom, five in the middle story, and four in the highest, which gave room to enlarge the chambers the higher they went; but care was taken that the timber might have fast hold; though God builds high he builds firm; yet so as not to weaken one part for the strengthening of another; they had hold, but not in the wall of the house. By this spreading gradually, the side-chambers that were on the height of the house, in the uppermost story of all, were six cubits; whereas the lowest were but four; they gained a cubit every story. The higher we build up ourselves in our most holy faith, the more should our hearts, those living temples, be enlarged.

12. Now the building that was before the separate place, at the end toward the west, was seventy cubits broad; and the wall of the building was five cubits thick round about, and the length thereof ninety cubits. 13. So he measured the house, a hundred cubits long; and the separate place, and the building, with the walls thereof, a hundred cubits long. 14. Also the breadth of the face of the house, and of the separate place toward the east, a hundred cubits. 15. And he measured the length of the building over against the separate place which was behind it, and the galleries thereof on the one side, and on the other side, a hundred cubits, with the inner temple, and the porches of the court; 16. The door-posts, and the narrow windows, and the galleries round about on their three stories, over against the door, ceiled with wood round about, and from the ground up to the windows, and the windows were covered; 17. To that above the door, even unto the inner house and without, and by all the wall round about, within and without, by measure. 18. And it was made with cherubims and palm-trees, so that a palm-tree was between a cherub and a cherub; and every cherub had two faces; 19. So that the face of a man was toward the palm-tree on the one side, and the face of a young lion toward the palm-tree on the other side: it was made through all the house round about. 20. From the ground unto above the door were cherubims and palm-trees made, and on the wall of the temple. 21. The posts of the temple were squared, and the face of the sanctuary; the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other. 12. The altar of wood was three cubits high, and the length thereof two cubits; and the corners thereof, and the length thereof, and the walls thereof, were of wood; and he said unto me, This is the table that is before the Lord. 13. And the temple and the sanctuary had two doors. 14. And the doors had two leaves apiece, two turning leaves; two leaves for the one door, and two leaves for the other door. 15. And there were made on them, on the doors of the temple, cherubims and palm-trees, like as were made upon the walls; and there were thick planks upon the face of the porch without. 16. And there were narrow windows and palm-trees on the one side and on the other side, on the sides of the porch, and upon the side-chambers of the house, and thick planks.

Here is, 1. An account of a building that was before the separate place, before the temple, at the end toward the west, (v. 12.) which is here measured, and compared, (v. 13.) with the measure of the house, and appears to be of equal dimensions with it. This stood in a court by itself, which is measured, v. 15. and its galleries, or chambers, belonging to it, its posts and windows, and the ornaments of them, v. 15. - 17. But what use was to be made of this other building, we are not told; perhaps, in this vision, it signified the setting up a church among the Gentiles, not inferior to the Jewish temple, but of quite another nature, and which should soon supersede it.

2. A description of the ornaments of the temple, and the other building. The walls on the inside from top to bottom were adorned with cherubims and palm-trees, placed alternately as in Solomon's temple, 1 Kings vi. 29. Each cherub is here said to have two faces; the face of a man toward the palm-tree on one side, and the face of a young lion toward the palm-tree on the other side, v. 19. These seem to represent the angels, who have more than the wisdom of a man, and the courage of a lion; and in both they have an eye to the palms of victory and triumph, which are set before them, and which they are sure of in all their conflicts with the powers of darkness. And in the assemblies of the saints angels are in a special manner present, 1 Cor. xi. 10.

3. A description of the posts of the doors, both of the temple and of the sanctuary; they were squared, (v. 21.) not round like pillars; and the appearance of the one as the appearance of the other. In the tabernacle, and in Solomon's temple, the door of the sanctuary was more narrow than that of the temple; but here it was full as broad; for in gospel-times the way into the holiest of all is made more manifest than it had been under the Old Testament, (Heb. ix. 8.) and therefore the door is wider. These doors are described, v. 23, 24. The temple and the sanctuary had each of them their doors, and they were two-leaved, folding doors.

4. We have here the description of the altar of incense, here said to be an altar of wood, v. 22. No mention is made of its being overlaid with gold; but surely it was intended to be so, else it would not bear the fire with which the incense was to be burned; unless we will suppose that it served only to put the censers upon. Or else it intimates, that the incense to be offered in the gospel-temple shall be purely spiritual, and the fire spiritual, which will not consume an altar of wood. Therefore this altar is called a table; this is the table that is before the Lord. Here, as before, we find the altar turned into a table; for the great sacrifice being now offered, that which we have to do, is, to feast upon the sacrifice at the Lord's table.

5. Here is the adorning of the doors and windows with palm-trees, that they might be of a piece with the walls of the house, v. 25, 26. Thus the living temples are adorned, not with gold or silver, or costly array, but with the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible.

CHAP. XLII.

This chapter continues and concludes the describing and measuring of this mystical temple, which it is very hard to understand the particular architecture of, and yet more hard to comprehend the mystical meaning of. Here is, 1. A description of the chambers that were about the courts, their situation and structure, v. 1. - 13. And the uses for which they were designed, v. 13, 14. II. A survey of the whole compass of ground, which was taken up with the house, and the courts belonging to it, v. 15. - 20.

1. THEN he brought me forth into the outer court, the way toward the north, and he brought me into the chamber that was over against the separate place, and which was before the building toward the north. 2. Before the length of a hundred cubits was the north door, and the breadth was fifty cubits. 3. Over against the twenty cubits which were for the inner court, and over against the pavement which was for the outer court, was gallery against gallery in three stories. 4. And before the chambers was a walk of ten cubits breadth inward, a way of one cubit: and their doors toward the north. 5. Now, the upper chambers were shorter: for the galleries were higher than these, than the lower, and than the middlemost of the building. 6. For they were in three stories, but had no pillars as the pillars of the courts: therefore the building was straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground. 7. And the wall that was without over against the chambers, toward the outer court on the fore-part of the chambers, the length thereof was fifty cubits. 8. For the length of the chambers that were in the outer court was fifty cubits: and, lo, before the temple were a hundred cubits. 9. And from under these chambers was the entry on the east side, as one goeth into them from the outer court. 10. The chambers were in the thickness of the wall of the court toward the east, over against the separate place, and over against the building. 11. And the way before them was like the appearance of the chambers which were toward the north, as long as they, and as broad as they; and all their goings-out were both according to their fashions, and accord to their doors. 12. And accordin to the doors of the chambers that were toward the south was a door in the head of the way, even the way directly before the wall toward the east, as one entereth into them. 13. Then said he unto me, The north chambers and the south chambers, which were before the separate place, they be holy chambers, where the priests that approach unto the Lord shall eat the most holy things: there shall they lay the most holy things, and the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering; for the place is holy. 14. When the priests enter therein, then shall they not go out of the holy place into the outer court, but there they shall lay their garments wherein they minister; for they are holy; and shall put on other garments, and shall approach to those things which are for the people.

The prophet has taken a very exact view of the temple and the buildings belonging to it, and is now brought again into the outer court, to observe the chambers that were in that square.

1. Here is a description of these chambers; which, as that which went before) seems to us very perplexed and intricate, through our unacquaintedness with the Hebrew language, and the rules of architecture at that time. We shall only observe, in general,

1. That about the temple, which was the place of public worship, there were private chambers, to teach us that our attendance upon God in solemn ordinances will not excuse us from the duties of the closet. We must not only worship in the courts of God's house, but must, both before and after our attendance there, enter into our chambers, enter into our closets, and read and meditate, and pray to our Father in secret; and a great deal of comfort the people of God have found in their communion with God in solitude.

2. That these chambers were many; there were three stories of them, and though the higher stories were not so large as the lower, yet they served as well for retirement, v. 5, 6. There were many, that there might be conveniences for all such devout people as Anna the prophetess, who departed not from the temple night or day, Luke i. 37. In my Father's house are many mansions; in his house on earth there are so; multitudes by faith have taken lodgings in his sanctuary, and yet there is room.

3. That these chambers, though they were private, yet were near the temple, within view of it, within reach of it, to teach us to prefer public worship before private—(The Lord loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob, and so must we,) and to refer our private worship to the public. Our religious performances in our chambers must be to prepare us for the exercises of devotion in public, and to further us in our improvement of them as our opportunities are.

4. That before these chambers there were walks of five yards broad, (v. 4,) in which those that had odgings in these chambers might meet for conversation, might walk and talk together for their mutual edification, might communicate their knowledge and experiences. For we are not to spend all our time between the church and the chamber, though a great deal of time may be spent to very good purpose in both; but man is made for society, and Christians for the communion of saints; and the duties of that communion we must make conscience of, and the privileges and pleasures of that communion we must take the comfort of. It is promised to Joshua, who was High Priest in the second temple, that God will give him places to walk in among them that stand by, Zech. iii. 7. 11. Here is the use of these chambers appointed, v. 13, 14.

1. They were for the priests, that approach unto the Lord, that they may be always near their business, and may not be non-residents; therefore they are called holy chambers, because they were for the use of them that ministered in holy things, during their ministration. Those that have public work for God and the souls of God's people, much in private, to fit themselves for it. Ministers should spend much time in their chambers, in reading, meditation, and prayer, that their profiting may appear; and they ought to be provided with conveniences for this purpose.

2. There the priests were to deposit the most holy things, those parts of the offerings which fell to their share; and there they were to eat them, and their families, in a religious manner; for the place is holy; and thus they must make a difference between those feasts upon the sacrifice and other meals.

3. There (among other uses) they were to lay their vestments, which God had appointed them to wear when they ministered at the altar; their linen garments, coats, and mantles, and other and their families, in a religious manner; for the place is holy; and thus they must make a difference between those feasts upon the sacrifice and other meals.

15. Now, when he had made an end of measuring the inner house, he brought me forth toward the gate whose prospect is toward the east, and measured it round about. 16. He measured the east side with the measuring-reed, five hundred reeds, with the measuring-reed round about. 17. He measured the north side five hundred reeds, with the measuring-reed round about. 18. He measured the south side five hundred reeds, with the measuring-reed. 19. He turned about to the west side, and measured five hundred reeds, with the measuring-reed. 20. He measured it by the four sides: it had a wall round about, five hundred reeds long, and five hundred broad, to make a separation between the sanctuary and the profane place.

We have attended the measuring of this mystical temple, and are now to see how far the holy ground on which we tread extends; and that also is here measured, and found to take in a great compass. Observe,

1. What the dimensions of it were. It extended each way five hundred reeds, (v. 16—19,) each reed above three yards and a half, so that it reached every way about an English measured mile, which, the ground lying square, was above four miles round. Thus large were the suburbs, (as I may call them) of this mystical temple; signifying the great extent of the church in gospel-times, when all nations should be disenchanted, and the kingdom of the world made Christ’s kingdoms. Room should be made in God’s courts for the numerous forces of the Gentiles that shall flow into them, as was foretold, Isa. xxviii. 18, 19. It is in part fulfilled already in the accession of the Gentiles to the church; and we trust it shall have a more full accomplishment, when the fullness of the Gentiles shall come in, and all Israel shall be saved, Rom. xi. 25.

2. Why the dimensions of it were made thus large. It was to make a separation, by putting a very large distance between the sanctuary and the profane place; and therefore there was a wall surrounding it, to keep off those that were uncleen, and to separate between the precious and the vile. Note, A difference is to be put between common and sacred things, between God’s name and other names, between his day and other days, his book and other books, his institutions and other observances; and a distance to be put between our worldly and religious actions, as still to go about the worship of God with a solemn pause.

CHAP. XLIII.

The prophet having given us a view of the mystical temple, he now proceeds to shew us the Shechinah. God, as he was pleased to be deman. But it might appear not to be erected in vain, comes to describe, in this and the next chapter, the worship that should be performed in it, but under the type of the Old Testament services. In the chapter we have, 1. Of session taken of this temple, by the glory of God filling it, v. 1–6. 2. A promise given of the continuance of God’s presence with his people, upon condition of their return to, and continuance in, the instituted way of his worship, and their abandoning of idols and idolatry, v. 7–12. 3. A description of the altar of burnt-offerings, v. 13–17. 4. Directions given for the consecration of that altar, v. 18–27. Ezekiel seems here to stand between God and Israel, as Moses the servant of the Lord did, when the sanctuary was first set up.

1. AFTERTWARD he brought me to the gate, even the gate that looketh toward the east: 2. And, behold, the glory of the God of Israel came from the way of the east; and his voice was like a noise of many waters: and the earth shined with his glory. 3. And it was according to the appearance of the vision which I saw, even according to the vision that I saw when I came to destroy the city; and the visions were like the vision that I saw by the river Chebar; and I fell upon my face. 4. And the glory of the Lord came into the house, by the way of the gate whose prospect is toward the east. 5. So the spirit took me up, and brought me into the inner court; and, behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house. 6. And I heard him speaking unto me out of the house; and the man stood by me.

After Ezekiel had patiently surveyed the temple of God, the greatest glory of this earth, he is admitted to a higher form, and honoured with a sight of the glories of the upper world; it is said to him, Come up hither. He has seen the temple, and sees it to be very spacious and splendid; but till the glory of God comes into it, it is but like the dead body he had seen in vision, (ch. xxxvii.) that had no breath, till the Spirit of life entered into them. Here therefore he sees the house filled with God’s glory.

1. He has a vision of the glory of God, (v. 2.) the glory of the God of Israel, that God who is in Heaven, and the acknowledged head of the three persons, and worship. The idols of the heathens have no glory but what they owe to the goldsmith or the painter; but this is the glory of the God of Israel. This glory came from the way of the east, and therefore he was brought to the gate that leads toward the east, to expect the appearance and approach of it. Christ’s star was seen in the east, and he is that other angel, Isa. viii. 19, the Spirit of the Lord who leads. For he is the Morning Star, he is the Sun of Righteousness. Two things he observed in this appearance of the glory of God. (1. ) The power of his word which he heard; His voice was like a noise of many waters, which is heard very far, and makes impressions; the noise of pouring streams is grateful, of a roaring sea dreadful, Rev. i. 15.—(2. ) The brightness of his appearance which he saw; The earth shined with his glory; for God is Light, and none can bear the lustre of his light, none has seen or can see it. Note, That glory of God which shines in the church, shows itself by the world; as the morning star appeared for David, the brightness that was before him dispersed the clouds, Ps. xlviii. 12.

This appearance of the glory of God to Ezekiel here, he observed to be the same with the vision he saw, when he first received his commission, (ch. i. 4.) according to that by the river Chebar; (v. 3.) because God is the same, he was pleased to manifest himself in the same manner, for with him is no variableness. “It was the same” (says he) “as that which I saw when I came to destroy the city, that is, to foretell the city’s destruction;” which he did with such authority and efficacy, and the event did so certainly answer the prediction, that he might be said to destroy it. As a judge, in God’s name, he passed a sentence upon it, which was soon executed. God appeared in the same manner when he sent him to speak words of terror, and when he sent him to speak words of comfort; for in both God is, and will be, glorified. He kills, and he makes alive; he wounds, and he heals, Deut. xxxii. 39. To the same hand that destroyed we must look for deliverance; he has smitten, and he will bind up. Ovad.adem. The same hand which smote, The same hand inflicted the wound, and healed it.

2. He has a vision of the entrance of this glory into the temple. When he saw this glory, he fell upon his face, (v. 3.) as not able to bear the lustre of God’s glory, or, rather, as one willing to give him the glory of it by an humble and reverent adoration. But the spirit took him up, (v. 5.) when the glory of God was come into the house; and he might see how the house was filled with it. He saw how the glory of the Lord in this same appearance departed from the temple, because it was profaned, to his great grief; now he shall see it return to the temple to his great satisfaction. See ch. x. 18, 19.—xi. 23. Note, Though God may forsake his people for a small moment, he will return with a glory that shall prove the more lovely; and he may fill the house as he had filled the tabernacle which Moses set up, and the temple of Solomon, Exod. xl. 34. 1 Kings viii. 10. Now we do not find that ever the Shechinah did in that manner take possession of the second temple, and therefore this was to have its accomplishment in that glory of the divine grace which shines so bright in the gospel-church, and fills it. Here is no mention of a cloud filling the house as formerly, for we now with open face.
behold the glory of the Lord, in the face of Christ, and not as of old through the cloud of types.

3. He receives instructions more immediately from the glory of the Lord; as Moses did when God had taken possession of the tabernacle; (Lev. i. 1.) I heard him speaking to me out of the house.

6. God's glory shining in the church, we must from thence expect to receive divine oracles. The man stood by me; we could not but hear the voice of God any more than to see the face of God, if such a man did not stand by on the Mediator. Or, if this was a created angel, it is observable that when God began to speak to Ezekiel, he stood by, and gave way; having no more to say. Nay, he stood by the prophet, as a learner with him; for to the principalities and powers, to the angels themselves, who desire to look into these things, is known by the church the manifold wisdom of God, Eph. iii. 19. The man stood by him to conduct him thither where he might receive further discoveries, ch. xlv. 1.

7. And he said unto me, Son of man, the place of my throne, and the place of the soles of my feet, where I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel for ever, and my holy name, shall the house of Israel no more defile, neither they, nor their kings, by their whoredom, nor by the carcases of their kings in their high places; 8. In their setting of their threshold by my thresholds, and their post by my posts, and the wall between me and them; they have even defiled my holy name by their abominations that they have committed: wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger. 9. Now let them put away their whoredom, and the carcases of their kings, far from me, and I will dwell in the midst of them for ever. 10. Thou son of man, shew the house to the house of Israel, that they may be ashamed of their iniquities; and let them measure the pattern. 11. And if they be ashamed of all that they have done, shew them the form of the house, and the fashion thereof, and the goings-out thereof, and the comings-in thereof, and all the forms thereof, and all the ordinances thereof; and the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof: and write it in their sight, that they may keep the whole form thereof, and all the ordinances thereof, and do them. 12. This is the law of the house; Upon the top of the mountain, the whole limit thereof round about shall be most holy. Behold, this is the law of the house.

God does here, in effect, renew his covenant with his people Israel, upon his retaking possession of the house, and Ezekiel negotiates the matter, as Moses formerly. This would be of great use to the captives at their return, both for direction and encouragement; but it looks further, to those that are blessed with the privileges of the gospel-temple, that they may understand how they are before him on their good behaviour.

10. God, by the prophet, puts them in mind of their former provocations, for which they had long lain under the tokens of his displeasure. This con- viction is spoken to them, to make way for the con- fession designed through the Mediator; and it is a great mercy to them in their distress, if it becomes us, when he forgives, to upbraid ourselves with our unworthy conduct toward him. Let them now remember therefore,

(1.) That they had formerly defiled God's holy name, had profaned and abused all those sacred things by which he had made himself known among them, v. 7. They and their kings had brought contempt on their own houses, and the whole religion to God, by their spiritual whoredom, their idolatry, and by worshipping images, which they called their kings, for so Moloch signifies; or lords, for so Baal signifies; but which were really the carcases of kings, not only lifeless and useless, but loathsome and abominable as dead carcases, in their high places, set up in honour of them. They had defiled God's name, and defiled his holy name, and what were they? It was in setting their threshold by my thresholds, and their post by my posts, adding their own inventions to God's institutions, and urging all to a compliance with them, as if they had been of equal authority and efficacy; teaching for doctrines the commandments of men; (Isa. xxix. 13.) or, rather, setting up altars to their own devices, even to this very day. It is certain, that a more impudent affront could not be put upon the Divine Majesty. Thus they set up a separation wall between him and them, which stopped the current of his favours to them, and spoiled the acceptableness of their services to him. See what an indignity sinners do to God, setting up their wills in opposition to his, and thrusting him out from what is his right; and see what injury they do to themselves for the nearer any come to God with their sins, the further they set him at a distance from them. Some give this sense of it; Though their houses joined close to God's house, their posts and thresholds to his, so that they were in a manner his next neighbours, there was but a wall between me and them, (so it is in the margin) so that it might have been expected they should have acquiesced themselves with him, and been in care to please him, yet they were not so much as neighbourly. Note, It often proves too true, The nearer the church, the farther from God. They were, by profession, in covenant with God, and yet they had defiled the place of his throne, and of the soles of his feet, his temple, where he did both reside and reign Jerusalem is called the city of the Great King, (Ps. cxv. 1.) and his temple, Ps. cxxxii. 5. — xxviii. 3. Note, When God's ordinances are profaned, his holy name is polluted.

(2.) That, for this, God had a controversy with them in their late troubles. They could not condemn him, for he had but brought upon them the desert of their sins; Wherefore I have consumed them in mine anger. Note, Those that pollute God's holy name, must first be called to the full answer of it, and then to the full sentence of it. 2. He calls upon them to repent and reform, and, in order to that, to be ashamed of their iniquities; (v. 9.) "Now let them put away their whoredom; now that they have smacked so severely for it, and now that God is returning in mercy to them, and setting up his sanctuary again in the midst of them, now let them cast away their idols, and have no thoughts of doing so to drink it. They thought they felt the privileges which they have been taught to know the worth of by the want of them. Let them put away their idols, those loathsome carcases of their kings, far from me; from being a provocation to me." This was reasonable counsel now that the prophet had the platform of the temple to set before them; for, (1.) If they see that platform, they will surely be ashamed of their idols; (v. 10.) when they see what mercy God has in store for them, outstanding their utter unworthiness of it, they will be ashamed to think of their disingenuous conduct toward him. Note, The goodness of God to us should lead us to repentance, especially to a penitential shame. Let them measure the pattern themselves; and see how much it exceeds the former pattern, and guess by that what great things God has in store for them; and surely it will put them out of countenance to think what the desert of their sins was. And then, (2.) If they be ashamed of all that they have done, upon a general view of the goodness of God, let them have a more distinct, particular account of it. Note, Those that improve what they see and know of the goodness of God, shall see and know more of it; and not till then, we are qualified for God's favours, when we are truly humbled for our own follies. "Show them the form of the house, let them see what a stately structure it will be, and withal show them the ordinances and laws of it." Note, With the foresights of our comforts, it is fit that we should get the knowledge of our duty; with the privileges of God's house we must first be acquainted with the place, and then with the offices. We are qualified for God's favours, if we now know our duty, and may do it, and be blessed in our deed.

3. He promises that they shall be such as they should be, and then will be to them such as they would have him to be. (1.) The house of Jefra shall no more defile my holy mountain. This is pure gospel. The precept of the law says, You must not defile my name: the grace of the gospel says, You shall not. Thus what is required in the covenant, is promised in the covenant, Jer. xxviii. 19. (2.) Then I will dwell in the midst of them for ever; and the same again, v. 9. God secur

4. The general law of God's house is laid down, v. 12.) That, whereas formerly only the chancel, or sanctuary, was most holy, now the whole mountain of the house shall be so. The whole limit thereof, including all the courts and all the chamber of the Lord, shall be holy; and none but the Levites shall touch it, in gospel-times. (1.) The whole church shall have the privilege of the holy of holies, that of a near access to God. All believers have now, under the gospel, holiness to enter into the holiest, (Heb. x. 19.) with this advantage, that, whereas the High Priest entered in the virtue of the blood of bulls and goats, we enter in the virtue of the blood of Jesus, and, wherever we are, we have through him access to the Father. (2.) The whole church shall be under a mighty obligation to press toward the perfection of holiness, as he who has called us is holy. All must now be most holy. Holiness becomes God's house for ever, and in gospel-times more than ever. Behold, this is the law of the house; the more we expect the protection of it, that will not submit to this law.

13. And these are the measures of the altar after the cubits: The cubit is a cubit and a hand-breath; even the bottom shall be a cubit, and the breadth a cubit, and the border thereof by the edge thereof round about shall be a span: and this shall be the higher place of the altar. 14. And from the bottom upon the ground even to the lower settle shall be two cubits, and the breadth one cubit; and from the lesser set-

This relates to the altar in this mystical temple, and that is mystical too; for Christ is our Altar. The Jews, after their return out of captivity, had an altar long before they had a temple; Ezra iii. 3. But this was an altar in the temple. Now here we have.

1. The measures of the altar, v. 13. It was six yards square at the top, and seven yards square at the bottom; it was four yards and a half high; it had a lower bench or shelf, here called a settle, a
I will accept you. And if God now accept our works, if our services be pleasing to him it is enough, we need no more. Those that give themselves to God, shall be accepted of God, their persons first, and then their performances, through the Mediator.

CHAPTER XIV.

In this chapter we have, I. The appropriating of the east gate of the temple to the prince, v. 1-5. II. A reproach sent to the house of Israel for their former profanations of God's sanctuary, with a charge to them to be more strict for the future, v. 4-9. III. The degrading of those Levites that had formerly been guilty of idolatries, and the establishing of the priesthood in the family of Zadok, which had kept their integrity, v. 10-14. IV. Divers laws and ordinances concerning the priests v. 15-31.

1. THEN he brought me back the way of the gate of the outward sanctuary, which looketh toward the east, and it was shut. 2. Then said the Lord unto me, This gate shall be shut, it shall not be opened, and no man shall enter in by it; because the Lord, the God of Israel, hath entered in by it, therefore it shall be shut. 3. It is for the prince; the prince he shall sit in it to eat bread before the Lord: he shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate, and shall go out by the way of the same.

The prophet is here brought to review what he had before once surveyed; for though we have often looked into the things of God, they will yet bear to be looked over again, such a copiousness there is in them. The lessons we have learned we should still repeat to ourselves. Every time we review the sacred fabric of holy things, which we have in the scriptures, we shall still find something new which we did not before take notice of. The prophet is brought a third time to the east gate, and finds it shut; which intimates that the rest of the gates were open at all times to the worshippers. But such an account is given of this gate's being shut as puts honour, 1. Upon the God of Israel. It is for the honour of him, that the gate of the inner court, at which his glory entered when he took possession of the house, was ever after kept shut, and no man was allowed to enter it, as it was the highest difference ever made between this and the other gates, that this was shut when the others were open, was intended both to perpetuate the remembrance of the solemn entrance of the glory of the Lord into the house, (which it would remain a traditional evidence of the truth of) and also to possess the minds of people with a reverence for the Divine Majesty, and with some awful thoughts of his transcendent glory: which was designed in God's charge to Moses at the bush, Put off thy shoe from off thy foot. God will have a way by himself.

2. Upon the prince of Israel, v. 3. It is an honour to him, that though he may not enter in by this gate, for no man may; yet, (1.) He shall sit in this gate to eat his share of the peace-offerings, that sacred food, before the Lord. (2.) He shall enter in by the way of the porch of that gate, by some little door or wicket, either in the gate, or adjoining to it, which is called the way of the porch. This was to signify that God puts some of his glory upon magistrates, upon the princes of his people, for he has said, Ye are gods. Some by the prince here understand the High Priest, or the sagan or second priest; and that he only was allowed to enter by this gate, for he was God's representative. Christ is...
Then brought he me the way of the north gate before the house: and I looked, and, behold, the glory of the Lord filled the house of the Lord; and I fell upon my face.

And the Lord said unto me, Son of man, mark well, and behold with thine eyes, and hear with thine ears, all that I say unto thee concerning all the ordinances of the house of the Lord, and all the laws thereof; and mark well the entering in of the house, with every going forth of the sanctuary.

And thou shalt say to the rebellions, even to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, O ye house of Israel, let it suffice you of all your abominations.

In that ye have brought into my sanctuary strangers, uncircumcised in heart, and uncircumcised in flesh, to be in my sanctuary, to pollute it, even my house, when ye offer my bread, the fat and the blood, and they have broken my covenant, because of all your abominations.

And ye have not kept the charge of my holy things: but ye have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves.

Thus saith the Lord God, No stranger, uncircumcised in heart, nor uncircumcised in flesh, shall enter into my sanctuary, of any stranger that is among the children of Israel.

This is much to the same purport with what we had in the beginning of ch. xlviii. As the prophet must look again upon what he had before seen, so he must be told again what he had before heard. Here, as before, he sees the house filled with the glory of the Lord, which strikes an awe upon his soul, so that his eyes fail prostrate at the sight, the humblest posture of adoration, and the expression of a holy awe; I fell upon my face, v. 4. Note, The more we see of the glory of God, the more low we shall lie in our own eyes. Now here,

1. God charges the prophet to take a very particular notice of all he saw, and all that was said to him; (v. 5.) “Mark well, set thine heart, apply thy mind to the discovery; now make them all clear.

“Behold with thine eyes what is showed thee, particularly the entering in of the house, and every going forth of it, all the inlets and all the outlets of the sanctuary, those he must take special notice of. Note, In acquainting ourselves with divine things, we must not aim so much at an abstract speculation of things themselves, as at finding the plain, practical way of conversing and complying with them, so that we may go in and out and find pasture.

2. Hear with thine ears all that I say unto thee, about the laws and ordinances of the house, which he was to instruct the people in. Note, Those who are appointed to be teachers, have need to be very diligent, careful learners, that they may neither forget any of the things they are instructed with, nor make mistake concerning them.

II. He sends them upon an errand to the people, to the rebellious, even to the house of Israel, v. 6. It is sad to think that the house of Israel should deserve this character from him who perfectly knew them; that a people in covenant with God should be rebellions against him. Who are his subjects, if the house of Israel be rebellious? But it is an instance of God's rich mercy, that, though they had been rebellious, yet, being the house of Israel, he does not cast them off, but sends an ambassador to them, to invite and encourage them to return to their allegiance, which they have long since been pleased to kill them. The whole race of mankind is fallen under the character here given of the house of Israel; but our Lord Jesus, when he ascended on high, received gifts for men, even for the rebellions also; that, as here, the Lord God might dwell among them, Ps. lxxxviii. 18.

And thou shalt say to the rebellions, even to the house of Israel, Thus saith the Lord God, O ye house of Israel, let it suffice you of all your abominations.

It is time for those that have continued long in sin, to reckon it long enough, and too long, and to begin to think of taking up in time, and leaving off their evil courses. "Let the time just suffice for us, for by this time, surely, you have surfeited upon your abominations, and are become sick of them," I Pet. iv. 3. (1.) That they had admitted those to the privileges of the sanctuary, that were not entitled to them; whereas God had said, The stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death, they had not only connived at the intrusion of strangers into the sanctuary, but they themselves had permitted them. You brought in strangers uncircumcised in flesh, and therefore under a legal incapacity to enter into the sanctuary—which was a breaking of the covenant of circumcision, throwing down the hedge of their peculiarity, and laying themselves in common with the rest of the world. Yet if these strangers had been devout and good, though they were not circumcised, the crime had not been great; but they were uncircumcised in heart too, unhumbled, unconverted, and strangers indeed to God and all goodness. When they came to offer sacrifice, they brought these with them to feast with them upon the sacrifice, because they were fond of their company, and this was one of their abominations, wherewith they polluted God's sanctuary; it was giving that which was holy unto dogs, Matt. vii. 5. Note, Those who are not much concerned for the wicked and profane to special ordinances, is a polluting of God's sanctuary, and a great provocation to him.

(2.) That they had employed these in the service of the sanctuary, who were not fit for it. Though none but priests and Levites were to minister in the sanctuary, yet we may suppose that all who were priests and Levites did not immediately attend on them, but chosen men of them, who were best qualified, who were most wise, serious, and conscientious, and most likely to keep the charge of the holy things carefully: but, in making this choice, they had not regard to merit and qualification for the work; "You have set keepers of my charge in my sanctuary for yourselves, such as you had some favour or affection for, such as you immediately and cordially loved; let money be, or such as would comply with your humours, and would dispense with the laws of the sanctuary to please you; Thus you have not kept the charge of my holy things." Note, Those who have the choice of the keepers of the holy things, if, to serve some secular, selfish purpose, they choose such as are unfit and unfaithful, will hereby have it laid to their door, that they have betrayed the holy things by lodging them in bad hands.

2. He must tell them their duty; (v. 9.) No stranger shall enter into my sanctuary till he has first submitted to the laws of it.” But lest any should think that this excluded the penitent, believing Gentiles from the church, the stranger here is described to be one that is uncircumcised in heart, not in sincerity consenting to the covenant, nor putting away the filth of the flesh; whereas the believing Gentiles were circumcised with the circumcision made without hands, Col. ii. 11. This circumcision of the heart, in the spirit, not in the letter, was what the unbelieving Jews were strangers to, and unconcerned about, while yet they were zealous to keep out of the sanctuary uncircumcised Gentiles, witness their rage against Paul when they did but suspect him to have brought Greeks into the temple, Acts xxi. 28.

10. And the Levites that are gone away far from me, when Israel went astray, which went astray away from me after their idols; they shall even bear their iniquity. 11. Yet they shall be ministers in my sanctuary, having charge at the gates of the house, and ministering to the house: they shall slay the burnt-offering and the sacrifice for the people, and they shall stand before them to minister unto them. 12. Because they ministered unto them before their idols, and caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity; therefore have I lifted up my hand against them, saith the Lord God, and they shall bear their iniquity. 13. And they shall not come near unto me to do the office of a priest unto me, nor to come near to any of my holy things, in the most holy place; but they shall bear their shame, and their abominations which they have committed: 14. But I will make them keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof, and for all that shall be done therein. 15. But the priests the Levites, the sons of Zadok, that kept the charge of my sanctuary when the children of Israel went astray from me, they shall come near to me to minister unto me, and they shall stand before me to offer unto me the fat and the blood, saith the Lord God. 16. They shall enter into my sanctuary, and they shall come near to my table to minister unto me, and they shall keep my charge.

The Master of the house, being about to set up house again, takes account of his servants the priests, and sees who are fit to be turned out of their places, and who to be kept in, and takes a course with them accordingly.

1. Those who had been treacherous are degraded and put lower. Those Levites or priests who were carried down in the stream of the ungodly and false way, whom went astray from God after their idols, (v. 10.) who had complied with the idolatrous kings of Israel or Judah, who ministered to them before their idols, (v. 12.) bowed with them in the house of Rimmon, or set up altars for them, as Uriah did for Ahaz, and so caused the house of Israel to fall into iniquity, led them to sin, and hardened them in sin; for if the priests go astray, many will follow their pernicious ways. Perhaps in Babylon some of the Jewish priests had complied with the idolaters of the place, to the great scandal of their religion. Now these priests who had thus prevaricated, were justly put under the marks of God’s displeasure; or if they were dead, (as it is probable that they were, if the crime were committed before the captivity,) the iniquity was visited upon their children. Or perhaps it was the whole family of Abia that had been guilty of this trespass, which was now called to account for it.

8. They are sentenced to be deprived, in part, of their office, and from the dignity of priests are put down into the condition of ordinary Levites. God has lifted up his hand against them, has said it, and sworn it, that they shall bear their iniquity, (v. 12.) assuredly they shall suffer for it, shall suffer disgrace for it; they shall bear their shame; (v. 13.) for though they have been charitably kept for a while, yet they shall not come near to do the office of a priest, those parts of the office that were peculiar to them, they shall not come near to any of the holy things within the sanctuary, v. 13. Note, Those who have robbed God of his honour, will justly be deprived of their honour. And it is really a great punishment to be forbidden to come near to God; and justly might they who have once gone away from him, and deserted his services, be so far excommunicated as to be one near to him, and put at an everlasting distance.

1. Yet there is a mixture of mercy in this sentence. God dealeth not in severity, as he might have done, with those who had dealt treacherously with him, but mitigates the sentence, v. 11, 14. They are deprived, but in part, of office of their office, and, it should seem, not at all at benefices of their employment. They shall help to slay the sacrifice, which the Levites were permitted to do, and which in this temple was done, not at the altar, but at the tables, ch. xl. 39. They shall be porters at the gates of the house, and they shall keepers of the charge of the house, for all the service thereof. Note, Those who may not be fit to be employed in one kind of service, may yet be fit to be employed in another; and even those who have offended may yet be made use of, and not quite thrown aside, much less thrown away.

2. Those who had been faithful are honoured and established, v. 15, 16. These are remarkably distinguished from the other; But the sons of Zadok, who kept their integrity in a time of general apostacy, who went not astray when others did, they shall come near to me, shall come near to my table. Note, The Lord will give such as these who have proved their fidelity and constancy to him in shaking, trying times, and will employ those in his service, who have kept close to his service, when others deserted it, and drew back. And it ought to be reckoned a true and great reward of stability in duty, to be established in it. If we keep close to God, God will keep us close to him.

17. And it shall come to pass, that when they enter in at the gates of the inner court, they shall be clothed with linen garments; and no wool shall come upon them while they minister in the gates of the inner court, and within. 18. They shall have linen bonnets upon their heads, and shall have linen breeches upon their loins; they shall not gird themselves with any thing that causeth sweat. 19. And when they go forth into the outer court, even into the outer court to the people, they shall put off their garments wherein they ministered, and lay them in the holy chambers, and they shall put on other garments; and they shall not sanctify the people with their garments. 20. Neither shall they shave their heads, nor suffer their locks to grow long; they shall only poll their heads. 21. Neither shall any priest drink wine, when they enter into the inner court. 22. Neither shall they take for their wives a widow, or her that is put away; but they shall take maidens of the seed of the house of Israel, or a widow that had a priest before. 23. And they shall teach my people the difference between the holy and profane, and cause men to discern between the unclean and the clean. 24. And in controversy they shall stand in judgment; and they shall judge it according to my judgments: and they shall keep my laws and my statutes in all mine assemblies; and they shall hallow my sabbaths. 25. And they shall come at no dead person to defile themselves: but for father, or for mother, or for son, or for daughter, for brother, or for sister that hath no husband, they may defile themselves. 26. And after he is cleansed they shall reckon unto him seven days. 27. And in the day that he goeth into the sanctuary, unto the inner court, to minister in the sanctuary, he shall offer his sin-offering, saith the Lord God. 28. And it shall be unto them for an inheritance; I am their inheritance: and ye shall give them no possession in Israel; I am their possession. 29. They shall eat the meat-offering, and the sin-offering, and the trespass-offering; and every dedicated thing in Israel shall be theirs. 30. And the first of all the first-fruit of all things, and every oblation of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's: ye shall also give unto the priest the first of your dough, that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house. 31. The priests shall not eat of any thing that is dead of itself, or torn, whether it be fowl or beast.

God's priests must be regulars, not seculars; and therefore here are rules laid down for them to govern themselves by, and due encouragement given them to live up to those rules. Directions are here given.

I. Concerning their clothes; they must wear linen garments, when they went in to minister, or do any service in the inner court, or in the sanctuary, and nothing that was woolen, because it would cause sweat, v. 17, 18. They must dress themselves cool, that they might go the more readily about their work; and they had the more need to do so, because they were to attend the altars, which had constant fires upon them. And they must dress themselves clean and fresh, and avoid every thing that was sweaty and filthy, to signify the purity of mind with which the service of God is to be attended to. Sweat came in with sin, and was a part of the curse; In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread. Clothes came in with sin, coats of skins did; and therefore the priests must use as little and as light clothing as possible, and not such as caused sweat. When they had finished their service, they must change their clothes again, and lay up their linen garments in the chambers appointed for that purpose, (v. 19,) as before, ch. xiii. 14. They must not go among the people with their holy garments on, lest they should imagine themselves sanctified by the touch of them; or if smoke should proceed out of their heads, as it is explained, ch. xiii. 14. they shall approach to those things which are for the people, in their ordinary garments.

II. Concerning their hair; in that they must avoid extremes on both hands; (v. 20.) They must not shave their heads, in imitation of the Gentile priests, and as the priests of the Romish church do; nor, on the other hand, must they suffer their locks to grow long, as the beaux, or that they might be thought Nazarites, when really they were not; but they must be grave and modest, must pull their heads, and keep their hair short; if a man, especially a minister, wear long hair, it is not becoming, (1 Cor. xi. 14,) it is effeminate.

III. Concerning their diet; they must be sure to drink no wine when they went in to minister, lest they should drink to excess, should drink, and for the law, v. 21. It is not for kings to drink wine, more than will do them good, much less for priests. See Lev. x. 9. Prov. xxxi. 4, 5.

IV. Concerning their marriages; (v. 22.) here they must consult the credit of their office, and not marry one that had been divorced, that was at least under the suspicion of immodesty, nor a widow, unless she were a priest's widow, that had been accustomed to the usages of the priests' families. Others may do that which ministers may not do, but must deny themselves in, in honour of their character. Their wives as well as themselves must be of good report.

V. Concerning their preaching and church-government.

1. It was part of their business to teach the people; and herein they must approve themselves both skilful and faithful; (v. 23.) They shall teach my people the difference between the holy and the profane, between good and evil, lawful and unlawful, that they may neither scrape what is lawful, nor venture upon what is unlawful; that they may not judge what is right, nor pollute themselves with what is profane. Ministers must take pains to cause people to discern between the clean and the unclean, that they may not confound the distinctions between right and wrong, nor mistake concerning them, so as to put darkness for light, and light for darkness, but may have a good judgment of discretion concerning their own actions.

2. It was part of their business to judge upon appeals made to them; (Deut. xvii. 8, 9,) and in controversy they shall stand in judgment, v. 24. They shall have the honesty to stand up for what is right, and, when they have passed a right judgment, shall have the courage to stand to it, and stand by it. They must judge, not according to their own fancies, or inclinations, or secular interests, but according to my judgments; that must be their rule and standard. Note, Ministers must decide controversies according to the word of God, to the law and to the testimony, Sit liber judex—Let the judge be unbiased. Their business is to keep courts in God's name, to preside in the congregations of his people. And herein they must go by the statute-book; They shall keep my statutes in all mine assemblies. God gives the arising and the going out of the mouth of his priests, and cause they are held in his name, to his glory. Ministers are the masters of those assemblies, are to preside in them, and in all their acts must keep close to God's laws. Another part of their work, as church-governors, is, to hallow God's sabbaths, to do the public work of that day with a becoming care and reverence, as the work of a holy day should be done; and to see that God's people also sanctify the Sabbath, and are not negligent to perform it.

VI. Concerning their mourning for dead relations; the rule here agrees with the law of Moses, Lev. xxvi. 1, 11. A priest shall not come near any dead body, (for they must be purified from dead works,) except of his next relations, v. 25. Decent expressions of a pious sorrow for dear relations, when they are removed by death, are not disagreeable to the character of a minister. Yet by this approach to the dead body of a relation they contracted a ceremonial pollution, from which they must be cleansed by a sin-offering, before they went in again to minister, v. 26, 27. Note, Though sorrow for the dead is very allowable and commendable, yet there is danger of sinning in it, either by excess or dissimulation; and those tears have too often need to be wept over again.

VII. Concerning their maintenance; they must live upon the altar at which they served, and live comfortably; (v. 28.) "Ye shall give them no possession in Israel, no lands or tenements, lest they should be entangled with the affairs of this life; for God has said, I am their Inheritance, and they need no other in reserve; I am their Possession, and I will give them an inheritance in the land, which I allowed them, (ch. xlvii. 10.) but their principal subsistence was by their office. What God appropriated to himself, they were the receivers of, for their own proper use and benefit; they lived upon the holy things; and so God himself was the Portion both of their inheritance and of their cup. Note, Those who have God for their Inheritance and their Possession, may be content with a little, and ought not to covet a great deal of the possessions and inheritances of this earth. If we have God, we have all; and therefore may well reckon that we have enough.

Observe, 1. What the priests were to have from the people, for their maintenance and encouragement. (1.) They must have the flesh of many of the offerings, the sin-offering and trespass-offering, with the blood and their fat; and of the meat-offerings, and the meat-offerings, which they would supply them, and their Ephod and their garments. (2.) What they were to have. What we offer to God, will redound to our own advantage. (2.) They must have every dedicated, devoted thing in Israel, which was in many cases to be turned into money, and given to the priest. This is explained, v. 30. every oblation or free-will-offering, which in times of reformation and devotion would be many and considerable; of all, of every sort of your oblations, shall be the priest's. We have the law concerning them, Lev. xxvii. (3.) They were to have the first of the dough, when it was going to the oven, as well as the first of their fruits, when they were going to the barn. God, who is the first, must have the first; and if it belong to him, his priests must have the second. (4.) We may all enjoy what we have, when a share of it has been first set apart for works of piety and charity. To this the apostle's rule bears some analogy, to begin the work with laying by for pious uses, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. The priests being so well provided for, it would be inexcusable in them, if they (contrary to the law which every Israelite is bound by) should eat that which is torn, or dead of itself, v. 21. Those that are in want of necessary food, must perhaps expect to be dispensed with in such a case. Poverty has its temptations, but the priests were so well provided for, that they could have no pretence for it.

2. What the people might expect from the priest for their recompense. They that are kind to a prophet, to a priest, shall have a prophet's, a priest's reward, that he may cause the blessing to rest in thine house, (v. 30.) that God may cause it by commanding it, that the priest may cause it by praying for it; and it was part of the priest's work to bless the people in the name of the Lord, not only their congregations, but their families. Note, It is all in all to the comfort of any house, to have the blessing of God upon it, and to have the blessing to rest in it; to dwell where we dwell, and to attend the entail of it upon those that shall come after us. And the way to have the blessing of God abide upon our estates, is to honour God with them, and to give him and his ministers, him and his poor, their share out of them. God blesses, he surely blesses, the habitation of those who thus are just, Prov. iii. 33. And ministers, by instructing and praying for the families that are kind to them, should do their part toward causing the blessing to rest there. Peace be to this house.

CHAP. XLV.

In this chapter is further represented to the prophet, in vision, 1. The division of the holy land: so much for the temple, and the priests that attended the service of it; (v. 1.) and the minister had his share for the altar of burnt-offering in the city; (v. 6.) so much for the prince, and the residue to the people, v. 7, 8, 11. The ordinances of justice that were given both to prince and people, v. 9., 12. III. The oblations, how they were to be divided in those oblations, v. 13., 17. Particularly in the beginning of the year, (v. 18., 20.) and in the passover and the feast of tabernacles, v. 21., 23. And all this seems to point at the new church-state that should be set up under the gospel, which, both for extent and for purity, should far exceed that of the Old Testament.

1. Moreover, when ye shall divide by lot the land for inheritance, ye shall offer an oblation unto the Lord, a holy portion of the land: the length shall be the length of five and twenty thousand reeds, and the breadth shall be ten thousand. This shall be holy in all the borders thereof round about. 2. Of this there shall be for the sanctuary five hundred in length, with five hundred in breadth, square round about; and fifty cubits round about for the suburbs thereof. 3. And of this measure shall thou measure the length of five and twenty thousand, and the breadth of ten thousand: and in it shall be the sanctuary and the most holy place. 4. The holy portion of the land shall be for the priests, the ministers of the sanctuary, which shall come near to minister unto the Lord; and it shall be a place for their houses, and a holy place for the sanctuary. 5. And the five and twenty thousand of length, and the ten thousand of breadth, shall also the Levites, the ministers of the house, have for themselves, for a possession for twenty chambers. 6. And ye shall appoint the possession of the city five thousand broad, and five and twenty thousand long, over against the oblation of the holy portion: it shall be for the whole house of Israel. 7. And a portion shall be for the prince on the one side and on the other side of the oblation of the holy portion, and of the possession of the city, before the oblation of the holy portion, and before the possession of the city, from the west side westward, and from the east side eastward; and the length shall be over against one of the portions, from the west border unto the east border. 6. In the land shall be his possession in Israel: and my princes shall no more oppress my people; and the rest of the land shall they give to the house of Israel according to their tribes.

Directions are here given for the dividing of the land after their return to it; and, God having warranted them to do it, it would be an act of faith and not of folly, thus to divide it before they had it. And it would be welcome news to the captives, to hear that they should not only return to their own land, but that, whereas they were now but few in number, they should increase and multiply, so as to replenish it. But this never had its accomplishment in the Jewish state after the return out of captivity, but was only foreshadowed in the Christian church, which was perfectly new, (as this division of the land was quite different from that in Joshua's time,) and much enlarged by the accession of the Gentiles to it; and will be perfected in the heavenly kingdom, of which the land of Canaan had always been a type. Now,

1. Here is the portion of land assigned to the sanctuary in the midst of which the temple was to be built, with all its courts and purificies; the rest round about it was for the priests. This is called (v. 1.) on obligation to the Lord; for what is given in works of piety, for the maintenance and support of the worship of God and the advancement of religion, God accepts as given to him, if it be done with a single eye. It is a holy portion of the land, which is to be set out first as the first-fruits that sanctify the lump. The appropriating of lands for the support of religion and the ministry, is an act of piety that bids as fair for perpetuity, and the benefit of posterity, as any other. This holy portion of the land was to be measured, and the borders of it fixed, that the sanctuary itself might not have more than its share, and in time engross the whole land. So far the lands of the church shall extend no further; as in our own kingdom donations to the church were of old limited by the statute of mortmain. The lands here allotted to the sanctuary were 25,000 rods (so our translation makes it, though some make them only cubits) in length, and 10,000 in breadth; about eighty miles one way, and thirty miles another way, say some; or sixty-five miles one way, and ten miles the other way, so some. The priests and Levites that were to come near to minister, were to have their dwellings in this portion of the land, that was round about the sanctuary, that they might be near their work; whereas by the distribution of the land in Joshua's time, the cities of the priests and Levites were dispersed all the nation over. This intimates that gospel-ministers should reside upon their charge; where their service lies, there must they live.

2. Next to the lands of the sanctuary, the city-lands are assigned, in which the holy city was to be built, and with the issues and profits of which the citizens were to be maintained; (v. 6.) It shall be for the whole house of Israel; not appropriated, as before, to one tribe or two, but some of all the tribes shall dwell in the city, as we find they did, Neh. xi. 1. 2. The portion for the city was full as long, but only half as broad, as that for the sanctuary; for the city was enriched by trade, and therefore had the less need of lands.

3. The next allotment after the church-lands and the city-lands, is of the crown-lands, v. 7, 8. Here is no measurement of these, but they are to lie on the one side, and on the other side of the church-lands and city-lands, to intitute that the prince with his wealth and power was to be a protection to both. Some make the prince's share equal to the church's and city's share both together; others make it to be a thirteenth of the rest of the land, the other twelve being for the twelve tribes. The prince that attends continually to the administration of public affairs, he cannot have his dignity, and have abundance, that he may not be in temptation to oppress the people; which yet with many does not prevent that. But the grace of God shall prevent it, for it is promised here, My princes shall no more oppress my people; for God will make the officers peace, and the executors righteousness. Notwithstanding this, we find that after the return of the Jews to their own land, the princes were complained of for their exactions. But Nehemiah was one that did not do as the former governors, and yet kept a handsome court, Neh. v. 15, 16. But so much is said of the prince in this mystical holy state, to intitute that in the gospel-church magistrates should be as nursing-fathers to it, and Christian princes its patrons and protectors; and the church religion has so long been subjected to the power of it, will restrain them from oppressing God's people, because they are more his people than theirs.

4. The rest of the lands were to be distributed to the people, according to their tribes, who had reason to think themselves well settled, when they had both the testimony of Israel so near them, and the throne of judgment.

9. Thus saith the Lord God, Let it suffice you, O princes of Israel: remove violence and spoil, and execute judgment and justice, take away your exactions from my people, saith the Lord God. 10. Ye shall have just balances, and a just ephah, and a just bath. 11. The ephah and the bath shall be of one measure, that the bath may contain the tenth part of a homer, and the ephah the tenth part of a homer: the measure thereof shall be after the homer. 12. And the shekel shall be twenty gerahs: twenty shekels, five and twenty shekels, fifteen shekels shall be your manch.
usages, and turn out those from employments under them, that do violence. Let them take away their exactions, ease their subjects of those taxes which they find heavy upon them, and let them observe judgment and justice according to law, as the duty of their place requires. Note, All princes, but especially the princes of Israel, are concerned to do justice; for of their people God says, They are my people, and they in a special manner rule for God.

2. That one neighbour do not cheat another in commerce; (v. 16.) Ye shall have just balances, in which to weigh both money and goods; a just ephah for dry measure for corn and flower, a just bath for the measure of liquids, wine, and oil; and the ephah and bath shall be one measure, the tenth part of a homer, or cor, v. 11. So that the ephah and bath contained (as the learned Dr. Cumberland has computed) seven wine gallons and four pints, and something more. An omer was but the tenth part of an ephah. (Exod. xvi. 36.) and the hundredth part of a chamur, or homer, and contained about six pints. The shekel is here settled; (v. 13.) it is twenty gerahs, just half a Roman ounce; in our money, 2s. 4d. and almost the eighth part of a farthing; as the aforesaid learned man exactly computes it. By the shekels, the maneh, or pound, was reckoned; which, when it was set for a mere weight, (says Bishop Cumberland,) without respect to coinage, contained just 100 shekels, as appears by comparing 1 Kings xvi. 17. where it is said three manehs, or pounds, of gold went to one shield, with the parallel place, 2 Chron. ix. 16. where it is said 300 shekels of gold went to one shield. But when the maneh is set for a sum of money or coin, it contains but sixty shekels, as appears here; where twenty shekels, twenty-five shekels, and fifteen shekels, which in all make sixty, shall be the maneh. But it is thus reckoned, because they had by way of mercy, with their money, twenty shekels, another twenty-five, another fifteen, all which made up one pound; as a learned writer here observes. Note, It concerns God's Israel to be very honest and just in all their dealings, very punctual and exact in rendering to all their due, and very cautious to do wrong to none, because otherwise they spoil the acceptableness of their profession with God, and the reputation of it before men.

13. This is the oblation that ye shall offer; the sixth part of an ephah of a homoer of wheat, and ye shall give the sixth part of an ephah of a homorer of barley. 14. Concerning the ordinance of oil, the bath of oil, ye shall offer the tenth part of a bath out of the cor, which is a homorer of ten baths; for ten baths are a homer: 15. And one lamb out of the flock, out of two hundred, out of the fat pastures of Israel, for a meat-offering, and for a burnt-offering; and for peace-offerings, to make reconciliation for them, saith the Lord God. 16. All the people of the land shall give this oblation for the prince in Israel. 17. And it shall be the prince's part to give burnt-offerings, and meat-offerings, and drink-offerings, in the feasts, and in the new moons, and in the sabbaths, in all solemnities of the house of Israel: he shall prepare the sin-offerings, and the meat-offerings, and the burnt-offerings, and the peace-offerings, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel. 18. Thus saith the Lord God, In the first month, in the first day of the month, thou shalt take a young bullock without blemish, and cleanse the sanctuary: 19. And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin-offering, and put it upon the posts of the house, and upon the four corners of the settle of the altar, and upon the posts of the gate of the inner court. 20. And so thou shalt do the seventh day of the month for every one that erreth, and for him that is simple: so shall ye reconcile the house. 21. In the first month, in the fourteenth day of the month, ye shall have the passover, a feast of seven days; unleavened bread shall be eaten. 22. And upon that day shall the prince prepare for himself, and for all the people of the land, a bullock for a sin-offering. 23. And seven days of the feast he shall prepare a burnt-offering to the Lord seven bullocks and seven rams without blemish, daily the seven days; and a kid of the goats daily for a sin-offering. 24. And he shall prepare a meat-offering of an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram, and a hin of oil for an ephah. 25. In the seventh month, in the fifteenth day of the month, shall he do the like in the feast of the seven days, according to the sin-offering, according to the burnt-offering, and according to the meat-offering, and according to the oil.

Having laid down the rules of righteousness toward men, which is really a branch of true religion, he comes next to give some directions for their religion toward God, which is a branch of universal righteousness.

1. It is required that they offer an oblation to the Lord, out of what they have; (v. 13.) All the people of the land must give an oblation, v. 16. As God's tenants, they must pay a quitrent to their landlord: they had offered an oblation out of their real estates, (v. 1.) a holy portion of their land; now they are directed to offer an oblation out of their personal estates, their goods and chattels, as an acknowledgment of their receiving from him, their dependence on him, and their obligations to him. Note, Whatever our substance is, we must honour God with it, by giving him his dues out of it. Not that God has need of, or may be benefited by any thing that we can give him, Ps. 1. 9. No, but it is an oblation, we only offer it to him, the benefit of it returns back to ourselves, to his poor, who, as our neighbours, are ourselves, or to his ministers who serve continually for our good.

II. The proportion of this oblation is here determined, which was not done by the law of Moses. No mention is made of the tithe, but only of this oblation. The proportion of this is thus settled.

1. Out of their corn they were to offer a sixtieth part; out of every homorer of wheat and barley, which contained ten ephahs, they were to offer the sixth part of one ephah, which was a sixtieth part of the whole, v. 13. (2.) Out of their oil, (and probably their wine too) they were to offer an hundredth part, for this oblation; out of every ephah of corn, which contained ten baths, they were to offer the tenth part of one bath, v. 14. This was given to the altar; for every meat-offering there was flour mingled with oil. (3.) Out of their flocks they were to give one lamb out of 500; that was the smallest pro portion of all, v. 15. But it must be out of the fat pastures of Israel. They must not offer to God that which was taken up from the common, but the fattest and best they had, for burnt-offerings and peace-offerings; the former were offered for the giving of glory to God, the latter for the fitching in of mercy, grace, and peace from God; and in burnt-offerings and peace-offerings, the offerings of atonement, the offerings of mourners at the throne of grace; but, in order to the acceptance of both, these sacrifices were to make reconciliation for them. Christ is our Sacrifice of atonement, by whom reconciliation is made, and to him we must have an eye, in our sacrifices of acknowledgment.

11. This oblation must be given for the prince in Israel; the prince shall read it to the prince, and understand it of Christ, who is indeed the Prince in Israel, to whom we must offer our oblations, and into whose hands we must put them, to be presented to the Father. Or, They shall give it with the prince; every private person shall bring his oblation, to be offered with that of the prince. For it follows, (v. 17.) It shall be the prince's part to provide all sacrifices, to make reconciliation for the house of Israel. The people were to bring their oblations to him, according to the foregoing rules, and he was to bring them to the sanctuary, and to make up what fell short out of his own. Note, It is the duty of rulers to take care of religion, and to see that the duties of it be regularly and carefully performed by those under their charge, and that nothing be wanting that is requisite therefor; the magistrate is the keeper of both tables; and it is a happy thing when those that are above others in power and dignity, go before them in the service of God.

IV. Some particular solemnities are here appointed.

1. Here is one in the beginning of the year, which seems to be altogether required not instituted by the law of Moses: it is the annual solemnity of cleansing the sanctuary. (1.) On the first day of the first month, upon new-year's-day, they were to offer a sacrifice for the cleansing of the sanctuary, (v. 18.) to make atonement for the iniquity of the holy things the year past, that they might bring none of the guilt of them into the services of the new year; and to implore grace for the preventing of iniquity in the year to come. They fell short of the service of the sanctuary the ensuing year. And, in token of this, the blood of this sin-offering was to be put upon the posts of the temple, the four corners, not of the altar, but the settle of the altar, and the posts of the gate of the inner court, (v. 19.) to signify that by it atonement was intended to be made for the sins of all the servants that attended that house, priests, Levites, and people, even the sins that were found in all their services. Note, Even sanctuaries on earth need cleansing, frequent cleansing; that above needs none. Those that worship God together, should often join in renewing their repentance for their manifold defects, and applying the blood of Christ for the pardon of them, and in renewing their covenants to be more careful for the future; for it is very reasonable to begin the year with this work; as Hezekiah did when it had been long neglected, 2 Chron. xxix. 17. They were here appointed to cleanse the sanctuary upon the first day of the month, because on the fourteenth day of the month they were to eat the passover, an ordinance which, of all the other Old Testament institutions, had most in it of the Passover, and was the very instrument that they should begin to prepare for it a fortnight beforehand, by cleansing the sanctuary. (2.) This sacrifice was to be repeated on the seventh day of the first month, v. 20. And then it was intended to make atonement for every one that errs, and for him that is simple. Note, He that sins, errs, and is simple: he mistakes, he goes out of the way, and shows himself to be foolish and unwise. But here it is spoken of those sins which are committed through ignorance, misadventure, or baddertvency, whether by any of the priests, or of the Levites, or of the people. Sacrifices were appointed to be burnt for such sins as men were persuaded into, did before they were aware; which they would not have done, if they had known and remembered aitright, which they were overtaken in, and for which, afterward, they condemn themselves. But for presumptuous sins, committed with a high hand, there was no sacrifice appointed, Numb. xv. 30. By these repeated sacrifices ye shall reconcile the house; and will be reconciled to it, and continue the tokens of his presence in it, and will let it alone this year also.

2. The passover was to be religiously observed at the time appointed, v. 21. Christ is our Passover, that is sacrificed for us; we celebrate the memorial of that sacrifice, and feast upon it, triumphing in our deliverance out of the Egyptian slavery of sin, and our preservation from the sword of the destroying angel, the sword of divine justice, in the Lord's supper, which is our passover-feast; as the whole Christian life is, and must be, the feast of unleavened bread. It is here appointed that the prince shall prepare a sin-offering to be offered for himself and the people; a bullock on the first day, (v. 22.) and a kid of the goats every other day, (v. 23.) to teach us, in all our attendance upon God for communion with him, to have an eye to the great Sinoffering, by which transgression was finished, and an everlasting righteousness brought in. On every day of the feast there was to be a burnt-offering, purely for the honour of God, and no less than seven bullocks and seven rams, with their meat-offerings, which were wholly consumed upon the altar, and yet no greater, v. 23, 24.

3. The feast of tabernacles; that is spoken of next, (v. 25.) and no mention of the feast of pentecost, which came between that of the passover and that of tabernacles. Orders are here given (above what were given by the law of Moses) for the same sacrifices to be offered during the seven days of the passover. See the deficiency of the legal sacrifices for sin; they were therefore often repeated, not only on the great annual day of the passover, and ever after, because they could not make the corners thereof perfect, Heb. x. 1, 3. See the necessity of our frequently repeating the same religious exercises. Though the sacrifice of atonement is offered once for all, yet the sacrifices of acknowledgment, that of a broken heart, that of a thankful heart, must be every day offered, those spiritual sacrifices which are acceptable to God through Christ Jesus. We should, as here, fall into a method of holy duties, and keep to it.

CHAP. XLVI.

In this chapter, we have, I. Some further rules given both to the priests and to the people, relating to their worship, v. 1-15. II. A law concerning the prince's disposal of his inheritance, v. 16-18. III. A description of the places provided for the boiling of the sacrifices, and the baking of the meat-offerings, v. 19-24.

1. Thus saith the Lord God, The gate of the inner court that looketh toward the east shall be shut the six working days; but on the sabbath it shall be opened, and in the day of the new moon it shall be opened. 2. And the prince shall enter by the way of the porch of that gate without, and shall stand by the post of the gate, the priest shall prepare his burnt-offering and his peace-offerings, and he shall worship at the threshold of the gate; then he shall go forth; but the gate shall not be shut until the evening. 3. Likewise the people of the land shall worship at the door of this gate before the Lord, in the sabbaths, and in the new moons. 4. And the burnt-offering that the prince shall offer unto the Lord in the sabbath-day shall be six lambs without blemish, and a ram without blemish. 5. And the meat-offering shall be an ephah for a ram, and the meat-offering for the lambs as he shall be able to give, and a hin of oil to an ephah. 6. And in the day of the new moon it shall be a young bullock without blemish, and six lambs, and a ram: they shall be without blemish. 7. And he shall prepare a meat-offering, an ephah for a bullock, and an ephah for a ram; and for the lambs according as his hand shall attain unto, and a hin of oil to an ephah. 8. And when the prince shall enter, he shall go in by the way of the porch of that gate, and he shall go forth by the way thereof. 9. But when the people of the land shall come before the Lord in the solemn feasts, he that entereth in by the way of the north gate to worship shall go out by the way of the south gate; and he that entereth by the way of the south gate shall go forth by the way of the north gate: he shall not return by the way of the gate whereby he came in, but shall go forth over against it. 10. And the prince in the midst of them, when they go in, shall go in; and when they go forth, shall go forth: 11. And in the feasts, and in the solemnities, the meat-offering shall be an ephah to a bullock, and an ephah to a ram; and to the lambs as he is able to give, and a hin of oil to an ephah. 12. Now when the prince shall prepare a voluntary burnt-offering or peace-offerings voluntarily unto the Lord, one shall then open him the gate that looketh toward the east, and he shall prepare his burnt-offering and his peace-offerings as he did on the sabbath-day; then he shall go forth: and after his going forth one shall shut the gate. 13. Thon shall daily prepare a burnt-offering unto the Lord of a lamb of the first year without blemish; thou shalt prepare it every morning. 14. And thou shalt prepare a meat-offering for it every morning, the sixth part of an ephah, and the third part of a hin of oil, to temper with the fine flour; a meat-offering continually, by a perpetual ordinance, unto the Lord. 15. Thus shall they prepare the lamb, and the meat-offering, and the oil, every morning, for a continual burnt-offering.

Whether the rules for public worship, here laid down, were designed to be observed, even in those things which were peculiar to the Jewish church, and were so observed under the second temple, is not certain; we find not in the history of that latter part of the Jewish church, that they governed themselves in their worship by these ordinances, as one would think they should have done, but only by the law of Moses, looking upon this then in the next age after as mystical, and not literal.

We may remark, in the law of Moses, 1. That the place of worship was fixed, and rules given concerning that, both to prince and people. 1. The east gate, which was kept shut at other times, was to be opened on the sabbath-days, in the new moons, (v. 1) and whenever the prince offered a voluntary offering, v. 12. Of the keeping of this gate ordinarily shut we read before; (ch. xlii. 2) whereas the other gates of the court were opened every day, it was opened only on high days, and on special occasions, when it was opened for the prince, who was to go in by the way of the porch of that gate, v. 2, 8. Some think he went in with the priests and Levites into the inner court, (for into that court this gate was the entrance,) and they observe that magistrates and ministers should join forces, and go the same way, in hand in hand, in procession the whole length of the court. But it should rather seem that he did not go through the gate, (as the glory of the Lord had done,) though it was open, but he went by the way of the porch of the gate, stood at the post of the gate, and worshipped at the threshold of the gate, (v. 2.) where he had a full view of the priests' performances at the altar, and signified his concurrence in them, for himself, and for the people of the land, that stood behind and at the door of that gate, v. 3. Thus must every prince show himself to be of David's mind, who would very willingly be a door-keeper in the house of his God, and, as the word there is, lie at the threshold, Ps. liii. 10. Note, The greatest of men are less than the least of the ordinances of God. Even princes themselves, when they draw near to God, must worship with reverence and godly fear; and that even they are unworthy to approach him. But Christ is our Prince, whom God causes to draw near and approach to him, Jer. xxx. 21. 2. As to the north gate and south gate, by which they entered into the court of the people, (not into the inner court,) there was this rule given, that whoever came in at the north gate should go out at the south gate, and whoever came in at the south gate should go out at the north gate, v. 9. Some think this was to prevent thrusting and justling one another; for God is the God of order, and not of confusion. We may suppose that they came in at the gate that was next their own houses, but that when they went away, God would have them go out at that gate which would lead them the furthest way about, that they might have time for meditation; being thereby obliged to go a great way round the sanctuary, they might have an opportunity to consider the holiness of it, and, if they improved their time well in fetching this circuit, they would call it the next way home. Some observe that this may remind us, in the service of God, to be still pressing forward, (Phil. iii. 13.) and not to look back; and, in our attendance upon ordinances, not to go back as we came, but more holy, and heavenly, and spiritual.

3. It is appointed that the people shall worship at the door of the east gate, where the prince does, he at the head and they attending him, both in the tabernacle, and in the temple, and in the New temple, and in the New temple, and in the New temple. But Christ is our Prince, whom God causes to draw near and approach to him, Jer. xxx. 21.
baths and in the new moons, (v. 3) and that, when they come in, and go out, the prince shall be in the midst of them, v. 10. Note, Great men should by their constant and reverent attendance on God in public worship, give a good example to their inferiors, both engaging them and encouraging them to do likewise. It is a very graceful, becoming thing for persons of quality to go to church with their servants, and tenants, and poor neighbours about them, and to behave themselves there with an air of seriousness and devotion; and those who thus honour God with their honour, he will not only hear them, but be pleased with them.

10. To those that ministered sacrifices were fixed. Though the prince is supposed himself to be a very hearty, zealous friend to the sanctuary, yet it is not left to him, nor, not in concert with the priests, to appoint what sacrifices shall be offered, but God himself appoints them: for it is his prerogative to institute the rites and ceremonies of religious worship. 1. Every morning, as duly as the morning-came, they must offer a lamb for a burnt-offering, v. 13. It is strange that no mention is made of the evening sacrifice; but Christ being come, and having offered himself now in the end of the world, (Heb. ix. 26.) we are to look upon him as the Evening Sacrifice, about the time of the offering up of which he died.

2. On the sabbath-days, whereas the law of Moses, for the princes to be of the burnt-offering, (Num. xxviii. 2.) it is here appointed, that (at the prince's charge) there shall be six lambs offered, and a ram besides, (v. 4.) to intimate how much we should abound in sabbath-work, now in gospel-time, and what plenty of the spiritual sacrifices of prayer and praise we should offer up to God on that day; and it with such sacrifices God is well pleased, surely we have a great deal of reason to be so. The sabbath offering in the beginning of their months, there was, over and above the usual sabbath-sacrifices, the additional offering of a young bullock, v. 6. Those who do much for God and their souls, stately and constantly, must yet, upon some occasions, do yet more.

4. All the sacrifices were to be without blemish; so Christ, the great Sacrifice, was, (1 Pet. i. 19.) and such are those who are to present themselves to God as living sacrifices, should aim and endeavour to be, blameless, and harmless, and without rebuke.

5. All the sacrifices were to have their meat-offerings annexed to them; for so the law of Moses had appointed, to show what a good table God keeps in his house, and that we ought to honour him with the fruit of our ground as well as with the fruit of our cattle, because in both he has blessed us, Deut. xxviii. 4. In the beginning, Cain offered the one, and Abel the other. Some observe, that the meat-offerings here are much larger in proportion than they were by the law of Moses. Then it was three tenth-deals to a bullock, and two to a ram, (so many tenth parts of an ephah,) and half a hin of oil at the most; (Num. xvi. 6.–9.) but here, for every bullock and lamb, a bullock, and a lamb, and a bullock, an ephah of flour, and a hin of oil, v. 7. These unbloody sacrifices shall be more aboundéd in; or, in general, it intimates, that as now, under the gospel, God abounds in the gifts of his grace to us, more than under the law, so we should abound in the returns of praise and duty to him. But it is observable that in the meat-offering for the lambs, the prince is allowed to offer as he shall choose, (v. 5, 7, 11.) as his hand and heart shall attach unto. Note, Princes themselves must spend as they can afford; and even in that which is laid out in works of piety, God expects and requires that we should do according to our ability; every man as God has prospered him, 1 Cor. xvi. 2. God has not made us to serve with an offering, (Isa. xliii. 25.) but considers our frame and state. Yet this will not countenance those who pretend a disability that is not real, or those who by their extravagances in other things disable themselves to do the good they should. And we find those praised, who, in an extraordinary case of charity, went not only to their power, but beyond their power.

16. Thus saith the Lord God, If the prince give a gift unto any of his sons, the inheritance thereof shall he his sons'; it shall be their possession by inheritance. 17. But if he give a gift of his inheritance to one of his servants, then it shall be his to the year of liberty; after it shall return to the prince: but his inheritance shall be his sons' for them. 18. Moreover, the prince shall not take of the people's inheritance by oppression, to thrust them out of their possession; but he shall give his sons inheritance out of his own possession; that my people be not scattered every man from his possession.

We have here a law for the limiting of the power of the prince in the disposing of the crown-lands. If he have a son that is a favourite, or has merited well, he may, if he please, as a token of his favour, and in recompence for his services, settle some parts of his lands upon him and his heirs for ever, (v. 16.) provided it do not go out of the family: there may be a case for parents, when their children are grown up, to be more kind to one than another, as Jacob gave to Joseph one portion above his brethren, Gen. xlv. 23. 2. Yet if he have a servant that is a favourite, he may not in like manner settle lands upon him, v. 17. But if he see cause, he may give him lands to the year of Jubilee, and then they must return to the family again, v. 17. The servant might have the rents, issues, and profits, for such a term, but the inheritance, the Jon profitterarum—The right of proprietorship, shall remain in the prince and his heirs. It was fit that a difference should be put between a child and a servant, like that, John viii. 35. The servant abides not in the house for ever, as the son does.

3. What estates he gives his children, must be of his own; (v. 18.) He shall not take of the people's inheritance, under pretence of having many children, and providing for them: if he will, let him find means to forgo his estates, or to force them to sell them, and so thrust his subjects out of their possession; but let him and his sons be content with their own. It is far from being a prince's honour to increase the wealth of his family and crown, by encroaching upon the rights and properties of his subjects; nor will he himself be a gainer by it at last, for he will not but a poor prince. when the people are scattered every man from his possession, when they quit their native country, being forced out of it by oppression, choosing rather to live among strangers that are free people, and where what they have they can call their own, be it ever so little. It is the interest of princes to rule in the hearts of their subjects, and then all they have is, in the best manner, at their service: for the more they can gain their affections, by protecting their rights, than to gain their estates by invading them.

19. After he brought me through the entry, which was at the side of the gate, into the holy chambers of the priests, which looked toward the north: and behold, there was a place on the two sides westward. 20. Then said he unto me, This is the place where the priests shall boil the trespass-offering and the sin-offering, where they shall bake the meat-offering; that they bear them not out into the outer court, to sanctify the people. 21. Then he brought me forth into the outer court, and caused me to pass by the four corners of the court; and, behold, in every corner of the court there were a court. 22. In the four corners of the court there were courts joined of forty cubits long, and thirty broad: these four corners were of one measure. 23. And there was a new building round about in them, round about them four, and it was made with boiling-places under the rows round about. 24. Then said he unto me, These are the places of them that boil, where the ministers of the house shall boil the sacrifice of the people.

We have here a further discovery of buildings about the temple, which we did not observe before, and those were places to boil the flesh of the offering.

v. 20. That he kept such a plentiful table at his altar, needed large kitchens; and a wise builder will provide conveniences of that kind. Observe,

1. Where those boiling-places were situated. There were some at the entry into the inner court, (v. 19.) and others under the rows, in the four corners of the outer court, v. 21.—23. These are the places, where, it is likely, there was most room to spare for this purpose; and this purpose was found for the spare room, that none might be lost. Pity that holy ground should be waste ground.

2. What use they were put to. In those places they were to boil the trespass-offering, and the sin-offering, those parts of them which were allotted to the priests, and which were more sacred than the flesh of the peace-offerings, of which the offerers also had a share. There also they were to bake the meat-offering, their share of it, which they had from the altar for their own tables, v. 20. Care was taken that they bare them not out into the outer court, to sanctify the people. Let them not pretend to sanctify the people with this holy flesh, and so impose upon them; or let not the people imagine that by touching those sacred things they were sanctified, and made ever the better, or more acceptable to God. It should seem from Hagg. ii. 12. that there were those who had such a conceit; and therefore the priests must not carry any of the holy flesh away with them, lest they should encourage that conceit. Ministers must take heed of doing any thing to bolster up ignorant people in their superstitions vanities.

CHAP. XLVII.

In this chapter, we have, I. The vision of the holy waters, their rise, extent, depth, and healing virtues; the plenty of fish in them, and an account of the fishers bringing forth of those waters, the banks of them, v. 1.—12. II. An appointment of the borders of the land of Canaan, which was to be divided by lot to the tribes of Israel, and the strangers that sojourned among them, v. 13.—23.

1. AFTERWARD he brought me again unto the door of the house; and, behold, waters issued out from under the threshold of the house eastward: for the front of the house stood toward the east, and the waters came down from under, from the right side of the house, at the south side of the altar. 2. Then brought he me out of the way of the gate northward, and led me about the way without unto the outer gate by the way that looketh eastward; and, behold, there ran out waters on the right side. 3. And when the man that had the line in his hand went forth eastward, he measured a thousand cubits, and he brought me through the waters; the waters were to the ankles. 4. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through the waters; the waters were to the knees. Again he measured a thousand, and brought me through: the waters were to the loins. 5. Afterward he measured a thousand; and it was a river that I could not pass over: for the waters were risen, waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over. 6. And he said unto me, Son of man, hast thou seen this? Then he brought me, and caused me to return to the brink of the river. 7. Now, when I had returned, behold, at the bank of the river were very many trees on the one side and on the other. 8. Then said he unto me, These waters issue out toward the east country, and go down into the desert, and go into the sea; which being brought forth into the sea, the waters shall be healed. 9. And it shall come to pass, that every thing that liveth, which moveth, whithersoever the rivers shall come, shall live; and there shall be a very great multitude of fish, because these waters shall come thither: for they shall be healed; and every thing shall live whither the river cometh. 10. And it shall come to pass, that the fisheries shall stand upon it, from En-gedi even unto En-eglaim; they shall be a place to spread forth nets; their fish shall be according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. 11. But the midst places thereof, and the marshes thereof, shall not be healed: they shall be given to salt. 12. And by the river, upon the bank thereof, on this side and on that side, shall grow all trees for meat, whose leaf shall not fade, neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed: it shall bring forth new fruit according to his months, because their waters they issued out of the sanctuary; and the fruit thereof shall be for meat, and the leaf thereof for medicine.

This part of Ezekiel's vision must so necessarily have a mystical and spiritual meaning, that from thence we conclude the other parts of his vision have a mystical and spiritual meaning also; for it cannot be applied to the waters brought by pipes into the temple for the washing of the sacrifices, the keeping of the temple clean, and the carrying off of those waters, for that would be to turn this pleasant river into a sink or common sewer. That prophecy, Zech. xiv. 8. may explain it, of living waters, that shall go out from Jerusalem, half of them toward the former sea, and half of them toward the hinder sea. And there is plainly a reference to this in St.
John's vision of a pure river of water of life, Rev. xxii. 1. That seems to represent the glory and joy, which is grace perfected. This here seems to represent the grace and joy, which is glory begun. Most interpreters agree, that these waters signify the gospel of Christ, which went forth from Jerusalem, and spread itself into the countries about, and the gifts and powers of the Holy Ghost which accompanied it, and by virtue of which spread itself far, and produced strange and blessed effects. Ezekiel had walked round the house again and again, and yet did not till now take notice of those waters; for God makes known his mind and will to his people, not all at once, but by degrees. Now observe, 1. The rise of these waters. He is not put to trace the streams to the fountain, but he is told there, v. 1. (r. 1.) Waters issued out from the threshold of the house eastward, and from under the right side of the house, the south side of the altar. And again, v. 2. There ran out waters on the right side; signifying, that from Zion should go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3. There it was that the Spirit was poured out upon the apostles, and ended their preparation for the work of the gospel, that it might refresh these waters to all nations. In the temple first they were to stand, and preach the words of this life, Acts x. 20. They must preach the gospel to all nations, but must begin at Jerusalem. Luke xiv. 24. But that is not all; Christ is the temple, he is the Door, from him these living waters flow, out of his chest into his house, Ps. cxiii. 5. Some observe that they came forth on the right side of the house, to intimate that gospel-blessings are right-hand blessings. It is also an encouragement to those who attend at Wisdom's gates, at the posts of her doors, who are willing to lie at the threshold of God's house, as David was, that they lie at the fountain-head of comfort and grace; the very entrance into God's word gives light and life, Ps. i. 1. as the gate of the river of Zion. All my springs are in thee, Ps. lxxvii. 7. They came from the side of the altar, for it is in and by Jesus Christ, the great Altar, (who sanctifies our gifts to God,) that God has blessed us with spiritual blessings in holy, heavenly places. From God as the Fountain, in him as the Channel, flows the river, which makes glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High, Ps. xlv. 4. But observe how much the blessedness and joy of glorified saints in heaven exceed those of the best and happiest saints on earth; here the streams of our comfort arise from under the threshold; there they proceed from the throne, the throne of God and of the Lamb, Rev. xxi. 1. The prophet gives the outline of these waters. They went forth eastward, (v. 3.) toward the east country, (v. 8.) for so they were directed. The prophet and his guide followed the stream as it ran down from the holy mountains, and when they had followed it about a thousand cubits, they went over across it, to try the depth of it, and it was to the ankles, v. 3. Then they walked along on the bank of the river on the other side, a thousand cubits more, and then, to try the depth of it, they waded through it the second time, and it was up to their knees, v. 4. They walked along by it a thousand cubits more, and then forded it the third time, and then it was up to their middle; the waters were to the loins. They then walked a thousand cubits further, and attempted to repass it the fourth time, but found it impracticable; the waters were risen, by the addition either of brooks that fell into it above ground, or by springs under ground, so that they were waters to swim in, a river that could not be passed over, v. 5. Note, (1.) The waters of the sanctuary are running waters, as those of a river, not standing waters, as those of a pond. The gospel, when it was first preached, the world observe the process of the work; the soul is still pressing forward; it is an active principle, plus ultra—onward still, till it comes to perfection. (2.) They are increasing waters. This river, as it runs constantly, so, the farther it goes, the fuller it grows. The gospel-church was very small in its beginnings, like a little purling brook; but by degrees it came forth to the ankles, to the knees, many, many cubits, and the bolder people added to it daily, till the whole country was watered, and the seed grew up to a great tree. The gifts of the Spirit increase by being exercised, and grace, where it is true, is growing like the light of the morning, which shines more and more to the perfect day. (3.) It is good for us to follow these waters, and go along with them. Observe the progress of the gospel in the world, observe the process of the work of grace in the heart; attend the motions of the blessed Spirit, and walk after them, under a divine guidance, as Ezekiel here did. (4.) It is good to be often searching into the things of God, and trying the depth of them; not only to look on the surface of these waters, but to go to the bottom of them as far as we can; to be often digging, often diving, into the mysteries of the kingdom, to observe and examine those matters, who covet to be intimately acquainted with these things. (5.) If we search into the things of God, we shall find some things very plain and easy to be understood, as the waters that were but to the ankles; others more difficult, and which require a deeper search, as the waters to the knees, or the loins; and some quite beyond our reach, which we cannot penetrate into, grace can do for, but despairs of. To find the bottom, must, as St. Paul, sit down at the brink, and adore the depth, Rom. xi. 33. It has been often said, that in the scripture, like these waters of the sanctuary, there are some places so shallow, that a lamb may wade through them, and others so deep, that an elephant may swim in them. And it is our wisdom, as the prophet here, to begin with that which is shallow, and then to advance, and to wash with those things before we proceed to that which is dark and hard to be understood; it is good to take our work before us.

3. The extent of this river; It issues toward the east country, but from thence it either divides itself into several streams, or fetches a compass, so that it may flow down to the desert, and so goes into the sea, either into the Dead sea, which lay south-east, or the sea of Tiberias, which lay north-east, or the Great sea, which lay west, v. 8. This was accomplished when the gospel was preached with success throughout all the regions of Judea and Samaria, (Acts vii. 1.) and afterward the nations about; may, and those that lay most remote, even in the edge of this sea, were brought into the kingdom, and washed with those things before we proceed to that which is dark and hard to be understood; it is good to take our work before us.

4. The healing virtue of this river. The waters of the sanctuary, wherever they come and have a free course, will be found a wonderful restorative. Blessing brought waters were filled and supplied at the lake of Sodom, that standing monument of divine vengeance, even those waters shall be healed, (v. 8.) shall become sweet, and pleasant, and healthful. This intimates the wonderful and blessed change that the gospel would make, wheresover it came in its power; as great a change, in respect both of character and condition, as the turning of the-
Dead sea into a fountain of gardens. When children of wrath became children of love, and those that were dead in trespasses and sins, were made alive, then this was fulfilled. The gospel was as that salt which Elisha cast into the spring of the waters of Jericho, with which he healed them. 2 Kings ii. 20, 21. Christ coming into the world to be his Physician, sent his gospel as the great medicine, the Pourn- pharmacie; there is in it a remedy for every malady, whether the rivers come, they make things to live. (v. 9.) both plants and animals; they are the water of life. Rev. xxii. 1, 17. Christ came, that we may have life, and for that end sends his gospel; every thing shall live whither the river comes. The grace of God makes dead sinners alive, and living saints lively; every thing is made fruitful and flourishing by it. But its effect is according as it is received, and as the mind is prepared and disposed to receive it; for, (v. 11.) with respect to the marshes and miry places thereof, that are set in the midst of their own sinfulness, and will not be healed or settled in the moisture of their own righteousness, and think they need no healing, their doom is, they shall not be healed; the same gospel which to others is a savour of life unto life, shall to them be a savour of death unto death, which they shall be given to salt, to perpetual barrenness. Deut. xxxix. 23. They that will not be watered with the grace of God, and made fruitful, shall be abandoned to their own hearts' lusts, and left for ever unfruitful. He that is filthy, let him be filthy still. Never fruit grow on thee more for ever. They shall be given to salt, to be monuments of divine justice, as Lot's wife, that was turned into a pillar of salt, to sea-coast others.

5. The great plenty of fish that should be in this river; every living, moving thing shall be found here, shall live here, (v. 9.) shall come on and prosper, shall be the best of the kind, and shall increase greatly, so that there shall be a very great multitude of fish, according to their kinds, as the fish of the great sea, exceeding many. There shall be as great plenty of the river-fish, and as vast shoals of them, as there is of salt-water fish, v. 10. There shall be great numbers of Christians in the church, and those multiplying like fishes in the rising generations, and the dew of their youth. In the creation, the waters brought forth the fish abundantly, (Gen. i. 20, 21.) and they still live in and by the waters that produced them; so believers are begotten by the word of God (1 Pet. i. 23.) that river of God, by it they live, from it they have their sanctuary and subsistence; in the waters of the sanctuary they are as in their element, out of them they are as fish upon dry ground; so David was, when he thirsted and panted for God, for the living God. Where the fish are known to be in abundance, thither will thefishers flock, and there they will cast their nets; and therefore, to increase the replenishing of these waters, and their being made every way useful, it is here foretold that thefishers shall stand upon the banks of this river, from En-gedi, which lies on the border of the Dead sea, to Eir-galaim, another city, which joins to that sea, and all along shall spread their nets. The Dead sea, which before was shunned as noisome and noxious, shall be frequented; gospel-grace marks the barren places which were waste; these shall be fruitful and good for nothing, to become serviceable to God and man.

6. The trees that were on the banks of this river; many trees on the one side and on the other (v. 7.) made the prospect very pleasant and agreeable to the eye; the shelter of these trees also would be a convenience to the fishery. But that is not all; (v. 13.) they are trees for meat, and the fruit of them shall not be consumed, for it shall produce fresh fruit every month. The leaf shall be for medicine, and it shall not fade. This part of the vision is copied out into St. John's vision very exactly, (Rev. xxi. 2.) where, on either side of the river, is said to grow the tree of life, which yielded her fruit every month, and the leaves were for the healing of the nations. Christians are supposed to be these trees; ministers especially; trees of righteousness, the planting of the Lord (Isa. li. 3.) set by the rivers of water, the waters of the sanctuary, (Ps. i. 3.) grafted into Christ the Tree of life, and by virtue of their union with him made trees of life too, rooted in him, Col. ii. 7. There is a great variety of these trees, through the diversity of gifts with which they are endued by that one Spirit who works all in all. They grow on the bank of the river, for they keep close to holy ordinances, through them derive from Christ sap and virtue. They are fruit-trees, designed, as the fig-tree and the olive, with their fruits to honour God and man. Judg. ix. 9. The fruit thereof shall be for meat, for the lips of the righteous feed many. The fruits of their righteousness are one way or other beneficial. The very leaves of these trees are for medicine, for bruises and sores, margin. Great care is taken here, as their fruits, do good to those about them, they strengthen the weak, and bind up the broken-hearted. Their cheerful and do good like a medicine, not only to themselves, but to others also. They shall be enabled by the grace of God to persevere in their goodness and usefulness; their leaf shall not fade, or lose its medicinal virtue, having not only life at their root but sap in all their branches; their profession shall not wither, (Ps. i. 3.) neither shall the fruit thereof be consumed; they shall not lose the principle of their fruitfulness, but shall still bring forth fruit in old age, to show that the Lord is upright. Ps. xxxii. 14, 15. Or, The reward of their fruitfulness shall abide for ever; they bring forth fruit that shall abound to their account in the great day, fruit to life eternal; that is indeed fruit which shall not be consumed. They bring new fruit according to their months, some in one month, and others in another; so that still there shall be one or other found to serve the glory of God for the purpose he designs. Or, Each one of them shall bring forth fruit monthly, which denotes an abundant disposition to fruit-bearing; they shall never be very fruitful, but shall constantly bring forth fruit, so that there shall be a perpetual spring and summer. And the reason of this extraordinary fruitfulness is, because their waters issued out of the sanctuary; it is not to be ascribed to any thing in themselves, but to the continual supplies of divine grace, with which they were watered every moment; (Isa. xxvii. 3.) for whoever planted them, it was that which gave the increase.

13. Thus saith the Lord God, This shall be the border whereby ye shall inherit the land, according to the twelve tribes of Israel; Joseph shall have two portions. 14. And ye shall inherit it, one as well as another; concerning the which I lifted up my hand to give it unto your fathers; and this land shall fall unto you for inheritance. 15. And this shall be the border of the land toward the north side, from the great sea, the way of Hethlon, as men go to Zedad; 16. Hamath, Bernothah, Sibraim, which is between the border of Damascus and the bor-order of Hamath; Hazar-hatticon, which is by the coast of Hauran. 17. And the border from the sea shall be Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus, and the north northward, and the border of Hamath. And this is the north side. 18. And the east side ye shall measure from Hauran, and from Damascus, and from Gilead, and from the land of Israel by Jordan, from the border unto the east sea. And this is the east side. 19. And the south side southward, from Tamar even to the waters of strife in Kadesh, the river to the great sea. And this is the south side southward. 20. The west side also shall be the great sea from the border, till a man come over against Hamath. This is the west side. 21. So shall ye divide this land unto you according to the tribes of Israel. 22. And it shall come to pass, that ye shall divide it by lot for an inheritance unto you, and to the strangers that sojourn among you, which shall beget children among you; and they shall be unto you as born in the country among the children of Israel; they shall have inheritance with you among the tribes of Israel. 23. And it shall come to pass, that in what tribe the stranger sojourneth, there shall ye give him his inheritance, saith the Lord God.

We are now to pass from the affairs of the sanctuary to those of the state; from the city to the country.

1. The land of Canaan is here secured to them for an inheritance; (v. 14.) I lifted up mine hand to give it unto your fathers, promised it upon oath to them and their posterity. Though the possession had been a great while discontinued, yet God has not forgotten his oath which he swore to their fathers. Though God's providences may for a time seem to contradict his promises, yet the promise will certainly take place at last, for God will be ever mindful of his covenant. I lifted up mine hand to give it, and therefore it shall without fail fall to you for an inheritance. Thus the heavenly Canaan is sure to all the seed, because it is what God who cannot lie has promised.

2. It is here circumscribed, and the bounds and limits of it are fixed, which they must not pass over to encroach upon their neighbours, and which their neighbours shall not break through to encroach upon them. We had such a draught of the borders of Canaan, when Joshua was to put the people in possession of it, Num. xxxiv. 1, &c. That begins with the salt sea in the south, goes round and ends there. This begins with Hamath about Damascus in the north, and so goes round and ends there, v. 20. Note, It is God that appoints the bounds of our habitation; and his Israel shall always have cause to say that the lines are fallen to them in pleasant places. The lake of Sodom is here called the east sea, for, it being healed by the waters of the sanctuary, it is no more to be called a salt sea, as it was in Numbers.

3. It is here ordered to be divided among the tribes of Israel, reckoning Joseph for two tribes, to make up the number of twelve, when Levi was taken out to attend the sanctuary, and had his lot adjoining to that; (v. 13, 21.) Ye shall inherit it one as well as another, v. 14. The tribes shall have an equal share, one as much as another. As the tribes returned out of Babylon, this seems unequal, because some tribes were much more numerous than the other, and indeed the most were of Judah and Benjamin, and very few of the other ten tribes; but as the twelve tribes stand, in type and vision, for the gospel-church, the Israel of God, it was very equal, because each tribe in the vision had an equal number of each of the twelve tribes sealed for the living God, just 12,000 of each, Rev. vii. 5, &c. And to these sealed ones these allotments did belong. It intimates likewise that all the subjects of Christ's kingdom have obtained like precious faith. Male and female, Jew and Gentile, bond and free, are all alike welcome to Christ, and made partakers of him.

4. The strangers which sojourn among them, which shall beget children, and be built up into families, and so help to people their country, shall have inheritance among the tribes, as if they had been native Israelites, (v. 22, 23.) which was by no means allowed in Joshua's division of the land. This is an act for a general naturalization, which would be the same thing in the kingdom of heaven; not those only of their own nation and religion, but those, whoever they were, that had an opportunity of shewing kindness to, because from them they would be willing to receive kindness. It would likewise invite strangers to come and settle among them, and put themselves under the wings of the Divine Majesty. But it certainly looks at gospel-times, when the partition-wall between Jew and Gentile was taken down, and both put upon a level before God, both made one in Christ, in whom there is no difference, Rom. x. 12. This land was a type of the heavenly Canaan, that better country, (Heb. xi. 16.) in which believing Gentiles shall have a blessed lot, as well as believing Jews, Isa. xvi. 5.

CHAP. XLVIII.

In this chapter, we have particular directions given for the distribution of the land, of which we had the metes and bounds assigned in the foregoing chapter. 1. The portions of the twelve tribes, seven to the north of the sanctuary, (v. 1, 2.) and six to the south, v. 23, 29. II. The allotment of land for the sanctuary, and the priests, (v. 8, 11.) for the Levites, (v. 12, 14.) for the city, (v. 15, 20.) and for the princes, v. 21, 22. Much of this we had before, ch. xlv. 1, 2. A plan of the city, its gates, and the new name given to it, (v. 30, 33.) which seals up and concludes the vision and prophecy of this book.

1. Now these are the names of the tribes.

From the north end to the coast of the way of Hethlon, as one goeth to Hamath, Hazar-enan, the border of Damascus northward, to the coast of Hamath, (for these are his sides east and west,) a portion for Dan. 2. And by the border of Dan, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Asher. 3. And by the border of Asher, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Naphtali. 4. And by the border of Naphtali, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Manasseh. 5. And by the border of Manassseh, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Ephraim. 6. And by the border of Ephraim, from the east side even unto the west side, a portion for Reuben. 7. And by the border of Reuben, from the east side unto the west side, a portion for Judah. 8. And by the border of Judah, from the east side unto the west side, shall be the offering which they shall offer of five and twenty thousand reeds in breadth, and in length as one of the other parts, from the east side unto the west side: and the sanctuary shall be in the midst of it. 9. The oblation that ye shall offer unto the Lord shall be of five and twenty thousand in breadth, and of ten thousand in breadth. 10. And for them, even for the priests, shall be this holy oblation; toward the north five and twenty thousand in length, and toward the west ten thousand in breadth, and toward the east ten thousand in breadth, and toward the south five and twenty thousand in length: and the sanctuary of the Lord shall be in the midst thereof. 11. It shall be for the priests that are sanctified of the sons of Zadok, which have kept my charge, which went not astray when the children of Israel went astray, as the Levites went astray. 12. And this oblation of the land that is offered shall be unto them a thing most holy, by the border of the Levites. 13. And over against the border of the priests the Levites shall have five and twenty thousand in length, and ten thousand in breadth: all the length shall be five and twenty thousand, and the breadth ten thousand. 14. And they shall not sell of it, neither exchange, nor alienate the first-fruits of the land: for it is holy unto the Lord. 15. And the five thousand that are left in the breadth, over against the five and twenty thousand, shall be a profane place for the city, for dwelling, and for suburbs; and the city shall be in the midst thereof. 16. And these shall be the measures thereof; the north side four thousand and five hundred, and the south side four thousand and five hundred, and on the east side four thousand and five hundred, and on the west side four thousand and five hundred. 17. And the suburbs of the city shall be toward the north two hundred and fifty, and toward the south two hundred and fifty, and toward the east two hundred and fifty, and toward the west two hundred and fifty. 18. And the residue in length, over against the oblation of the holy portion, shall be ten thousand eastward, and ten thousand westward: and it shall be over against the oblation of the holy portion; and the increase thereof shall be for food unto them that serve the city. 19. And they that serve the city shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel. 20. All the oblation shall be five and twenty thousand by five and twenty thousand: ye shall offer the holy oblation four-square, with the possession of the city. 21. And the residue shall be for the prince, on the one side and on the other of the holy oblation, and of the possession of the city over against the five and twenty thousand of the oblation toward the east border, and westward over against the five and twenty thousand toward the west border, over against the portions for the prince: and it shall be the holy oblation; and the sanctuary of the house shall be in the midst thereof. 22. Moreover, from the possession of the Levites, and from the possession of the city being in the midst of that which is the prince's, between the border of Judah and the border of Benjamin, shall be for the prince. 23. As for the rest of the tribes, from the east side unto the west side, Benjamin shall have a portion. 24. And by the border of Benjamin, from the east side unto the west side, Simeon shall have a portion. 25. And by the border of Simeon, from the east side unto the west side, Issachar a portion. 26. And by the border of Issachar, from the east side unto the west side, Zebulun a portion. 27. And by the border of Zebulun, from the east side unto the west side, Gad a portion. 28. And by the border of Gad, at the south side southward, the border shall be even from Tamar unto the waters of strife in Kadesh, and to the river toward the great sea. 29. This is the land which ye shall divide by lot unto the tribes of Israel for inheritance, and these are their portions, saith the Lord God.

We have here a very short and ready way taken for the dividing of the land among the twelve tribes, not so tedious and so far about as the way that was taken in the time of Joshua. The distribution of spiritual and heavenly blessings there is not that danger of murmuring and quarrelling that there is in the participation of temporal blessings. When God gave to the labourers every one his penny, those that were uneasy at it, were soon put to silence with, May I not do what I will with my own? And such is the equal distribution here among the tribes. In this distribution of the land, we may observe, 1. That it differs very much from the division of it in Joshua's time, and agrees not with the order of their birth, or their blessing by Jacob or Moses. Simeon here is not divided in Jacob, nor is Zebulun a haven of ships; a plain intimation that it is not so much to be understood literally as spiritually; though the mystery of it is very much hidden from us. In good-times old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new. The Israel of God is cast into a new method. 2. That the tribe of Dan, which was last provided for in the first division of Canaan, (Josh. xix. 40,) is first provided for here, v. 1. Thus in the gospel, the last shall be first, Matth. xix. 30. God, in the dispensations of his grace, does not follow the same method that he does in the disposals of his providence. But Dan had now his portion thebeads where he had only one city before, northward, on the border of Damascus, and furthest of all from the sanctuary, because that tribe had revoluted to idolatry.
3. That all the ten tribes, which were carried away by the king of Assyria, as well as the two tribes, which were long after carried to Babylon, have their allotment in this visionary land: which some think had its accomplishment in the particular persons and families of those tribes which returned with Judah and Benjamin, of which we find many instances in Ezra and Nehemiah: it is probable that there were several instances of this in the history of the church, though not recorded at several times, which are not recorded; and the Jews having Galilee, and other parts, that had been the possessions of the ten tribes, put into their hands, in common with them, they enjoyed them. Grotius says, if the ten tribes had repented, and returned to God, as the chief fathers of Judah and Benjamin did, and the priests and Levites, (Ezra i. 5.) they should have tared as those two tribes did, but they forfeited the benefit of this glorious prophecy by sin. However, we believe it has its designed accomplishment in the establishment and enlargement of the gospel-church, and the happy settlement of all those who are Israelites indeed, in the sure and sweet enjoyment of the privileges of the new covenant, in which there is enough for all, and enough for all.

4. That every tribe in this visionary distribution had its particular lot assigned it by a divine appointment; for it was never the intention of the gospel to pluck up the hedge of property, and lay all in common; it was in a way of charity, not of legal right, that the first Christians had all things common; (Acts ii. 44.) many precepts of the gospel supported and confirmed this, which every man should know of his own. And we must not only acknowledge, but acquiesce in the hand of God, appointing us our lot, and be well pleased with it, believing it fittest for us.

He shall choose our inheritance for us, Ps. lxxvi. 4.

5. That the tribes lay contiguous; by the border of one tribe was the portion of another, all in a row, in exact order, so that, like stones in an arch, they fixed, and strengthened, and wedged in, one another. Behold, how good and how pleasant a thing it is for brethren thus to dwell together! It was a figure of the communion of churches and saints under the gospel-government; thus though they are many, yet they are one, and should hold together in holy love and mutual assistance.

7. That the sanctuary was in the midst of them; there were seven tribes to the north of it, and the Levites, the prince’s and the city’s portion, with that of five tribes more, to the south of it; so that it was, as it ought to be, in the heart of the kingdom, that it might diffuse its benign influences to the whole, and might be the centre of their unity. The tribes that lay most remote from each other, would meet there in a mutual acquaintance and fellowship. Those of the same parish or congregation, though dispersed, and having no occasion otherwise to know each other, yet by meeting stately to worship God together should have their hearts knit to each other in holy love.

8. That where the sanctuary was, the priests were: For them, even for the priests, shall this holy oblation be, v. 10. As, on the one hand, this speaks of reward to ministers, that which is given for their support and maintenance is reckoned a holy oblation to the Lord, so it speaks their duty, which is, that since they are appointed and maintained for the service of the sanctuary, they ought to attend continually to this very thing; to reside on their curtes. Those that live upon the altar must serve at the altar, not take the wages to themselves, and devote the work upon others; but how can they serve the altar, his altar they live upon, if they do not live near it?

9. Those priests had the priests’ share of these lands, that had approved themselves faithful to God in times of trials, (v. 1.) It shall be the priests of Zadok, who, it seems, had signalized themselves in some critical juncture, and went not astray when the children of Israel, and the other Levites, went astray. God will put honour upon them, and has special favours in reserve for them, who keep their integrity in times of general apostasy. They are swimming upward, and so they will find at last, that are swimming against the stream.

10. The land which was appropriated to the ministers of the sanctuary, might by no means be alienated. It was in the nature of the first-fruits of the land, and was therefore holy to the Lord; and though the priests and Levites had both the use of it, and the inheritance of it to them and their heirs, yet they might not sell it, or exchange it, v. 14. It is a privilege to convert that to other uses, which is dedicated to God.

11. The land allotted for the city and its suburbs is called a profane place, (v. 15.) or common; but that the city was a holy city above other cities, for the Lord was there, but, in comparison with the sanctuary, it was a profane place. Yet it is too often true in the worst sense, that great cities, even though they be inhabited by the name, and have worship performed in them, are profane places, and it ought to be sadly lamented. It was the complaint of old, From Jerusalem is profaneness gone forth into all the land, Jer. xxiii. 15.

12. The city is made to be exactly four-square, and the suburbs extending themselves equally on all sides, as the Levites' cities did in the first division of the land, (v. 16. 17.) which never being literally fulfilled in any city, intimates that it is to be understood spiritually of the beauty and stability of the gospel-church, that city of the living God, which is formed according to the wisdom and counsel of God, and is made firm and immovable by his promise.

13. Whereas, before, the inhabitants of Jerusalem were principally of Judah and Benjamin, in whose tribe it lay, now, the head city lies not in the particular lot of any of the tribes, but they that serve the city, and bear office in it, shall serve it out of all the tribes of Israel, v. 19. The most eminent men must be picked out of all the tribes of Israel, for the service of the city, because many eyes were upon it, and there was great resort to it from all parts of the nation, and from other nations. They that live in the city are said to serve the city, for, wherever we are, we must study to be serviceable to the place, some way or other, according as our capacity is. They must not come out of the tribes of Israel to serve the city, to take their ease, and enjoy their pleasures, but to serve the city, to do all the good they can there, and in so doing they would have a good influence upon the whole.

14. Care was taken that those who applied themselves to public business in the city, as well as in the sanctuary, should have an honourable, comfortable maintenance: lands are appointed, the increase whereof shall be food unto them that serve the city, v. 18. Who goes a warfare at his own charges? Magistrates, that attend the service of the state, as is as ministerial, that attend the service of the church, should have all due encouragement and support in so doing; and for this cause they we tribute also.

or the geometrical cubic, which, for better expediency, is supposed to be mostly used in surveying lands, which, some say, contained six cubits above three cubic and a half, so making 1600 cubits the same with 1600 paces, that is, an English mile. But our being left at this uncertainty, is an intimation that these things are to be understood spiritually, and that what is principally meant, is, that there is an exact and just proportion observed by Infinite Wisdom in modelling the gospel-church, much though we cannot discern, we shall when we come to heaven.

2. The number of its gates. It had twelve gates in all, three on each side; which was very agreeable when it lay four-square; and these twelve gates inscribed to the twelve tribes. Because the city was to be served out of all the tribes of Israel, (v. 19.) it was fit that each tribe should have its gate; and Levi being here taken in, to keep to the number twelve, Ephraim and Manasseh are made one in Joseph, v. 32. On the north side were the gates of Reuben, Judah, and Levi, v. 31. On the east, the gates of Joseph, Benjamin, and Dan, v. 32. On the south, the gates of Simeon, Issachar, and Zebulun, v. 33. And on the west, the gates of Gad, Asher, and Naphtali, v. 34. And in St. John's vision, the new Jerusalem (for so the holy city is called there, though not here) has twelve gates, three of a side, and on them are written the names of the twelve tribes of the children of Israel, Rev. xxi. 13, 12. Note, Into the church of Christ, both militant and triumphant, there is a free access by faith for all that come of every tribe, from every quarter. Christ has opened the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Whoever will may come, and take of the water of life, of the tree of life, freely.

3. The name given to this city; From that day, when it shall be new-erected according to this model, the name of it shall be, not as before, Jerusalem—the vision of peace, but, which is the original of that, and more than equivalent to it, Jehovah Shammah—The Lord is there, v. 35. This intimated,

(1.) That the captives, after their return, should have manifest tokens of God's presence with them, and his residence among them, both in his ordinances and in his providences; they should have no occasion to ask, as their fathers did, Is the Lord among us, or is he not? For they shall see, and know, that he is there, and shall wonder that, though their troubles were many and threatening, they were like the bush, which burned, but was not consumed, because the Lord was there. But when God departed from their temple, when he said, Miseranus hine—Let us go hence, their house was soon left unto them desolate. Being no longer his, it was not much longer theirs.

(2.) That the gospel-church should likewise have the presence of God in it, though not in the Shechinah, as of old, yet in a token of no less sure, than of his Spirit. Where the gospel is faithfully preached, gospel-ordinances duly administered, and God worshipped in the name of Jesus Christ only, it may truly be said, The Lord is there; for faithful is he that has said it, and he will be as good as his word.

1. I have heard, says the prophet, even unto the end of the world. The Lord is there in his church to rule and govern it, to protect and defend it, and graciously to accept and own his sincere worshippers, and to be nigh unto them in all that they call upon him for. This should engage us to keep close to the communion of saints, for the Lord is there; and then whether else shall we have to fear or to despair? Nay, it is the gospel-church that the Lord is there in his church to rule and govern it, to protect and defend it, and graciously to accept and own his sincere worshippers, and to be nigh unto them in all that they call upon him for. (3.) That the glory and happiness of heaven should consist chiefly in this, that the Lord is there. St. John’s representation of that blessed state does indeed far exceed this, in many respects. That is all gold, and pearls, and precious stones; it is much larger than this, and much brighter, for it needs not the light of the sun. But in making the presence of God the principal matter of its bliss, they both agree. There the happiness of the glorified saints is made to be, that God himself shall be with them, (Rev. xxii. 3.) that he who sits on the throne shall dwell among them, Rev. vii. 15. And here it is made to crown the bliss of this holy city, that the Lord is there. Let us therefore give all diligence to make sure to ourselves a place in that city, that we may be for ever with the Lord.
AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET DANIEL.

THE book of Ezekiel left the affairs of Jerusalem under a doleful aspect, all in ruins, but with a joyful prospect of all in glory again. This of Daniel truly follows. Ezekiel told us what was seen, and what was foreseen, by him in the former years of the captivity: Daniel tells us what was seen, and foreseen, in the latter years of the captivity: when God employs different hands, yet it is about the same work. And it was a comfort to the poor captives, that they had first one prophet among them and then another, to show them how long, and a sign that God had not quite cast them off. Let us inquire,

I. Concerning this prophet; his Hebrew name was Daniel, which signifies the judgment of God; his Chaldee name was Beltschazzar. He was of the tribe of Judah, and, as it should seem, of the royal family; he was betimes eminent for wisdom and piety. Ezekiel, his contemporary, but much his senior, speaks of him as an oracle, when thus he upbraids the king of Tyre with his conceitedness of himself: Thou art wiser than Daniel, Ezek. xxviii. 3. He is likewise there celebrated for success in prayer, when Noah, Daniel, and Job are reckoned as three men that had the greatest interest in heaven of any other, Ezek. xiv. 14. He began betimes to be famous, and continued long so. Some of the Jewish Rabbins are loath to acknowledge him to be a prophet of the higher form, and therefore rank his book among the Hagiographa, not among the prophesies, and would not have their disciples pay much regard to it. One reason they pretend is, because he did not live such a mean, mortified life as Jeremiah and some other of the prophets did, but lived like a prince, and was a prime minister of state; whereas we find him persecuted as other prophets were, (ch. vi.) and mortifying himself as other prophets did, when he ate no pleasant bread, (ch. x. 3.) and fasting and sick when he was under the power of the Spirit of prophecy, ch. viii. 27. Another reason they pretend is, because he wrote his book in a heathen country, and there had his visions, and not in the land of Israel; but, by the same reason, Ezekiel also must be expunged out of the roll of prophets. But the true reason is, he speaks so plainly of the time of the Messiah's coming, that the Jews cannot avoid the conviction of it, and therefore do not care to hear of it. But Josephus calls him one of the greatest of the prophets, nay, the angel Gabriel calls him a man greatly beloved. He lived long an active life in the courts and councils of some of the greatest monarchs the world ever had, Nebuchadnezzar, Cyrus, Darius; for we mistake if we confine the privilege of an intercourse with heaven to speculative men, or those that spend their time in contemplation; no, who was more intimately acquainted with the mind of God than Daniel, a courtier, a statesman, and a man of business. The Spirit, as the wind, bloweth where it listeth. And if those that have much to do in the world, plead that as an excuse for the coldness and the slightness of their converse with God, Daniel will condemn them. Some have thought that he returned to Jerusalem, and was one of the masters of the Greek synagogue; but nothing of that appears in scripture, it is therefore generally concluded that he died in Persia, at Susa, where he lived to be very old.

II. Concerning this book. The first six chapters of it are historical, and are plain and easy; the six last are prophetical, and in them are many things dark, and hard to be understood; which yet would be more intelligible if we had a more complete history of the nations, and especially the Jewish nation, from Daniel's time to the coming of the Messiah. Our Saviour intimates the difficulty of apprehending the sense of Daniel's prophecies, when speaking of them, he says, Let him that readeth understand, Matth. xxiv. 15. The first chapter, and the three first verses of the second chapter, are in Hebrew; thence to the eighth chapter is in the Chaldean dialect; thence to the end is in Hebrew. Mr. Broughton observes, That, as the Chaldeans were kind to Daniel, and gave cups of cold water to him when he requested it, rather than the king's wine, God would not have them lose their reward, but made that language which they taught him, to have honour in his writings through all the world unto this day. Daniel, according to his computation, continues the holy story from the first surprising of Jerusalem by the Chaldean Babel, when he himself was carried away captive, until the last destruction of it by Rome, the mystical Babel, for so far forward his predictions look, ch. ix. 27. The fables of Susanna, and of Bel and the Dragon, in both which Daniel is made a party, are apochryphal stories, which we think we have no reason to give any credit to, they never being found in the Hebrew or Chaldee, but only in the Greek, nor ever admitted by the Jewish church. There are some, both of the histories and the prophecies of this book, that bear date in the latter end of the Chaldee monarchy, and others of both, that are dated in the beginning of the Persian monarchy. But both Nebuchadnezzar's dream, which he interpreted, and his own visions, point at the Greek and Roman monarchies, and very particularly at the Jews' troubles under Antiochus, which it would be of great use to them to prepare for; as his fixing the very time for the coming of the Messiah, was to all them that waited the consolation of Israel, and is to us, for the confirming of our belief, That this is he who should come, and we are to look for no other.
CHAP. I.

This chapter gives us a more particular account of the beginning of Daniel's life, his original and education, than we have of any other of the prophets. Isaiah, Jeremia, and Ezekiel began immediately with divine visions; but Daniel began with the study of human learning, and was afterward honoured with divine visions; such a distinction shows God's wisdom in ordering all things for the service of his church. We have here, I. Jehoiakim's first captivity, (v. 1, 2,) in which Daniel, with others of the seed royal, was carried to Babylon. II. The election made of Daniel, and some other young men, to be brought up in the Chaldean literature, that they might be fitted to serve the government, and the provision made for them, v. 3-7. III. Their pious refusals to eat the porridge that the king's messengers brought them, being determined to live upon pulse and water, which, having tried it, the master of the eunuchs allowed them to do, finding that it agreed very well with them, v. 8-16. IV. Their wonderful improvement, above all their fellows, in wisdom and knowledge, v. 17-21.

1. In the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon unto Jerusalem, and besieged it. 2. And the Lord gave Jehoiakim king of Judah into his hand, with part of the vessels of the house of God, which he carried into the land of Shinar, to the house of his god; and he brought the vessels into the treasure-house of his god. 3. And the king spake unto Ashpenaz the master of his eunuchs, that he should bring certain of the children of Israel, and of the king's seed, and of the princes; 4. Children in whom was no blemish, but well-favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace, and whom they might teach the learning and the tongue of the Chaldeans. 5. And the king appointed them a daily provision of the king's meat, and of the wine which he drank; so nourishing them three years, that at the end thereof they might stand before the king. 6. Now among these were of the children of Judah, Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah; 7. Unto whom the prince of the eunuchs gave names: for he gave unto Daniel, the name of Belteshazzar; and to Hananiah, of Shadrach; and to Mishael, of Meshach; and to Azariah, of Abednego.

We have, in these verses, an account, 1. Of the first descent which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, in the first year of his reign, made upon Judah and Jerusalem, in the third year of the reign of Jehoiakim, and his success in that expedition; (v. 1, 2,) he besieged Jerusalem, soon made himself master of it, seized the king, took whom he pleased, and what he pleased, away with him, and then left Jehoiakim to reign as tributary to him, which he did about eight years longer; but then re- belling, and putting him to death, he carried them captive. Most interpreters think the seventy years are to be dated, though Jerusalem was not destroyed, nor the captivity completed, till about nineteen years after. In that first year Daniel was carried to Babylon, and there continued the whole seventy years, (see v. 21,) during which time all nations shall serve Nebuchadnezzar, and his son, and his son's son, Jer. xxv. 11. So that this one prophet saw within the compass of his own time, the rise, reign, and ruin of that monarchy; and that it was res unius etatis—the affair of a single age; such short-lived things are the kingdoms of the earth, but the kingdom of heaven is everlasting. The righteous, that see them taking root, shall see their fall, Joel v. 5. Prov. xxix. 16. Mr. Brughton observes the proportion of times in God's government since the coming out of Egypt; thence to their entering Canaan forty years, thence seven years to the dividing of the land, thence seven Jubilees to the first year of Samuel, in whom prophecy began; thence to this first year of the captivity seventy years, 490; (ten Jubilees,) thence to the return, one seventy, thence to the death of Christ, seven times seven, and then thence to the destruction of Jerusalem forty years. 11. The improvement he made of this success; he did not destroy the city or kingdom, but did that which just accomplished the first threatening of mischief by Babylon; it was that denounced against Hezekiah for showing his treasures to the king of Babylon's ambassadors, (Isa. xxxix. 6, 7,) that the vessels and the children should be carried away, and if they had been humbled and reformed by this, hitherto the king of Babylon's power and success should have gone, but no further. If lesser judgments do the work, God will not send greater; but if not, he will heat the furnace seven times hotter. Let us see what was now done.
of their own nation; or because he knew that there were no such witty, sprightly, ingenious young men to be found among his Chaldeans, as abounded among the youth of Israel; and if that were so, it was much for the honour of the Jewish nation, as of an uncommon genius above other people, and a fruit of the blessing. But it was a shame that a people which had so much wit, should have so little wisdom and grace. No doubt, observe, this was an instance by which the king of Babylon gave the choice of these youths, v. 4. They must not choose such as were deformed in body, but comely and well-favoured, whose countenances were index of ingenuity and good humour; but that is not enough, they must be skilful in all wisdom and cunning, or well-seen in knowledge, and understanding science, who were quick and sharp, and could give a ready answer in their affairs. This is an instance of the policy of this rising monarch, now in the beginning of his reign, and was a good omen of his prosperity, that he was in care to raise up a succession of persons fit for public business. He did not, like Ahasuerus, appoint them to choose him out young men for the service of his lusts, but young men for the service of his government. It is the interest of princes to have wise men employed under them; it is therefore their wisdom to take care for the finding out and training up of such. It is the misery of this world, that so many who are fit for public stations are buried in obscurity, and so many who are unfit for them are preferred to them.

First. For their education. He ordered that they should be taught the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans. They are supposed to be wise and knowing young men, and yet they must be further taught; Give instruction to a wise man, and he will increase in learning. Note, Those that would do good in the world when they are grown up, must learn when they are young. That is the learning age; if that time be lost, it will hardly be redeemed. It does not appear that Nebuchadnezzar designed they should learn anything that was not useful among the Chaldeans, magic and divination; if he did, Daniel and his fellows would not defile themselves with them. Nay, we do not find that he ordered them to be taught the religion of the Chaldeans; by this it appears that he was at this time no bigot; if men were skilful and faithful, and fit for his business, it was not material to him what religion they were. But that they had but little learning. They must be trained up in the language and laws of the country, in history, philosophy, and mathematics; in the arts of husbandry, war, and navigation; in such learning as might qualify them to serve their generation. Note, It is real service to the public to provide for the good education of youth.

Secondly. For their maintenance. He provided for them. Provided they had necessary religion, but dainties, for their encouragement in their studies; they had daily provision of the king’s meat, and of the wine which he drank, v. 5. This was an instance of his generosity and humanity; though they were his captives, he considered their birth and quality, their spirit and genius, and treated them honourably, and studied to make their captivity easy to them. There is a respect owing to those who are well-born and well-educated, when they are fallen into distress. With a liberal education there should be a liberal maintenance.

III. A particular account of Daniel and his fellows; they were of the children of Judah, the royal tribe, and, probably, of the house of David, which was grown a numerous family; and God told Hezekiah, that of the children that should issue from him, some should be taken, and made eunuchs, or chamberlains, in the palace of the king of Babylon. The prince of the eunuchs changed the names of Daniel and his fellows, partly to show his authority over them, and partly to make them appear as if some of being naturalized, and made Chaldeans. Their Hebrew names, which they received at their circumcision had something of God, or Jah in them; Daniel—God is my Judge; Hanuniah—The grace of the Lord; Mishael—He that is the strong God; Azariah—The Lord is a Help; to make them forget the God of their fathers, the Guide of their youth, they give them names that savour of the Chaldean idolatry; Belteshazzar signifies, the keeper of the hid treasures of Bel; Shadrach—the inspiration of the sun, which the Chaldeans worshipped; Meshach—of the goddess Shaca, under which name Venus was worshipped; Abed-negu—The servant of the shining fire, which they worshipped also. Thus, though they would not force them from the religion of their fathers to that of their masters, yet they did what they could by fair means, insensibly to wean them from the former, and instil the latter into them. Yet see how comfortably they were provided for: though they suffered for their father’s sins, they were preferred for their own merits; and the land of their captivity was made more comfortable to them than the land of their nativity at this time would have been.

8. But Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king’s meat, nor with the wine which he drank; therefore he requested the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself. 9. Now God had brought Daniel into favour and tender love with the prince of the eunuchs. 10. And the prince of the eunuchs said unto Daniel, I fear my lord the king, who hath appointed your meat and your drink: for why should he see your faces worse liking than the children which are of your sort? then shall ye make me endanger my head to the king?

11. Then said Daniel to Melzar, whom the prince of the eunuchs had set over Daniel, Hanuniah, Mishael, and Azariah, 12. Prove thy servants, I beseech thee, ten days; and let them give us pulse to eat, and water to drink. 13. Then let our countenances be looked upon before thee, and the countenance of the children that eat of the portion of the king’s meat; and as thou seest, deal with thy servants. 14. So he consented to them in this matter, and proved them ten days. 15. And at the end of ten days their countenances appeared fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king’s meat. 16. Thus Melzar took away the portion of their meat, and the wine that they should drink, and gave them pulse.

We observe here, very much to our satisfaction,
1. That Daniel was a favourite with the prince of the eunuchs, (v. 9.) as Joseph was with the keeper of the prison: he had a tender love for him. No doubt, Daniel deserved it, and recommended himself by his ingenuity, his sweetness, and his tenderness; he was greatly beloved, (ch. ix. 23.) and yet it appears here, God brought him into favour with the prince of the eunuchs, for every one does not meet with acceptance according to his merits. Note, The interest which we think we make for ourselves, we must acknowledge to be God’s gift, and must ascribe to him the glory of it. Whoever are in favour, it is God that has brought them into it; and it is by him that they find good understanding. Herein was again verified that word, (Ps. cvi. 46.) He made them to be hallowed of all those that carried them captive. Let young ones know that the way to be acceptable is to be tractable and dutiful.

2. That Daniel was still firm to his religion. They had changed his name, but they could not change his nature; whatever they pleased to call him, he still retained the spirit of an Israelite indeed. He would apply his mind as closely as any of them all to his books, and took pains to make himself master of the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans; but he was resolved that he would not defile himself with the portion of the king’s meat; he would not meddle with it, nor with the wine which he drank; v. 8. And here, Daniel’s application of it to his fellows, they conformed in the same resolution, as appears, v. 11. This was not out of sulleness, or peevishness, or a spirit of contradiction, but from a principle of conscience. Perhaps it was not in itself unlawful for them to eat of the king’s meat, or to drink of his wine. But, (1.) They were scrupulous concerning the meat, lest it should be sinful to rear up in them objects of which we would let those among them as was expressly forbidden by their law, as swine’s flesh; or they were afraid lest it should have been offered in sacrifice to an idol, or blessed in the name of an idol. The Jews were distinguished from other nations very much by their meats; (Lev. xx. 26.) and these pious young men, being in a strange country, thought themselves obliged to keep up the honour of their being a peculiar people. Though they could not keep up their dignity as princes, they would not lose it as Israelites; for on that they most valued themselves. Note, When God’s people are in Babylon, they have need to take special care that they partake not in her sins. Providence seemed to lay this meat before them; being captives, they must eat what they could get, and must not displease their masters yea, and in command be against it, they must abide by that; though Providence says, Kill, and eat; conscience says, Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean has come into my mouth. (2.) They were jealous over themselves, lest, though it should not be sinful in itself, it should be an occasion of sin to them; lest, by indulging their appetites with these dainties, that divinity of their masters yea, and in command be against it, they must abide by that; though Providence says, Kill, and eat; conscience says, Not so, Lord, for nothing common or unclean has come into my mouth. (Ps. cxv. 4.) and Solomon’s precept, Be not desireous of dainties, for they are deceitful meat; (Prov. xxiii. 3.) and accordingly they form their resolution. Note, It is very much to the praise of all, and especially of young people, to be dead to the delights of sense; still to use such language to God as he teaches us to look upon them with indifferency. Those that would excel in wisdom and piety, must learn betimes to keep under the body, and bring it into subjection. (5.) However, they thought it unseasonable now, when Jerusalem was in distress, and they themselves in captivity. They had no heart to drink wine in bowls, so much were they grieved for the affliction of Joseph. Though they had royal blood in their veins, yet they did not think it proper to have royal dainties in their months when they were thus brought low. Note, It becomes us to be humble under humbling providences. Call me not Naomi, call me Mahal. See the benefit of affliction; for the account Jerimiah gives of the princes and great men now at Jerusalem, it appears that they were very corrupt and wicked, and defiled themselves with things offered to idols, while these young gentlemen that were in captivity, would not defile themselves, no, not with their portion of the king’s meat. How much better it is with those that retain their integrity in time of affliction, than with those that retain their iniquity in the heights of prosperity! Observe, The great thing that Daniel avoided, was, defiling himself with the pollutions of sin; that is the thing we should be more afraid of than of any outward trouble. Daniel, having taken up this resolution, requested of the prince of the eunuchs that he might not defile himself, not only that he might not be compelled to do it, but that he might not be tempted to do it; that the heart might not be laid before him; that he might not see the portion appointed him of the king’s meats, nor look upon the wine when it was red; it will be easier to keep the temptation at a distance than to suffer it to come near, and then be forced to put a knife to our throat. Note, We cannot better improve our interest in any with whom we have found favour than make known it to them.

3. That God wonderfully owned him herein; when Daniel requested that he might have none of the king’s meat or wine set before him, the prince of the eunuchs objected, that if he and his fellows were not found in as good case as any of their companions, he should be in danger of having anger, and of losing his head. Daniel, to satisfy him that there would be no danger of any bad consequence, desires the matter might be put to a trial. He applies himself further, to the under-officer, Melzar, or the steward; (v. 9.)—Prove us for ten days; during that time let us have nothing but pulse to eat, nothing but herbs and fruits, or parched peas or lentils, and nothing but water to drink, and see how we can live upon that, and prove ourselves and our God acceptable.” v. 12. People will not have the benefit of abstinence and a spare diet, nor how much it contributes to the health of the body, unless they try it. Trial was accordingly made; Daniel and his companions lived for ten days upon pulse and water, hard fare for young men of genteel extraction and education, and which one would rather expect they should have counted against them, as being polluted for; but at the end of ten days they were compared with the other children, and were found fatter and fatter in flesh, of a more healthful look, and a better complex than all those which did eat the portion of the king’s meat, v. 15. This was in part a natural effect of their temperance, but it must be ascribed to the special blessing of God, which will give strength and vigour to them that are penitent of herbs better than a stalled ox. By this it appears that man lives not by bread alone; pulse and water shall be the most nourishing food if God speak the word. See what it is to keep ourselves pure from the pollutions of sin, it is the way to have that comfort and satisfaction which will be health to the navel and marrow to the bones, while the pleasures of sin are a rattling wind.

4. That his master commended him. The steward did not force them to eat against their consciences, but, as they desired, gave them pulse and water, (v. 16.) the pleasures of which they enjoyed, and we have reason to think were not envied the enjoyment. Here is a great example of temperance and contentment with mean things; and (Epictetus said) “He that lives according to nature will never be poor, but he that lives according to opinion will never be rich." This wonderful abstinen-ness of these young men in the days of their youth contributed to the fitting of them, (1.) For their eminently clear and unclouded, and fit for contemplation, and saved for the best employments a great deal both of life and time, and thus they prevented those diseases which attend the business of age, that owe their rise to the intemperance of youth. (2.) For their eminent sufferings. They that had thus inured themselves to hardship, and died a life of self-denial and mortification, could the more easily venture upon the fiery furnace and the den of lions, rather than sin against God.

17. As for these four children, God gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: and Daniel had understanding in all visions and dreams. 18. Now, at the end of the days that the king had said he should bring them in, then the prince of the eunuchs brought them in before Nebuchadnezzar. 19. And the king communed with them: and amongst them all was found none
like Daniel, Hananiah, Mishael, and Azariah: therefore stood they before the king.
20. And in all matters of wisdom and understanding, that the king inquired of them,
he found them ten times better than all the magicians and astrologers that were in all his realm. 21. And Daniel continued even unto the first year of king Cyrus.

Concerning Daniel and his fellows, we have here,
1. Their great attainments in learning, v. 17.
They were very sober and diligent, and studied hard; and we may suppose their tutors, finding them of an uncommon capacity, took a deal of pains with them, but, after all, their achievements are ascribed to God only: it was he that gave them knowledge and skill in all learning and wisdom: for every good and perfect gift is from above, from the Father of lights; it is the Lord our God that gives men power to get this wealth; the mind is furnished
only by him that formed it. The great learning with which God gave these four children was, (1.) A balance for the scales: they had, by the gift of their fathers, been deprived of the honours and pleasures that would have attended their noble extrication; but, to make them amends for that, God,
in giving them learning, gave them better honours
and pleasures than those they had been deprived of.
(2.) A recompense for their integrity: they kept to their religion, even in the minutest instances of it, and would not so much as stain themselves with the king's meat or wine, but became in effect, Nazrites; and now God rewarded them for it with an eminency in learning; for God gives to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom and knowledge, and joy with them, Eccl. ii. 26. To Daniel he gave even in his own eyes; they could not fail to be men of a peculiar dignity and wisdom which God gave him. Nay, he was endued with a prophetic spirit, by which he was enabled to converse with God, and to receive the notices of divine things in dreams and visions, Num. xii. 6. According to this gift given to Daniel, we find him, in this book, all along employed in dreams and visions, interpreting or entertaining them; for as every one has received the gift,
A ND in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuchadnezzar dreamed dreams, wherewith his spirit was troubled, and his sleep brake from him.

2. Then the king commanded to call the magicians, and the astrologers, and the sorcerers, and the Chaldeans, for to shew the king his dreams. So they came and stood before the king.

3. And the king said unto them, Have ye skill to shew me the interpretation of these dreams? They made answer and said, My lord, the dream be to them, but how to shew the interpretation thereof is not in them.

4. Then the king said, In whose hand shall be the power to shew the interpretation of these dreams? There was fear in the heaven, and none was able to shew the king this matter.

5. Then Daniel came in and stood before the king.

6. And the king said, I have in my dream no pleasure, but such a one as troubleth me.

7. I dreamed, and mine spirit was troubled; for there was in mine hand a dream, and my spirit was troubled to know the dream.

8. Then said I, O Daniel, my servant, shew me the interpretation of the dream unto me.

9. Then Daniel spake and said to the Chaldeans, The thing is gone from me: if ye will not make known unto me the dream, with the interpretation thereof, ye shall be cut in pieces, and your houses shall be made a dunghil.

10. But if ye shew the dream, and the interpretation thereof, ye shall receive of me gifts, and rewards, and great honour: therefore shew me the dream and the interpretation thereof.

11. They answered and said, Let the king tell his servants the dream, and we will shew the interpretation of it.

12. The king answered and said, I know of certainty that ye would gain the time, because ye see the thing is gone from me. But if ye will not make known unto me the dream, there is but one decree for you; for ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me till the time be changed; therefore tell me the dream, and I shall know that ye can shew me the interpretation thereof.

13. The Chaldeans answered before the king, and said, There is not a man upon the earth that can shew the king's matter: therefore there is no king, lord, nor ruler, that asked such things at any magician, or astrologer, or Chaldean. And it is a rare thing that the king requireth; and there is none other that can shew it before the king except the gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh.

14. For this cause the king was angry and very furious, and commanded to destroy all the wise men of Babylon. 15. And the decree went forth that the wise men should be slain; and they sought Daniel and his fellows to be slain.

We meet with a great difficulty in the date of this story; it is said to be in the second year of the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, v. 1. Now Daniel was carried to Babylon in his first year, and, it should seem, he was three years under tutors and governors, before he was presented to the king, ch. 1. 5. How then could this happen in the second year? Perhaps though three years were appointed for the education of other children, yet Daniel was so farward, that he was taken, in consequence of his being a Hebrew, to be kept one year at school, and so in the second year he became thus considerable. Some make it to be the second year after he began to reign alone, but the fifth or sixth year since he began to reign in partnership with his father. Some read it, and in the second year, (the second after Daniel and his fellows stood before the king,) in the kingdom of Nebuchadnezzar, or in his reign, this happened; as Joseph, in the second year after his skill in dreams, showed, expounded Pharaoh's, so Daniel, in the second year after he commenced master in that art, did this service. I would much rather take it in some of these ways, than suppose, as some do, that it was in the second year after he had conquered Egypt, which was the thirty-sixth year of his reign, by cause it appears, by what we meet with in Babylon, that Daniel was famous both for wisdom, and prevalence in prayer, long before that; and therefore this passage, or story, which shows how he came to be so eminent for both these, must be laid early in Nebuchadnezzar's reign. Now here we may observe,

1. The perplexity that Nebuchadnezzar was in, by reason of a dream which he had dreamed, but had forgotten; (v. 1.) He dreamed a dream, a dream consisting of diviers distinct parts, or which filled his head as much as if it had been many dreams. Solomon speaks of a multitude of dreams, strangely incoherent, in which there are divers vanities, Eccl. v. 7. This dream of Nebuchadnezzar's had nothing in the thing itself but what might be paralleled in many a common dream; but it was so presented to men things as foreign as this here; but there was something in the impression it made upon him, which carried with it an incontrovertible evidence of its divine original, and its prophetic significance.

Note. The greatest of men are not exempt from any, they lie most open to those cares and troubles of mind, which disturb their repose in the night, while the sleep of the labouring man is sweet and sound, and the sleep of the sober, temperate man free from confused dreams; the abundance of the rich will not suffer them to sleep at all for care, and the excesses of glutons and drunkards will not suffer them to sleep quietly for dreaming. But this recorded here was not from natural causes. Nebuchadnezzar was a tyrant of God's Israel, but God here troubled him; for he that made the soul can make his sword to approach to it. He had his guards about him, but they could not keep trouble from his spirit. We know not the unseasonableness of many that live in great pomp, and, one would think, in pleasure too. We look into their houses, and are tempted to envy them; but, could we look into their hearts, we should pity them rather. All the treasures and all the pleasures of the children of men, which this mighty monarch had the command of, could not procure him a little respite, when by reason of the trouble of his mind his sleep brake from him; but God gave his beloved sleep, who return to him as their Rest.

Vol. iv—51
2. The trial that he made of his magicians and astrologers, whether they could tell him what his dream meant. God had foretold to Daniel that he should be immediately sent for, to show the king his dreams, v. 2. There are many things which we retain the impressions of, and yet have lost the images of the things; though we cannot tell what the matter was, we know how we were affected with it; so it was with this king. His dream had slipped out of his mind, and he could not possibly recollect it, but was confident he had known it if he had known it. God ordered it so that Daniel might have the more honour, and, in him, the God of Daniel. Note, God sometimes serves his own purposes by putting things out of men's minds as well as by putting things into their minds. The magicians, it is likely, were proud of their being sent for into the king's bed-chamber, to give him a taste of their office, not doubting but it would be for their honor. He tells them that he had dreamed a dream, v. 3. They speak to him in the Syrian tongue, which was then the same with the Chaldee, but now they differ much. And from henceforward Daniel uses that language, or dialect of the Hebrew, for the same reason that those words, Jer. x. 11. are in that language, because designed to convince the Chaldeans of the folly of their idolatry, and to bring them to the knowledge of the truth. This was a part of God, which the stories of these chapters have a direct tendency to; but ch. viii. and forward, being intended for the comfort of the Jews, is written in their peculiar language. They, in their answer, complimented the king with their good wishes, desired him to tell his dream, and undertook with all possible assurance to interpret it, v. 4. But the king insisted upon it, that they must tell him the dream itself; because he had forgotten it, and could not tell it them. And if they could not do this, they should all be put to death as deceivers, (v. 5.) themselves cut to pieces, and their houses made a dung-hill. If they could, they should be rewarded and preferred, v. 6. And they knew, as Balaam did concerning Balak, that he was able to promote them to great honour, and give them that wages of unrighteousness, which, like him, they loved so dearly: no question therefore that they would do their utmost to gratify the king; if they do not, it is not for want of good will, but for want of power; Providence so ordering it, that the magicians of Babylon might now be as much confounded and put to shame as of old the magicians of Egypt had been; that, how much soever his people were both in Egypt and Babylon vilified and made contemptible, his oracles might in both be magnified and made honourable, by the silencing of those that set up in competition with them. The magicians, having reason on their side, insist upon it, that the king must tell them the dream, and then, if they do not tell him the interpretation of it, it is their fault, v. 7. But arbitrary power is deaf to reason; the king faulted them in offering so much to conceal the dream without any colour of reason, suspects that they could tell him, but would not; instead of upbraiding them with impotence, and the deficiency of their art, as he might justly have done, he charges them with a combination to affront him; Ye have prepared lying and corrupt words to speak before me. How unreasonable and absurd is this imputation! If they could not tell him the dream themselves, what was, and had imposed upon him with a sham, he might have charged them with lying and corrupt words; but to say this of them, when they honestly confessed their own weakness, only shows what baseless things indulged passions are, and how apt great men are to think it is their prerogative to pursue their humour, in defiance of reason and equity, and all the dictates of both. When the magicians begged of him to tell them the dream, though the request was highly rational and just, he tells them they must tell it himself; they were then told (v. 8.) till the time be changed, (v. 9.) either till the king's desire to know his dream be over, and he grown indifferent whether he be told it or no, though now he is so hot upon it, or till they may hope he has so perfectly forgotten his dream, (the remaining shades of which are slipping from him as he catches at them,) that they may tell him what they please, and make him believe it was his dream, and, when the thing which is going, is quite gone from him, as it will be in a little time, he will not be able to dispute them. And therefore, without delay, they must tell him the dream. In vain do they plead, (1.) That there is no man on earth that can retrieve the king's dream, v. 10. There are settled rules by which to discover what the meaning of the dream was: whether they will hold or no, is the question. But never were any rules offered to be given, by which to discover what the dream was; they cannot work unless they have something to work upon. They acknowledge that the gods may indeed declare unto man what is his thought, (Amos iv. 13.) for he understands our thoughts after off; (Ps. cxxxix. 2.) what they will be before we think them, what they are when we know them, but not reserved or hid from us. And we have forgotten them. But those who can do this, are gods that have not their dwelling with flesh, (v. 11.) and it is they alone that can do this. As for men, their dwelling is with flesh, the wisest and greatest of men are clouded with a veil of flesh which quite obstructs and confounds all their acquaintance with spirits, and their powers and operations; but the gods, that are themselves pure spirits, know what is in man. See here an instance of the ignorance of these magicians, that they speak of many gods, whereas there is but one, and can be but one infinite; yet see their knowledge of that which even the light of nature teaches, and the works of nature prove; that there is a God, who is a Spirit, and perfectly knows the spirits of men, and all their thoughts, so as it is not possible that any man should. This confession of the divine omniscience is here extrated from these idolaters, to the honour of God, and their own condemnation, who, though they know there is a God in heaven, to whom all hearts are open, all desires known, and from whom no secret is hid, yet offered up their prayers and praises to dumb idols, that have eyes and see not, ears and hear not. (2.) That there is nothing on earth that would expect or require such a thing, v. 10. This intimates that they were kings, lords, and potentates, not ordinary people, that the magicians had most dealings with, and at whose devotion they were, while the oracles of God, and the gospel of Christ, are dispensed to the poor. Kings and potentates have often required unreasonable things of their subjects, but they think that never any reason is quite so unreasonably required of them as that, where no other hope his imperial majesty will not insist upon it. But it is all in vain, when passion is in the throne reason is under feet: he was angry and very furious, v. 12. Note, It is very common for those that will not be convinced by reason, to be provoked and exasperated by it, and to push on with fury what they cannot support with equity.
We have found already in Ezekiel, that Daniel was famous both for prudence and prayer: as a prince, he had power with God and man; by prayer he had power with God, by prudence he had power with men, and in both he prevailed; thus did he find favour and good understanding in the sight of both. In these verses, we have a remarkable instance of both.

1. Daniel by prudence knew how to deal with men, and he prevailed with them. When Arioch, the captain of the guard, that was appointed to slay all the wise men of Babylon, the whole college of them, seized Daniel, (for the sword of tyranny, like the sword of war, devours one as well as another,) he answered with counsel and wisdom; (v. 14.) he did not stretch himself out to give the king all the satisfaction he desired, v. 16. The king, being now sensible of his error in not sending for Daniel sooner, whose character he began to recollect, was soon prevailed with to reprieve the judgment, and make trial of Daniel. Note, The likeliest method to turn away wrath, even the wrath of a king, which is as the messenger of death, is by a soft answer, by that yielding with meekness, which makes a great difference, where the word of a king is, there is favour, yet even that word may be repelled, and that so as to be repealed; and so some read it here, (v. 14.) Then Daniel returned, and stayed the counsel and edict, through Arioch, the king's provost-marshal.

11. Daniel knew how by prayer to converse with God, and he found favour with him, both in petition and in thanksgiving. Offerings and prayers are the two principal parts of prayer. Observe, 1. His humble petition for this mercy, that God would discover to him what was the king's dream, and the interpretation of it. When he had gained time, he did not go to consult with the rest of the wise men, whether there was anything in their art, in their books, in their knowledge, or in their memory, but went to his house, there to be alone with his God, for from him alone, who is the Father of lights, he expected this great gift.

Observe, (1.) He did not only pray for this discovery himself, but he engaged his companions to pray for it too. He made the thing known to them, who had been all along his bosom friends and companions, that they would desire mercy of God concerning this secret, v. 17, 18. Though Daniel was, probably, their senior, and every way excelled them, yet he engaged them as partners with him in this matter. Thereunto the prophet, The union of forces produces greater force. See Esth. iv. 16. Note, Praying friends are valuable friends; it is good to have the company of wise friends with whom we have fellowship with God, and an interest at the throne of grace; and it well becomes the greatest and best of men to desire the assistance of the prayers of others for them. St. Paul bespeaks his friends to pray for him. Thus we must show that we put a value upon our friends, upon prayer, upon their prayers.

(2.) He was particular in this prayer, but had an eye to, and a dependence upon, the general mercy of God; that they would desire mercy of the God of heaven concerning this secret, v. 18. We ought in prayer to look up to God as the God of heaven, a God above us, and who has dominion over us, to whom we owe adoration and allegiance, a God of power, who can do every thing. Our Saviour has taught us to pray to God as our Father in heaven. And whatever good we pray for, our dependence must be upon the mercies of God for it, and an interest in those mercies we must desire; we can expect nothing by way of recompense for our merit, but all as the gift of God's mercies. They desire mercy concerning this thing and the other thing, that occasions us trouble and fear. God gives us leave to be humbly free with him, and in prayer to enter into the detail of our wants and burdens. Secret things belong to the Lord our God, and therefore, if there be any mercy desired, or any light or comfort wanted, let us in faith pray for the very thing itself, that God may apply it to our souls. We must apply ourselves; and though we cannot in faith pray for miracles, yet we may in faith pray to him who has all hearts in his hand, and who in his providence does wonders without miracles, for the discovery of that which is out of our view, and the obtaining of that which is out of our reach, as far as is for his glory and our good, believing that to him nothing is hid, nothing is hard.

(3.) Their plea with God was, the imminent peril they were in; they desired mercy of God in this matter, that so Daniel and his fellows might not perish with the rest of the wise men of Babylon, that the righteous might not be destroyed with the wicked.

Note. When the lives of good and useful men are in danger, it is time to be earnest with God for mercy. Some secret things are appointed by God for us, and we must apply ourselves to God in prayer, and with some degree of passion and vehemence, and this will be very welcome and acceptable with God. Let us learn to be earnest and importunate in our prayers.

(4.) The mercy which Daniel and his fellows prayed for, was bestowed. The secret was revealed unto Daniel in a night-vision, v. 19.

Some think he dreamed the same dream when he was asleep, that Nebuchadnezzar had dreamed; it should rather seem that when he was awake, and continuing instant in prayer, and watching in the same, the dream itself, and the interpretation of it, was very effectually communicated to him by the ministry of an angel, abundantly to his satisfaction.

Note. The effectual fervent prayer of righteous men availeth much. There are mysteries and secrets which by prayer we are let into; with that key the cabinets of heaven are unlocked, for Christ has said, Thus knock, and it shall be opened unto you.

First. He who is给自己 for this mercy, when he had received it; Then Daniel blessed God of heaven, v. 19. He did not stay till he had told it to the king, and seem whether he would own it to be his dream or no, but is confident that it is so, and that he has gained his point, and therefore he immediately turns his prayers into praises. As he had prayed in a full assurance that God would do this for him, so he gave thanks, in a full assurance that he had done it, and in both he had an eye to God as the God of heaven. His prayer was not recorded, but his thanksgiving is. Observe,

(1.) The honour he gives to God in his thanksgiving, which he studies to do in a great variety and copiousness of expression; Blessed be the name of God for ever and ever. There is that for ever in God, which is to be esteemed and praised, and preserved changing and eternal in him. And it is to be blessed for ever and ever; as the matter of praise is God's eternal perfection, so the work of praise shall be everlasting in the doing. [1.] He gives to God the glory of what he is in himself; Wisdom and might are his. Wisdom and courage; so some.

Whatever is fit to be done, he will do; whatever he will do, he will do successfully; then will he be able to do it in the best manner; for he has infinite wisdom to design and contrive, and infinite power to execute and accomplish; with him are strength and wisdom, which in men are often parted. [2.] He gives him the glory of what he is to the world of mankind. He has a universal influence and agency upon all the children of men, and all their actions and affairs. Are the times changed? Is the posture of affairs altered? Does every thing lie open to mutation? It is God that changes the times and the seasons, and the face of them. No change comes to pass by chance, but according to the will and counsel of God. Are all the prophecies that were known to him; does he move and depose? Do they alculate? Are they laid aside? Is it God that removes kings? Are the poor raised out of the dust, to be set among princes? It is God that sets up kings; and the making and removing of kings is a flower of his crown, who is the Fountain of all power, King of kings and Lord of lords. Are there men that excel others in wisdom, and who are great in the kingdom, and much admired by the common rate, contemplative, penetrating men? It is God that gives wisdom to the wise, whether they be so wise as to acknowledge it or no; they have it not of themselves, but it is he that gives knowledge to them that know understanding; which is a good reason why we should not be proud of our knowledge, and why we should serve and honour God with it, and make it our business to know him. [3.] He gives him the glory of this particular discovery. He praises him.

First. For that God could make such a discovery; (v. 22.) He reveals the deep and secret things, which are hid from the eyes of all living; it was he that revealed to man what is true wisdom, when none else could; (Job xxxvii. 27, 28.) It is he that reveals things to us, that are hid from us, and himself perfectly discern and distinguish that which is most closely and most industriously concealed, for he will bring into judgement every secret thing, the truth will be evident in the great day. He knows what is in the darkness, and what is done in the darkiness, for that hides not from him, Ps. cxxxv. 11, 12. The light dwells with him, and he dwells in the light; (1 Tim. vi. 16.) and yet he is invisible and darkness is his pavilion. Some understand it of the light of prophecy and divine revelation, which dwells with God, and is derived from him; for he is the Father of lights, of all lights, they are all at home in him.

Secondly. For that God had made this discovery to him. Here he has an eye to God as the God of his fathers; Jews were now captives in Babylon, yet they were beloved for their fathers' sake. He praises God who is the Fountain of wisdom and might, for the wisdom and might he had given him; wisdom to know this great secret, and might to hear the discovery. Note, What wisdom and might we have, we must acknowledge it to be God's gift; Thou hast made this known to me, v. 23. What was hid from the celebrated Chaldeans, who made the interpreting of dreams their profession, is revealed to Daniel, a captive Jew, a bable, much their junior. God would hereby put honour upon the spirit of prophecy then when he was putting contempt upon the spirit of divination. Was Daniel thus thankful to God for making known to him, which was the saving of the lives of him and his friends? Much more was given him for making known to us the great salvation of the soul to us, and not to the world, to us, and not to the wise and prudent.

(2.) The respect he puts upon his companions in this thanksgiving. Though it was by his prayers, principally, that this discovery was obtained, and to him that it was made, yet he owns their partnership with him, both in the discovery, and in the value of it, It is what was destined for them, and in enjoying of it, Thou hast made known unto us the king's matter. Either they were present with Daniel when the discovery was made to him; or, as soon as he knew it, he told it them, זָעֵרָה, זָעֵרָה— I have found it, I have found it; that they who had assisted him with their prayers.
might assist him in their praises; his joining them with him is an instance of his humility and modesty, which well become those that are taken into communion with God. Thus, St. Paul sometimes joins Sylvanus, Timotheus, or some other minister with himself in the inscriptions to many of his epistles. Note, What honour God puts upon us, we should be willing that our brethren may share with us in.

24. Therefore Daniel went in unto Arioch, the king that had ordained to destroy the wise men of Babylon: he went and said thus unto him, Destroy not the wise men of Babylon: bring me in before the king, and I will shew unto the king the interpretation. 25. Then Arioch brought in Daniel before the king in haste, and said thus unto him, I have found a man of the captives of Judah that will make known unto the king the interpretation. 26. The king answered, and said to Daniel, whose name was Belteshazzar, Art thou able to make known unto me the dream which I have seen, and the interpretation thereof? 27. Daniel answered in the presence of the king, and said, The secret which the king hath demanded, cannot the wise men, the astrologers, the magicians, the soothsayers, shew unto the king; 28. But there is a God in heaven that revealeth secrets, and maketh known to the king Nebuchadnezzar what shall be in the latter days. Thy dream, and the visions of thy head upon thy bed, are these; 29. (As for thee, O king, thy thoughts came into thy mind upon thy bed, what should come to pass hereafter; and he that revealeth secrets maketh known to thee what shall come to pass:) 30. But as for me, this secret is not revealed to me for any wisdom that I have more than any living, but for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thy heart.

We have here the introduction to Daniel's declaring of the dream, and the interpretation of it.

1. He immediately bespeaks the reverting of the sentence against the wise men of Babylon, v. 24. He went with all speed, v. 25. and told the king that his commission was superseded; Do not therefore destroy the wise men of Babylon. Though there were those of them perhaps that deserved to die, as magicians, by the law of God, yet here, that which they stood condemned for was not a crime worthy of death or of bonds; and therefore let them not die, and be unjustly destroyed, but let them live, and be justly shewed, as having been guilty, to do that which a prophet of the Lord could do. Note, Since God shows common kindness to the evil and good, we should do so too, and be ready to save the lives even of bad men, Matt. v. 45. A good man is a common good. To Paul in the ship God gave the souls of all that sailed with him; they were saved for his sake. To Daniel was owing the preservation of all the wise men, who were not condemned not according to the benefit done to them, ch. iii. 8.

2. He offered his service, with great assurance, to go to the king, and tell him his dream, and the interpretation of it; and was admitted accordingly, v. 24, 25. Arioch brought him in haste to the king, hoping to gratify himself and the king, he pretended he had sought him to interpret the king's dream, whereas really it was to execute upon him the king's sentence that he sought him. But courtiers' business is every way to humour the prince, and make their own services acceptable.

3. He contrived as much as might be to reflect shame upon the magicians, and to give honour to God, upon this occasion: not that that was a bold undertaking, and questioned whether he could make it good; (v. 26.) Art thou able to make known unto me the dream? What! Such a babe in this knowledge, such a stripling as thou art, wilt thou undertake that which thy seniors despair of doing? The less likely it appeared to the king that Daniel should do this, the more God was glorified in enabling him to do it. Note, In transmitting divine revelation to the children of men, it has been God's usual way to make use of the weak and foolish things and persons of the world, and such as were despised and despairs of, to confound the wise and mighty, that the excellency of the power might be of him, 1 Cor. i. 27, 28. Daniel from this takes occasion,

(1.) To put the king out of conceit with his magicians and soothsayers, whom he had such great expectations from; (v. 27.) This secret they cannot show to the king; it is out of their power, the rules of their art will not reach to it. Therefore let not the king be angry with them for not doing that which they cannot do; but rather despise them, and cast them off, because they cannot do it. Brought in words it generally: This secret no sages, astrologers, enchanters, or entrail-cookers, can show unto the king; let not the king therefore consult them any more.

Note, The experience we have of the inability of all creatures to give us satisfaction, should lessen our esteem of them, and lower our expectations from them. They are baffled in their pretensions, we are baffled in our hopes from them; bitherto they come, and no further; let us therefore say to them, as Job to his friends, Ye are nothing, miserable comforters are ye all.

(2.) To bring him to the knowledge of the one living and true God, the God whom Daniel worshipped; Though they cannot find out the secret, let not the king despair of having it found out, for the secret is a God in heaven, that reveals secrets, v. 28. Note, To feel the insufficiency of the means should drive us to the all-sufficiency of the Creator. There is a God in heaven, and it is well for us there is, who can do that for us, and make known that to us, which none on earth can, particularly the secret history of the work of redemption, and the secret designs of God's love to us therein, the mystery which was hid from ages and generations, divine revelation helps us out there where human reason leaves us quite at a loss, and makes known that, not only to kings, but to the poor of this world, which none of the philosophers or politicians of the heathens, with all their oracles and arts of divination to help them, could ever pretend to give us any light into, Rom. xvi. 25, 26.

4. He confirmed the king in his opinion, that the dream he was so solicitous to recover the idea of, was really well worth inquiring after, that it was of great value, and of vast consequence; not a common dream, the idle disport of a licentious and luxurient fancy, not worth remembering or telling again, but that it was a divine discovery, a ray of light darted into his mind from the upper world, relating to the most affairs and revolutions of this lower world. God in it made known to the king what shall be in the latter days, (v. 28.) in the times yet to come, reaching as far as the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, which was to be in the latter days, Heb. i. 1. And again, (v. 29.) "The thoughts which came into thy mind, were not the repetitions of what had been before, as our dreams usually are;"

"Omnia quae sequi voluntar vota duurna, Tempore sopito reddit amara quiet.

The sentiments which he uttered throughout the day, often mingled with the grateful murmurs of the night. (Clarke.)"

"but they were predictions of what should come to pass hereafter, which he that reveals secrets makes known unto thee; and therefore thou art in the right in taking the hint, and pursuing it thus." Note, Things that are to come pass hereafter, are secret things; and he that reveals them has revealed of those things, especially with reference to the last days of all, to the end of time, ought to be very seriously and diligently inquired into and considered by every one of us. Some think that the thoughts which are said to have come into the king's mind upon his bed, what should come to pass hereafter, were his own thoughts when he was awake. Just before he fell asleep, and dreamed this dream, he was much in his own mind what would be the issue of his growing greatness, what his kingdom would hereafter come to; and so the dream was an answer to those thoughts. What discoveries God intends to make, he thus prepares men for.

3. He solemnly professes that he could not pretend to have merited from God the favour of this discovery, or to have obtained it by any sagacity of his own. (v. 30.) "But as for me, this secret is not found out by me, but is revealed to me, and that not for any wisdom that I have more than any living, to qualify me for the receiving of such a discovery." Note, It well becomes those whom God has highly favoured and honoured, to be very humble and low in their own eyes; to lay aside all opinion of their own wisdom and worthiness, that God alone may have the praise of the government which he has given, and do, and that all may be attributed to the freedom of his good will toward them, and the fulness of his good work in them. The secret was made known to him not for his own sake, but, (1.) For the sake of his people, for their sakes that shall make known the interpretation to the king; for the sake of his brethren and companions in tribulation, who had by their prayers helped him to obtain this discovery, and who might be said to have been the cause of it; (2.) Not for any wisdom of mine, but that the king may know the interpretation, and that thou mightest know the thoughts of thine heart; that thou mightest have satisfaction given thee as to what thou wast before considering, and thereby instruction given thee how to behave toward the church of God." God revealed this thing to Daniel, that he might make it known to the king. Prophets receive it, that they may give; that the discoveries made them may not be lodged with themselves, but communicated to the persons themselves that are concerned.

31. Thou, O king, sawest, and beheld, a great image. This great image, whose brightness was excellent, stood before thee, and the form thereof was terrible. 32. This image's head was of fine gold, his breast and his arms of silver, his belly and his thighs of brass. 33. His legs of iron, his feet part of iron and part of clay. 34. Thou sawest till that a stone was cut out without hands, which smote the image upon his feet, that were of iron and clay, and brake them to pieces. 35. Then was the iron, the clay, the brass, the silver, and the gold, broken to pieces together, and became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floors; and the wind carried them away, that no place was found for them: and the stone that smote the image became a great mountain, and filled the whole earth. 36. This is the dream; and we will tell the interpretation thereof before the king. 37. Thou, O king, art a king of kings: for the God of heaven hath given thee a kingdom, power, and dominion, and glory, and wheresoever the children of men dwell, the beasts of the field, and the fowls of the heaven, hath he given into thy hand, and hath made thee ruler over them all. Thou art this head of gold. 39. And after thee shall arise another kingdom, inferior to thee, and another third kingdom of brass, which shall break the power of all the earth. 40. And the fourth kingdom shall be strong as iron: forasmuch as iron breaketh in pieces, and subdueth all things: and as iron that breaketh all these, shall it break in pieces and bruise. 41. And whereas thou sawest the feet and toes of potter's clay and part of iron, the kingdom shall be divided; but there shall be in it of the strength of the iron, forasmuch as thou sawest the iron mixed with miry clay. 42. And as the toes of the feet were part of iron and part of clay; so the kingdom shall be partly strong, and partly broken. 43. And whereas thou sawest iron mixed with miry clay, they shall mingle themselves with the seed of men: but they shall not cleave one to another, even as iron is not mixed with clay. 44. And in the days of these kings shall the God of heaven set up a kingdom, which shall never be destroyed: and the kingdom shall not be left to other people, but it shall break in pieces and consume all these kingdoms, and it shall stand for ever. 45. Forasmuch as thou sawest that the stone was cut out without hands, and that it brake in pieces the iron, the brass, the clay, the silver, and the gold; the great God hath made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter: and the dreams is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure.

Daniel here gives full satisfaction to Nebuchadnezzar concerning his dream and the interpretation of it. That great prince had been kind to this poor prophet in his maintenance and education; he had been brought up at the king's cost, preferred at court, and the land of his captivity had hereby been made much easier to him than to others of his brethren. And now the king is abundantly repaid for all the expense he had been at upon him: and for receiving this prophet, though not in the name of a prophet, he had a prophet’s reward: such a reward as a prophet only could give, and for which that wealthy, mighty prince was now glad to be beholden to him. Here is

I. The dream itself, v. 31, 45. Nebuchadnezzar perhaps was an admirer of statues, and had his palace and gardens adorned with them; however, he was a worshipper of images, and now, behold, a great image is set before him in a dream; which might intimate to him what the images were, which had restored so many nations upon and made such a respect to, they were mere dreams. The creatures of fancy might do as well to please the fancy. By the power of imagination he might shut his eyes, and represent to himself what forms he thought fit, and beautify them at his pleasure, without the expense and trouble of sculpture. This was the image of a man erect; it stood before him, as a living man; and because those monarchies which were designed to be represented by it, were admirable in the eyes of their friends, the brightness of this image was excellent; and because they were formidable to their enemies, and dreaded by all about them, the form of this image is said to be terrible; both the features of the face and the postures of the body made it so. But that which was most remarkable in this image, was the restoration of it: The head of gold, the richest and most durable metal; the breast and arms of silver, the next to it in worth; the belly and sides, or thighs, of brass; the legs of iron, still baser metals; and lastly, the feet part of iron and part of clay. See what the things of this world are; the further we go in them, the less valuable they appear. In the life of man, youth is great, and but a man, but the old man is a servant of servants, and is half clay; a man is then as good as dead. It is so with the world; later ages degenerate. The first age of the Christian church, of the reformation, was a head of gold; but we live in an age that is iron and clay. Some allude to this in the description of a hypocrite, whose practice is not agreeable to his knowledge. He has a head of gold, but it is tarnished, and has his feet as a man, but they are iron and clay. Some have observed that in Daniel’s visions the monarchies were represented by four beasts, (ch. 7.) for he looked upon that wisdom from hence, by which they were turned to be earthly and sensual, and a tyrannical power, to have more in it of the beast than of the man, and so the vision agreed with his notions of the thing. But to Nebuchadnezzar, a heathen prince, this was represented by a gay and pompous image of a man, for he was an admirer of the kingdoms of this world, and the glory of them. To him the sight was so charming, that he was impatient to see it again.

But what became of this image? The next part of the dream shows it as calcined, and brought to nothing. He saw a stone cut out of the quarry by an unknown power, without hands, and this stone fell upon the feet of the image, that were of iron and clay, and broke them to pieces; and then the image must fall, of course, and so the gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, were all broken to pieces together, and beaten so small, that they became like the chaff of the summer threshing-floor, and there were not to be found a thousandth part of them. But this stone cut out of the mountain became itself a great mountain, and filled the earth. See how God can bring about great effects by weak and unlikely causes: when he pleases, a little one shall become a thousand. Perhaps the destruction of this image of gold, and silver, and brass, and iron, might be intended to signify the abolishing of idolatry out of the world in due time. The stobs of the heathen are silver and gold, as this image was; and they shall perish from off the earth, and from under these heavens, Jer. x. 11. Isa. ii. 18. And whatever power destroys idolatry, is in the ready way to magnify and exalt itself; as this stone, when it had made the image to pieces, became a great mountain.

II. The interpretation of this dream. Let us now see what is the meaning of this. It was from God, and therefore from him it is fit that we take the explication of it. It should seem Daniel had his fellows with him, and speaks for them as well as for himself, when he says, We will tell the interpretation, v. 36. Now,

1. This image represented the kingdoms of the earth, that should successively bear rule among the nations, and have influence on the affairs of the Jewish church. The four monarchies were not represented by four distinct statues, but by one image, because they were all of one and the same spirit and genius, and all more or less against the church. It was the same power, only lodged in four several nations, the two former lying eastward of Judea, the two latter westward. (1.) The head of gold signified the Chaldean monarchy, which is now in being; (v. 37, 38.) Thou, O king, art, or, rather, shalt be, a king of kings; a universal monarch, to whom many kings and kingdoms shall be tributaries; or, Thou art the first of many kings; a king of kings, that exerts great authority, stands firm, and shines bright, acts by a puissant army with an arbitrary power.

Note. The greatest of princes have no power but what is given them from above. The extent of his dominion is set forth, (v. 38.) that wheresoever the children of men dwell, in all the nations of that part of the world, he was ruler over them all, over them and all that belonged to them, all their cattle, not only those which they had a property in, but these were made subject to him. The beasts of the field, the fowls of the heaven, was lord of all the woods, forests, and chases, and none were allowed to hunt or fowl without his leave. Thus thou art this head of gold; thou, and thy son, and thy son’s son, for seventy years. Compare this with Jer. xxxix. 9, 11, especially Jer. xxvii. 3–7. There were other powerful kingdoms in the world at this time, as that of the Scythians; but it was the kingdom of Babylon that reigned over the Jews, and that began the government which continued in the succession here described till Christ’s time. It is called a head, for its wisdom, eminency, and absolute power, a head of gold for its wealth; (Isa. xiv. 4.) it was a golden city. Some make this monarchy to begin in Nimrod, and so bring it into all the Assyrian kings, about fifteen monarchs in all, and compare that it lasted above 1600 years. But it had not been so long a monarchy of such vast extent and power as is here described, nor any thing like it; therefore others make only Nebuchadnezzar, Evil-merodach, and Belshazzar, to belong to this head of gold; and a glorious high throne they had, and perhaps exercised a more despotic rule than any of the kings that went before them. Nebuchadnezzar reigned forty-five years current. Evil-merodach twenty-three years current, and Belshazzar three. Babylon was their metropolis, and Daniel was with them upon the spot during the seventy years. (2.) The breast and arms of silver signified the monarchy of the Medes and Persians; of which the king is told no more than this, There shall arise another kingdom inferior to thee, (v. 39.) not so rich, powerful, or victorious. This kingdom was founded by Darius the Mede, and Cyrus the Persian, in alliance with each other, and therefore represented by two arms, meeting in the breast. Cyrus was king of Persia, and Darius king of the Persian monarchy; but in Alexander himself it shall by the power of the sword bear rule over all the earth; for Alexander boasted that he had conquered the world, and then sat down and wept because he had not another world to conquer.

(4.) The legs and feet of iron signified the Roman monarchy. Some make this to signify the latter part of the Greek monarchy, the two empires of Syria and Egypt; the former governed by the family of the Seleucide, from Seleucus, the latter by that of the Lagizde, from Ptolemæus Lagus; these they make the two legs and feet of this image; Grotius, and Junius, and Broughton, go this way. But it has been the more received opinion, that it is the Roman monarchy that is here intended; because it was in the end of this last empire, and when it was at its height, that the kingdom of Christ was set up in the world by the preaching of the everlasting gospel. The Roman kingdom was strong as iron, (v. 40.) witness the prevalence of that kingdom against all that contended with it for many ages. That kingdom broke in pieces the Grecian empire, and afterward quite destroyed the nation of the Jews. Toward the latter end of the Roman monarchy, it grew very weak, broken into ten kingdoms, which were as the toes of these feet. Some of these were weak as clay, others strong as iron, v. 42. Endeavours were used to unite and cement them for the strengthening of the empire, but in vain: They shall not cleave one to another, v. 43. This empire divided the government for a long time between the senate and the people, the nobles, and the plebeians; the old constitution did not entirely cease; there were civil wars between Marius and Sylla, Cæsar and Pompey, whose parties were as iron and clay. Some refer this to the declining times of that empire, when, for the strengthening of the empire against the invasions of the barbarous nations, the branches of the royal family intermarried; but the politicians had not the desired effect, when the day of that empire came.

2. The stone cut out without hands represented the kingdom of Jesus Christ, which should be set up in the world in the time of the Roman empire, and upon the ruins of Satan's kingdom in the kingdoms of the world. This is the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, for it should be neither raised nor supported by human power or policy; no visible hand should act in the setting of it up, but it should be done invisibly by the Spirit of the Lord of hosts. This was the stone which the builders refused, because it was not cut out by their hands, but it is now become the head-stone of the corner.

(1.) The gospel-church is a kingdom, which Christ is the sole and sovereign Monarch of; in which he rules by his word and Spirit, to which he gives protection and law, and from which he receives homage and tribute. It is a kingdom not of this world, and yet set up in it; it is the kingdom of God among men.

(2.) The God of heaven was to set up this kingdom, to give authority to Christ to execute judgment, to set him as King upon his holy hill of Zion, and to bring into obedience to him a willing people. Being set up by the God of heaven, it is often in the New Testament called the kingdom of heaven, for its original is from above, and its tendency is upward.

(5.) It was to be set up in the days of these kings, the kings of the fourth monarchy; of which particular notice is taken, Luke ii. 1. That Christ was born when, by the decree of the emperor of Rome, all the world was taxed, which was a plain indication that that empire was become as universal as any earthly empire ever was. When these kings are contesting with each other, and in all the struggles each of the contending parties hopes to find its power accreased from the decay of its opposite, Christ was willing to have his own counsel. These kings are all enemies to Christ's kingdom, and yet it shall be set up in defiance of them.

(4.) It is a kingdom that knows no decay, is in no danger of destruction, and will not admit any succession or revolution. It shall never be destroyed by any foreign force invading it, as many other kingdoms are, fire and sword cannot waste it; the combined powers of earth and hell cannot deprive either the subjects of their Prince, or the Prince of his subjects; nor shall this kingdom be left to other people, as the kingdoms of the earth are. As Christ is a Monarch that has no successor, (for he himself shall reign for ever,) so his kingdom is a monarchy that has no revolution. The kingdom of God was founded upon the Jews and the Jewish tabernacles; (Matth. xxii. 44.) but still it was Christianity that ruled the kingdom of the Messiah. The Christian church is still the same; it is fixed on a rock, much fought against, but never to be prevailed against by the gates of hell.

(5.) It is a kingdom that shall be victorious over all opposition. It shall break in pieces and consume these kingdoms, as the stone cut out of the mountain without hands brake in pieces the image, v. 44. 45. The kingdom of Christ shall wear out all other kingdoms, shall outlive them, and flourish when they are sunk with their own weight, and so wasted, that their place knows them no more. All the kingdoms that appear against the kingdom of Christ shall be broken with a rod of iron, as a potter's vessel is broken in pieces, when it is cast into the fire; no part of them shall be left; the whole monarchy is to be committed to the kingdom of Christ, tyranny, and idolatry, and every thing that is in opposition shall, as far as the gospel of Christ gets ground, be broken. The day is coming when Jesus Christ shall have put down all rule, principality, and power, and have made all his enemies his footstool; and then this prophecy will have its full accomplishment, and not till then, I Cor. xv. 24, 28. Our Saviour seems to refer to this, (Matth. xxii. 44.) when speaking of himself as the Stone set at naught by the Jewish builders, he says, On whomsoever this stone shall fall, it will grind him to powder.

(6.) It shall be an everlasting kingdom. Those kingdoms of the earth that had broken in pieces all about them, at length came, in their turn, to be in like manner broken; but the kingdom of Christ shall break other kingdoms in pieces, and shall itself stand for ever. His throne shall be as the days in heaven, his seed, his subjects, as the stars of heaven, not only so innumerable, but so immutable. Of the increase of Christ's government and peace there shall be no end. The Lord shall reign for ever, not only to the end of time, but when time and days shall be no more, and God shall be all in all to eternity.

Daniel having thus interpreted the dream, to the satisfaction of Nebuchadnezzar, who gave him no interruption, so full was the interpretation, that he had no question to ask, and so plain, that he had no objection to make, he closes all with a solemn asser tion. [1.] Of the divine original of this dream; The great God, (so he calls him, to express his own high thoughts of him, and to beget the like in the mind of this great king;) he has made known to the king what shall come to pass hereafter, which the gods of the magicians could not do. And thus a full confirmation was given to that great argument which Isaiah had long before urged against idolaters, and particularly the idolaters of Babylon, when he challenged the gods they worshipped, to show things that are to come hereafter, which we may know that we are gods; (Isa. xli. 23.) and by this proved the God of Israel to be the true God, that he declares the end from the beginning, Isa. xlv. 10. [2.] Of the unbounded certainty of the things for tell of this dream. He who makes known these things, is the same that has himself designed and determined them, and will by his providence effect them; and we are sure that his counsel shall stand, and cannot be altered, and therefore the dream is certain, and the interpretation thereof sure. Note, Whatever God has made known, we may depend upon.

46. Then the king Nebuchadnezzar fell upon his face, and worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation and sweet odours unto him. 47. The king answered unto Daniel, and said, Of a truth it is that your God is a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, and a revealer of secrets, seeing thou couldst reveal this secret. 48. Then the king made Daniel a great man, and gave him many great gifts, and made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, and chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon. 49. Then Daniel requested of the king, and he set Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, over the affairs of the province of Babylon: but Daniel sat in the gate of the king.

One might have expected that when Nebuchadnezzar was contriving to make his own kingdom everlasting, he would have been curaged at Daniel, who foretold the fall of it, and that another kingdom of another nature should be the everlasting kingdom; but, instead of raining it as an affront, he received it as an oracle, and here we are told what the expressions were of the king. He left it made no mention of it. He was ready to look upon Daniel as a little god. Though he saw him to be a man, yet, from this wonderful discovery which he had made both of his secret thoughts, in telling him the dream, and of things to come, in telling him the interpretation of it, he concluded that he had certainly a divinity lodged in him, worthy his adoration; and therefore he fell upon his face, and bowed with reverence. This is the true custom of the country by prostration to give honour to kings, because they have something of a divine power in them; I have said, Ye are gods. And therefore this king, who had often received such veneration from others, now paid the like to Daniel, whom he supposed to have in him a divine knowledge; which he was so struck with an admiration of, that he contained himself, not only that Daniel was a man, and that himself was a king. Thus did God magnify divine revelation, and make it honourable, extorting from a proud potentate such a veneration but for one glimpse of it. He worshipped Daniel, and commanded that they should offer an oblation to him, and burn incense. Herein he cannot be justified, but may in some measure be excused, when Cornelius was thus ready to worship Peter, and John the angel, who both knew better. But though it is not here mentioned, yet we have reason to think that Daniel refused these honours that he paid him, and said, as Peter to Cornelius, Stand up, I myself also am a man; or, as the angel to St. John, See thou do it not; for it is not said that the oblation was offered unto him, though the king commanded it, or rather, said it; for so the word is. He said, in his haste, Let an oblation be offered to him. And that Daniel did say something to him which turned his eyes and thoughts another way, is intimated in what follows, (v. 47.) The king answered Daniel. Note, It is possible for a man to hear the words of God's word, who yet have no true love for the word. Herod feared John, and heard him gladly, and yet went on in his sins, Mark vi. 20.

2. He readily acknowledged the God of Daniel to be the great God, the true God, the only living and true God. If Daniel will not suffer himself to be worshipped, he will (as Daniel, it is likely, directed him) worship God, by confessing, (v. 47.) Of a truth your God is a God of gods; such a God as there is no other; above all gods in dignity, over all gods in dominion. He is a LORD of kings, from whom they derive their power, and to whom they are accountable; and he is both a Discoverer and a Revealer of secrets; what is most secret he sees, and can reveal; and what he has revealed, is what was secret, and which none but himself could reveal, 1 Cor. ii. 10.

3. He preferred Daniel; made him a great man, v. 48. God made him a great man indeed, when he took him into communion with himself; a greater man than Nebuchadnezzar could make him; but because God had magnified him, therefore the king magnified him. Does wealth make a man wise? The king made many gifts; he gave and had no reason to refuse them, when they all put him into so much the greater capacity of doing good to his brethren in captivity. These gifts were grateful returns for the good services he had done, and not aimed at, or intended for, by him, as the rewards of divination were by Balaam. Does power make a man great? He made him ruler over the whole province of Babylon, which, no doubt, had great influence upon the other provinces; he made him likewise chancellor of the university, chief of the governors over all the wise men of Babylon, to instruct them whom he had thus outdone; and since they could not do what the king would have them do, they shall be obliged to do what Daniel would have them do. Thus it is fit that the servant be a servant to the wise in heart. Seeing Daniel could reveal this secret, (v. 47.) the king thus advanced him. Note, It is the wisdom of princes to advance and employ those who receive divine revelation, and are much conversant with it, who, as Daniel here, showed himself to be well acquainted with the kingdom of heaven. Joseph, like Daniel here, was advanced the higher for the sureness of his interpreting of his dreams; and he called him Zaph- uath-thonaeh—a revealer of secrets, as the king of Babylon here calls Daniel; so that the preambles to their patents of honour are the same; for, and in consideration of, their good services done to the crown in revealing secrets.

4. He preferred his companions for his sake, and upon his special instance and request, v. 49. Daniel himself sat in the gate of the king, as president of the council, chief justice, or prime minister of state, or perhaps chamberlain of the household; but he used his interest for his friends as became a good man, and procured places in the government for Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. They that helped him in their prayers shall share with him in his honours; such a grateful sense had he even of that service. The preferring of them would be a great stay and help to Daniel in his place and business. And these pious Jews being thus preferred in Babylon, had great opportunity of serving their brethren in captivity, and of doing them many good offices, which, no doubt, they were ready to do. Thus, sometimes, before God brings his people into trouble, he prepares it that it may be easy to them.

CHAP. III.

In the close of the foregoing chapter, we left Daniel's companions, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, in honour and power, princes of the provinces, and preferred for their information, as the children of Israel, and therefore they had in him, I know not whether I should say, It were well if this honour had all the saints: so, there are many whom it would not be good for; the saints' honour is reserved for a better field, but here we have those three men as much under the king's displeasure as then they were in his favour, and yet more truly, more highly honoured by their God than there they were honoured by his prince; both by the grace wherewith he enabled them rather to suffer than to sin, and by the miraculous and glorious deliverance which he wrought for them out of their sufferings. It is a very memorable story, a glorious instance of the power and goodness of God, and a great encouragement to the constancy of his people in trying times. The apostle refers to it when he mentions, among the believing heroes, those who by faith quenched the fiery wrath of God (Heb. xi. 34). We have here, I. Nebuchadnezzar's erecting a golden image and dedicating it, and his requiring all his subjects, of what rank or degree soever, to fall down and worship it, and the general resistance of his people with that command, v. 1.-7. II. Information given against the Jewish princes for refusing to worship this golden image, v. 8.-12. Their constant persisting in that refusal, notwithstanding his rage and menaces, v. 13.-18. III. The casting of them into the fiery furnace for their refusal, v. 19.-23. IV. Their miraculous preservation in the fire by the power of God, and their invitation out of the fire by the favour of the king, who was by this miracle convinced of his error, v. 24.-33. V. The honour which the king gave to God hereupon, and the favour he showed to those faithful worriers, v. 28.-30.

1. NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king made an image of gold, whose height was three score cubits, and the breadth thereof of six cubits: he set it up in the plain of Dura, in the province of Babylon. 2. Then Nebuchadnezzar the king sent to gather together the princes, the governors, and the captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, to come to the dedication of the image which Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up. 3. Then the princes, the governors, and captains, the judges, the treasurers, the counsellors, the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces, were gathered together unto the dedication of the image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up; and they stood before the image that Nebuchadnezzar had set up. 4. Then a herald cried aloud, To you it is commanded, O people, nations, and languages. 5. That at what time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king hath set up: 6. And whose falleth not down and worshipeth, shall the same hour be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 7. Therefore at that time, when all the people heard the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and all kinds of music, all the people, the nations, and the languages, fell down and worshipped the golden image that Nebuchadnezzar the king had set up.

We have no certainty concerning the date of this story, only, that if this image which Nebuchadnezzar dedicated had any relation to that which he dreamed of, it is probable that it happened not long after that; some reckon it to be about the seventh year of Nebuchadnezzar, a year before Jehoiachin's captivity, in which Ezekiel was carried away.

1. A golden image set up to be worshipped. Babylon was full of idols already, yet nothing shall serve this imperious prince, but they must have one more; for those who have forsaken the one only living God, and begin to set up many gods, will find the gods they set up so unsatisfying, and their desire after them so insatiable, that they will multiply them without measure, wander after them endlessly, and never know when they have sufficient. Nebuchadnezzar is this creature of novelty and variety, they choose new gods. They that have more than one more. Nebuchadnezzar the king, that he might extort the prerogative of his crown, to make: what god he thought fit, set up this image, v. 1. Observe, (1.) The valubleness of it: it was an image of gold, not all gold surely; rich as he was, it is probable that he could not afford that, but overlaid with gold. Note, The worshipers of false gods are apt to put more to mind changes in setting up images, and worshipping them: they lavish gold out of the bag for that purpose, (Isa. xlvii. 6,) which shames our niggardliness in the worship of the true God. (2.) The vastness of it: it was three score cubits high, and six cubits broad. It exceeded the ordinary stature of a man fifteen times; for that is reckoned but four cubits, or six feet; as if its being monstrous would make amends for its being ineffaceable. But why did Nebuchadnezzar set up this image? Some suggest that it was to clear himself from the imputation of being turned Jew, because he had lately spoken with great honour of the God of Israel, and had preferred some of his worshipers. Or, perhaps, he set it up as an image of himself, and designed to be himself worshipped in it; proud princes affected to make some honour of them; Alexander did so, pretending himself to be the son of Jupiter Olympus. He was told that in the image he had seen in his dream, he was represented by the head of gold, who was to be succeeded by kingdoms of baser metal; but here he sets up to be himself the whole image, for he makes it all of gold. See here, [1.] How the good impressions that were then made upon him were quite lost and quickly gone on it. [2.] How that very dream and the interpretation of it, which then made such good impressions upon him, now had a quite contrary effect. Then it made him fall down as an humble worshipper of God; now it made him set up for a bold competitor with God. Then he thought it a great thing to be the golden head of the image, and owned himself obliged to God for it; but, his mind rising with his condition, now he thinks that too little, and, in contradiction to God himself and his oracle, he will be all in all,
2. A general convention of the states summoned to attend the solemnity of the dedication of this image. v. 2. Messengers are dispatched to all parts of the kingdoms, to gather together the princes, dukes, and lords, all the peers of the realm, with all officers civil and military, the captains and commanders of the forces, the judges, the treasurers, or general receivers, the counsellors, and the sheriffs, and all the rulers of the provinces; they must all come to the dedicating of this image, upon pain and penalty; neither shall they fail to return to the great men, for the greater honour of his idol; it is therefore mentioned to the glory of Christ, that kings shall bring presents unto him. If he can bring them to pay homage to his golden image, he doubts not but the inferior people will follow of course. In obedience to the king’s summons, all the magistrates and officers of that vast kingdom leave the services of their particular countries, and come to Babylon, to the dedicating of this golden image; long journeys many of them took, and expensive ones, upon a very foolish errand; but as the idols are senseless things, such are the worshippers.

3. A proclamation made, commanding all manner of persons present before the image, upon the signal given, to fall down prostrate, and worship the image, under the style and title of The golden image which Nebuchadnezzar the king has set up. A herald proclaims this aloud throughout this vast assembly of grandees, with their numerous train of servants and attendants, and a great crowd of people, no doubt, that were not sent for; let them all take notice, (1.) That the king does strictly charge and command all manner of persons to fall down, and worship the golden image; whatever other gods they worship at other times, now they must worship this. (2.) That they must all do this just at the same time, in token of their communion with each other in this idolatrous service; and that, in order hereunto, notice shall be given by a concert of music, which would likewise serve to adorn the solemnity, and to sweeten and soften the minds of those that were loath to yield, and to bring them to comply with the king’s command. This mirth and gaiety in the worship would be very agreeable to carnal, sensual minds, that are strangers to that spiritual worship which is owing to God who is a Spirit.

4. The general compliance of the assembly with this command, v. 7. They heard the sound of the musical instruments, both wind instruments and hand instruments, the cornet and flute, with the harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, the melody of which they thought was ravishing, and fit enough it was to excite such a devotion as they were then to pay; and immediately they all, as one man, as soldiers that are wont to be exercised by beat of drum, all the people, nations, and languages, fell down, and worshipped the golden image. That way that sense directs, the most will go; there is nothing so bad which the careless world will not be drawn to by a concert of music, or driven to by a fiery furnace. And by such methods as these false worship has been set up and maintained.

8. Wherefore at that time certain Chaldeans came near and accused the Jews. 9. They spake, and said to the king Nebuchadnezzar, O king, live for ever. 10. Thou O king, hast made a decree, that every man that shall hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, shall fall down and worship the golden image: 11. And whose fell not down and worshipped, that he should be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace. 12. There are certain Jews, whom thou hast set over the affairs of the province of Babylon, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; these men, O king, have not regarded thee; they serve not thy gods, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up. 13. Then Nebuchadnezzar, in his rage and fury, commanded to bring Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. Then they brought these men before the king. 14. Nebuchadnezzar spake, and said unto them, Is it true, O Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego? do not ye serve my gods, nor worship the golden image which I have set up? 15. Now, if ye be ready, at that time ye hear the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltery, and dulcimer, and all kinds of music, ye fall down and worship the image which I have made, well; but if ye worship not, ye shall be cast into the midst of a burning fiery furnace: and who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? 16. Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, answered and said to the king, O Nebuchadnezzar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. 17. If it be so, our God, whom we serve, is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace; and he will deliver us out of thy hand, O king. 18. But if not, be it known unto thee, O king, that we will not serve thy gods, nor worship thy golden image which thou hast set up.

It was strange that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego would be present at this assembly, when, it is likely, they knew for what intent it was called together. Daniel, we may suppose, was absent, as his business calling him away, and having leave from the king to withdraw; unless we suppose that he stood so high in the king’s favour, that none durst complain of him for his non-compliance; but why did not his companions keep out of the way? Surely because they would obey the king’s orders as far as they could, and would be ready to bear a public testimony against this gross idolatry. They did not think it needful now to come down to the image, but, being in office, thought themselves obliged to stand up against it, though it was the image which the king their master set up, and would be a golden image to them that worshipped it. Now.

1. Information is brought to the king by certain Chaldeans against these three gentlemen, that they did not obey the king’s edict, v. 8. Perhaps these Chaldeans that accused them, were some of those magicians or astrologers that were particularly called Chaldeans, (ch. ii. 2, 4.) who bore a grudge to Daniel's companions for his sake, because he had elysed them, and so had these his companions. They by their prayers had obtained the mercy which saved the lives of these Chaldeans, and beheld, how they requite them, evil for good; for their love they are their adversaries! Thus Jeremiah stood before God, and asked for a pit for his life, Jer. xviii. 20. We must not think it strange if we meet with such ungrateful men. Or perhaps they were such of the Chaldeans as expected the places to which they were advanced, and envied them their preferment; and who can stand before envy? They appeal to the king himself concerning the edict, with all due respect to his majesty, and almost contempt of his power; king, live for ever! (as if they aimed at nothing but his favour, and to serve his interest, when really they were putting him upon which would endanger the ruin of him and his kingdom;) they beg leave, 1. To put him in mind of the law he had lately made, That all manner of persons without exception of nation or language, should fall down and worship this golden image; they put him in mind also of the penalty which by the law was to be inflicted upon requisants, that they were to be cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace, y. 10, 11. It cannot be denied but that this was the law; whether a righteous law or no, ought to be considered. 2. To inform him that these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, had not conformed to this edict, y. 12. It is probable that Nebuchadnezzar had no particular design to enslave them, but in making the law, for then he would himself have had his eye upon them, and would not have needed this information; but their enemies, that sought an occasion against them, laid hold on this, and were forward to accuse them. To aggravate the matter, and incense the king the more against them, (1.) They put him in mind of the dignity to which the criminals had been preferred. Though they were Jews, foreigners, captives, men of a despised nation and religion, yet the king had set them over the affiars of the province of Babylon. It was therefore very ungrateful, and an insuperable piece of insolence, for them to disobey the king's command, who had shared so much of the king's favour. And besides, the high station they were in would make their refusal the more scandalous, it would be a bad example. For if he had bad bad respects to his station, and therefore it was necessary that it should be severely animadverted upon. Thus princes that are incensed enough against innocent people, commonly want not those about them who do all they can to make them worse. (2.) They suggest that it was done maliciously, contumaciously, and in contempt of him and his authority; They have set no regard upon thee; for they serve not the gods which thou servest, and which thou requirest them to serve, nor worship the golden image which thou hast set up."

II. These three pious Jews are immediately brought before the king, and arraigned and examined upon this information. Nebuchadnezzar fell into a great passion, and in his rage and fury commanded them to be seized, y. 13. How little was it in his heart to have a mind so little and so great a rule over so many nations, when at the same time he had no rule over his own spirit, that there were so many who were subjects and captives to him, when he was himself a perfect slave to his own British passions, and led captive by them! How unit was he to rule reasonable men, who could not himself be ruled by reason? It needed not be a surprise to him to hear that these three men did not now serve his gods, for he knew very well they never had done it, and their religion, which they had always adhered to, forbade them to do it. Nor had he any reason to think that they did it in contempt of his authority, who had in all instances showed themselves respectful and dutiful to him as their prince. But it was especially unseasonable at this time, when he was in the midst of his devotions, dedicating his golden image, to be in such a rage and fury, and such a disposition to make the discretion of a man, one of his subjects, should at least have deferred this action. True devotion calms the spirit, quiets and meekens it, but superstition, and a devotion to false gods, inflames men's passions, inspire them with rage and fury, and turn them into brutes. The wrath of a king is as the roaring of a lion, so was the wrath of this king; and yet when he was in such a heat, these three men were brought before him with an undaunted courage, and an unshaken constancy.

III. The case is laid before them in short, and it is put to them whether they will comply or no. 1. The king asked them whether it was true that they had not worshipped the golden image, when others did, y. 14. "Is it of purpose?" (so some read it,) Was it designedly and deliberately done, or was it only through inadvertency, that you have not served my gods? What! you that I have nourished and brought up, that have been educated and maintained at my charge, that I have been so kind to, and done so much for; you that have been in such reputation for wisdom, and therefore should better have known your duty to your prince; what! do not you serve my gods, nor worship the golden image after which I have set up?" Note, The faithfulness of God's servants to him has often been the wonder of their enemies and persecutors, who think it strange, that they run not with them to the same excess of riot. 2. He was willing to admit them to a new trial; if they did on purpose not do it before, yet it may be, upon second thoughts, they will change their minds; it is therefore repeated to them upon what terms they now stand, v. 15. (1.) The king is willing that music shall play again, only for their sakes, to soften them into a compliance; and if they will not, like the deaf adder, step their ears, but will hearken to the voice of the charmers, and will worship the golden image, well and good, their former omission shall be pardoned. But, (2.) The king is resolved, if they persist in their refusal, that they shall immediately be cast into the fiery furnace, and shall be burned as soon as possible; the king was so angry with them that he would not hear reason. Thus does the matter lie in a little compass. Turn, or burn; and because he knew they buoyed themselves up in their refusal with a confidence in their God, he insolently sets him at defiance; And who is that God that shall deliver you out of my hands? Let him, if he can. Now he forgot what he himself once owned, that their God was a God of gods, and a Lord of kings, ch. i. 47. Proud men are still ready to say, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice? Or, as Nebuchadnezzar, Who is the Lord, that I should fear his power?

IV. They give in their answer, which they all agree in, that they still adhere to their resolution, not to worship the golden image, v. 16—18. We have here such an instance as is not paralleled; we call these the three children, (and they were indeed young men,) but we should rather call them the three champions, the first three of the worthies of God's kingdom among men. They did not break out into any immoderate heat or passion against those that did worship the golden image, did not insult or affront them; nor did they readily trust themselves upon the trial, or go out of their way, to court martyrdom, but when they were duly called to the fiery trial, they quitted themselves bravely, with a conduct and courage that became sufferers for so good a cause. *The king was not so daringly bold in making this idol, but they were as daringly good in witnessing against it. They keep their temper admirably well, do not call the king a tyrant, or an idolater, (the cause of God not the wrath of man,) but, with an exemplary calmness and sedate-ness of mind, they deliberately give in their answer, which they resolve to abide by. Observe, this effect, this answer; it was some of the effects of death, and the noble negligence with which they look upon the dilemma that are put to: O Nebuchadnez- zar, we are not careful to answer thee in this matter. They do not in suffering deny him an answer, nor stand mute; but they tell him that they are in no care about it. There needs not an answer; (so would our friends and resolve the matter) they seem to be careful to the death. But the king is resolved they shall die if they do not: the matter therefore is determined, and why should it be disputed! But it is better read, "We want not an answer for thee, nor have it to seek, but come prepared." (1.) They needed no time to deliberate concerning the matter of their answer; for they did not in the least hesitate whether they should comply, or not. They were so determined, that one would think they might have considered awhile before they had resolved; life is desirable, and death is dreadful. But when the sin and duty that were in the case were immediately determined by the letter of the second commandment, and no room was left to question that, the life and death that were in the case were not to be considered. Note, Those that make their duty their main care, need not be careful concerning the event. 2. Their believing confidence in God, and their dependence upon him, v. 17. This was it that enabled them to look with so much contempt upon death, death in pomp, death in all its terrors; they trusted in the living God, and by that faith chose rather to suffer than to sin; they therefore feared not the wrath of the king, but endured, because by faith they had an eye to him that is invisible; (Heb. xi. 23, 27.) "If it be so, if we are brought to this strict, if we must be thrown into the fiery furnace, unless we serve thy gods, know then," (1.) That though we worship not thy gods, yet we are not atheists; there is a God whom we can call ours, to whom we faithfully adhere." (2.) That we serve this God, we have devoted ourselves to his honour, we employ ourselves in his work, and depend upon him to protect us, provided for us, and reward us. (3.) Thus we are well assured that this God is able to deliver us from the burning fiery furnace; whether he will or no, we are sure he can either prevent our being cast into the furnace, or rescue us out of it. Note, The faithful servants of God will find him a Master able to bear them out in his service, and to control and overrule all the powers that are armed against them. *Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst. (4.) "That we have reason to hope: he will deliver us;" partly, because in such a vast array of idolatries, it would be very much for the honour of his great name to deliver them; and, partly, because Nebuchadnezzar had defined him to do it; *Who is that God that shall deliver you's from this fiery furnace? Not *that God that shall deliver thee; but God himself that is \(_{\text{3.3.27}}\) slaying.\

Daniel, III.

1. One of the first things necessary to the reform of idolatries, and the cultivation of the graces of the heart, is the altogether abhorrence of all that is fleshly, that no respect or affection should be had to it. Thus it was with those that were in the fiery furnace; (Dan. iii. 10.) They had not made any preparation for this event. The consequence is, that we must have a fresh view of the greatness of God's power, and that no respect should be had to the power of any creature, or that which is of any kind, or in any shape, unless it be of God, and be for the glory of God. This is an act of the heart, an act of the soul, an act of conscience.

2. Note, Their reverence to God, in this action, was worth observing: (Dan. iii. 10.) They had not made any preparation for this event. The consequence is, that we must have a fresh view of the greatness of God's power, and that no respect should be had to the power of any creature, or that which is of any kind, or in any shape, unless it be of God, and be for the glory of God. This is an act of the heart, an act of the soul, an act of conscience.

3. Their firm resolution, however, to adhere to their profession of faith in God, and to stand their ground, though it would be a most unpardonable sin; (Dan. iii. 10.) They had not made any preparation for this event. The consequence is, that we must have a fresh view of the greatness of God's power, and that no respect should be had to the power of any creature, or that which is of any kind, or in any shape, unless it be of God, and be for the glory of God. This is an act of the heart, an act of the soul, an act of conscience.

4. Note, Their reverence to God, in this action, was worth observing: (Dan. iii. 10.) They had not made any preparation for this event. The consequence is, that we must have a fresh view of the greatness of God's power, and that no respect should be had to the power of any creature, or that which is of any kind, or in any shape, unless it be of God, and be for the glory of God. This is an act of the heart, an act of the soul, an act of conscience.
young men, and rising men. But there is enough in that one word of God, wherewith to answer and silence these and many more such like carnal reasonings; Thou shalt not bow down thyself to an image, nor worship them. They know they must obey God rather than man; they must rather suffer than sin; and must not do evil, that good may come. And therefore none of these things move them; they are resolved rather to die in their integrity than live in their iniquity. While their brethren, who yet remain in their own land, were worshiping images of theirs, these here in Babylon would not be brought to it by constraint, but as if they were good by antiphrasis, were most zealous against idolatry in an idolatrous country. And truly, all things considered, the saving of them from this sinful compliance was as great a miracle in the kingdom of grace, as the saving of them out of the fiery furnace was in the kingdom of nature. These were they who formerly resolved not to defile themselves with the king's meat, and now they as bravely resolved not to defile themselves with his gods. Note, A steadfast, self-denying adherence to God and duty, in lesser instances, will qualify and prepare us for the like in greater. And in this we must be resolute, never under any pretence whatsoever, to worship images, or to say, A confederacy, with them that do so.

19. Then was Nebuchadnezzar full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego: therefore he spake, and commanded that they should heat the furnace one seven times more than it was wont to be heated. 20. And he commanded the most mighty men that were in his army to bind Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, and to cast them into the burning fiery furnace. 21. Then these men were bound in their coats, their hosen, and their hats, and their other garments, and were cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 22. Therefore, because the king's commandment was urgent, and the furnace exceeding hot, the flame of the fire slew those men that took up Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego. 23. And these three men, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego, fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. 24. Then Nebuchadnezzar the king was astonished, and rose up in haste, and spake and said unto his counsellors. Did we not cast these men bound into the midst of the fire? They answered and said unto the king, True, O king. 25. He answered and said, Lo, I see four men loose, walking in the midst of the fire, and they have no hurt; and the form of the fourth is like the Son of God. 26. Then Nebuchadnezzar came near to the mouth of the burning fiery furnace, and spake, and said, Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-ego, ye servants of the most high God, come forth, and come hither. Then Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-ego, came forth of the midst of the fire. 27. And the princes, governors, and captains, and the king's counsellors, being gathered together, saw these men, upon whose bodies the fire had no power, nor was a hair of their head singed, neither were their coats changed, nor the smell of fire had passed on them.

In these verses, we have,

1. The casting of these three faithful servants of God into the fiery furnace. Nebuchadnezzar had himself known and owned so much of the true God, that, one would have thought, though his pride and royal contempt might have led him to wish to be worshiped, yet that what these young men now said, (when he had formerly found to be wiser than all his wise men,) should have revived his convictions, and at least have engaged him to dispense with them: but it proved quite otherwise.

2. Instead of being convinced by what they said, he was exasperated, and made more outrageous, v. 19. It made him full of fury, and the form of his visage was changed against these men. Note, British passions, the more they are indulged, the more violent they grow, and even change the composure, to the great reproach of the wisdom and reason of a man. Nebuchadnezzar, in this heat, exchanged the awful majesty of a prince upon his throne, for the frightful fury of a wild bull in a net. Would men in a passion but view their faces in a glass, they would blush at their own folly, and turn all their displeasure against themselves.

3. Instead of mitigating their punishment, in consideration of their quality, and the pests of honour they were in, he ordered it to be heightened, that they should heat the furnace seven times more, or with such a mixture of other fuels, that they should put seven times more fuel to it; which, though it would not make their death more grievous, but rather despatch them the sooner, was designed to signify that the king looked upon their crime as seven times more heinous than the crimes of others, and so made their death more ignominious. But God brought glory to himself out of this foolish injustice, by delivering them in the king's rage; for though it would not have made their death the more grievous, yet it did make their deliverance much more illustrious.

3. He ordered them to be bound in their clothes, and cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace; which was done accordingly, v. 20, 21. They were bound, that they might not struggle, or make any resistance; were bound in their clothes, for haste, or that they might be consumed the more slowly and gradually. But God's providence ordered it for the increase of the miracle, in that their clothes were not so much as singed. They were bound in their coats or mantles, their hosen or breeches, and their hats or turbans, as if, in detestation of their crime, they would have made their clothes to be burnt with them. What a terrible death was this—To be cast bound into the midst of a burning fiery furnace? v. 23. It makes one's flesh tremble to think of it, and horror to take hold on one. It is amazing that the tyrant was so hard-hearted as to inflict such a punishment, and that the confessors were so stout-hearted as to submit to it rather than sin against God. But what is this to the second death, to that furnace into which the tares shall be cast in bundles, to that lake which burns eternally with fire and smoke. Let Nebuchadnezzar heat his furnace as hot as he can, a few minutes will finish the torment of those who are cast into it: but hell-fire tortures, and does not kill; the pain of damned sinners is more exquisite, and the smoke of their tor ment ascends for ever and ever, and they have no rest, no intermission, no cessation of their pains, who have worshipped the beast and his image, (Rev. xiv. 10, 11.) whereas their pain would be soon over that were cast into this furnace for worshipping this Babylonian beast and his image.

4. It was a remarkable providence, that the men, the mighty men, that bound them, and threw them into the furnace, were themselves consumed or suffocated by the flame, v. 22. The king’s commandment was urgent, that they should dispatch them quickly, and be sure to do it effectually; and therefore they resolved to go to the very mouth of the furnace, that they might throw them into the midst of it, but they were not to take time to arm themselves accordingly. The apocryphal additions to Daniel say that the flame ascended forty-nine cubits above the mouth of the furnace. Probably, God ordered it so, that the wind blew it directly upon them with such violence that it smothered them. God did thus immediately plead the cause of his injured servants, and take vengeance for them on their persecutors, whom he punished, not only in the very act of their sin, but by it. But these men were only the instruments of cruelty; he that bade them do it had the greater sin; yet they suffered justly for executing an unjust decree, and it is very probable that they did it with pleasure, and were glad to be so employed. Nebuchadnezzar himself was reserved for a further recompense from the Lord, as it is said, ‘The arm of the Lord is not shortened, nor his strength diminished, according to his pleasure.’ Ps. lxxxiii. 13. Therefore the same men will be punished, not only for the cruelties they have been guilty of, but for employing those about them in their cruelties, and so exposing them to the judgments of God.

1. The deliverance of these three faithful servants of God out of the furnace. When they were cast into the midst of the fiery furnace, though the fire might well conclude that we should hear of them, that their very bones would be calcined; but, to our amazement, we here find that Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego are yet alive.

2. Nebuchadnezzar finds them walking in the fire: He was astonished, and rose up in haste, v. 24. Perhaps the slaying of the men that executed his sentence, was calculated to strike him, as well as we might have reason to think it would be; or it was some unaccountable impression upon his own mind that astonished him, and made him rise up in haste, and go to the furnace, to see what was become of these he had cast into it. Note, God can strike those with astonishment, whose hearts are most hardened, both against him, and against his people. He that made the soul, can make his sword to approach to it, even to that of the greatest tyrant. In his astonishment he calls his counsellors about him, and appeals to them whether we did not cast three men bound into the fire. It seems, it was done by order, not only of the king, but of the counsel. They durst not but concur with him, which his forced them to do; so they were tied, and set them at liberty; thus God’s people have their hearts enlarged, through the grace of God, by those very troubles with which their enemies designed to straiten and hamp- per them. (2.) They had no hurt, made no complaint, felt no pain, or un easiness in the least: the flame did not scorch them, the smoke did not stifle them, they were alive, and as well as ever, in the midst of the flames. See how the God of nature can, when he pleases, control the powers of nature, to make them serve his purposes. Now was fulfilled, in the letter, that gracious promise, Isa. lxxiii. 2. When thou walkest through the fire, thou shalt not be burnt, neither shall the flame kindle upon thee. By faith they believe the righteousness of the king, and quench the fiery darts of the wicked. (3.) They walked in the midst of the fire: the furnace was large, so that they had room to walk: they were unhurt, so that they were able to walk; their minds were easy, so they were disposed to walk, as in a paradise or garden of pleasure.

6. The men and the arms of the Lord were magnified, v. 30. When the king perceived that the God of Daniel was able to preserve the men that were in the furnace, v. 30. The king therefore therefore be seized; of them out privily, no, verily, but he will come himself and fetch them out, Acts xvi. 37. Observe the respectful title that he gives them; when he was in the heat of his fury and rage against them, it is probable that he called them rebels and traitors, and all the ill names he could invent; but now he owns them for the servants of the Most High God; a God who now appears able to deliver them out of his hand. Note, Sooner or later, God will convince the prodest of men, that he is the Most High God, and above them, and too hard for them, even in those things wherein they deal proudly and prematurely, Exod. xviii. 11. He will likewise let them know who are his servants, and that he owns them, and will stand by them. Elijah prayed, (1 Kings xviii. 36.) Let it be known that thou art God, and that I am thy servant. Nebuchadnezzar now embraces those whom he had abandoned, and is very officious about them, now that he perceives them to be the favourites of Heaven. Note, What persecutors have done against God's servants, when God opens their eyes, they must as far as they can undo again.

How the fourth, whose form was like the Son of God, withdrew, and whether he vanished away, or visibly ascended, we are not told, but of the other three we are informed, (1.) That they came forth out of the midst of the fire, as Abraham their father out of Ur, the fire of the Chaldees, into which, says this tradition of the Jews, he was cast, for refusing to worship idols, and out of which he was delivered, as those his three children were; when they had their discharge, they did not tempt God by staying in any longer, but came forth as brands out of the burning. (2.) That it was made to appear to the full satisfaction of all the amazed spectators, that they had not received the least damage by it, for when they came together to view them, and found that there was not so much as a hair of their head singed. Here that was true in the letter, which our Saviour spake figuratively, for an assurance to his suffering servants, that they should sustain no real damage; (Luke xxi. 18.) There shall not a hair of your head perish. Their clothes did not so much as change colour, or melt away, much less were their bodies in the least scorched or blistered in, the fire had no power on them. The Chaldeans worshipped the fire, as a sort of an image of the sun, so that, in restraining the fire now, God put contempt, not only upon their king, but upon their god too, and showed that his voice divides the flames of fire as well as the floods of water, (Ps. xxxii. 7.) when he pleases to make a way for his people through the midst of the fire, and our God only that is the consuming Fire; (Heb. xii. 29.) other fire, if he but speak the word, shall not consume.

28. Then Nebuchadnezzar spake and said, Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, who hath sent his angel, and delivered his servants that trusted in him, and have changed the king's word, and yielded their bodies, that they might not serve nor worship any god except their own God. 29. Therefore I make a decree, That every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amiss against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; because there is no other god that can deliver after this sort. 30. Then the king promoted Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, in the province of Babylon.

The strict observations that were made, super visum corporis—on inspecting their bodies, by the princes and governors, and all the great men who were present upon this public occasion, and who could not be supposed partial in favour of the confessors, contributed much to the clearing of this miracle, and the magnifying of the power and grace of God in it. That indeed a notable miracle has been done, is manifest, and we cannot deny it, Acts xii. 24. Let us now see what effect it had upon Nebuchadnezzar.

1. He gives glory to the God of Israel, as a God able and ready to protect his worshippers; (v. 28.) Blessed be the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego. Let him have the honour both of the faithful allegiance which his subjects bear to him, and the powerful protection he grants to them, rather of which can be paralleled between any other nation and their gods. The king does himself acknowledge and adore him, and thinks it is fit that he should be acknowledged and adored by all. Blessed be the God of Shadrach. Note, God can extort confessions of his blessedness even from these that have been ready to curse him to his face. (1.) He gives him the glory of his power, that he was able to protect his worshippers against the most mighty and malignant enemies: There is no other god that can deliver after this sort, (v. 29.) no, not this golden image which he had set up. For this reason, there was no other god that obliged his worshippers to cleave to him only, and to suffer death rather than worship any other, as the God of Israel did; for they could not engage to bear them out in so desperate a case. But he could none the more deliver them as no other can, he may demand such obedience as no other now. (2.) He gives him the glory of his goodness, that he was ready to do it; (v. 28.) He has sent his angel, and delivered his servants. Bel could not save his worshippers from being burnt at the mouth of the furnace, but the God of Israel saved his from being burnt when they were cast into the midst of the furnace, because they refused to worship any other god. Note, This Nebuchadnezzar was plainly given to understand that all the great success which he had had, and should yet have, against the people of Israel, which he gloried in, as if he had therein overpowered the God of Israel, was owing purely to their sin; if the body of that nation had faithfully adhered to their own God, and the worship of him only, as these three men did, the stock and name would have been preserved out of his hand as these three men were. And this was a necessary instruction for him at this time.

2. He applauds the constancy of these three men in their religion, and describes it to their honour, (v. 28.) though he is not himself persuaded to own their God for his, and to worship him; because, if he do so, he knows he must worship him only, and renounce all others, and he calls him the God of Shadrach, not my God; yet he commands them for cleaving to him, and not serving or worshipping any other God but their own. Note, There are many who are not religious themselves, and yet will own that they are clearly in the right that are religious, and are steadfast in their religion. Though they are not themselves persuaded to close with it, yet they will have it, and they shall all have it, clave to it. If men have given up their names to that God who will alone be served, let them keep to their principles, and serve him only, whatever it cost them. Such a constancy in the true religion will turn to men's praise, even among them that are without, when steadiness, treachery, and double dealing, are what all men will cry shame on. He commands them that they did this, (1.) With a generous contempt of their lives, which they valued not, in comparison with the favour of God, and the testimony of a good conscience. They yielded their own bodies to be cast into the fiery furnace rather than they would not only not forsake their God, but not affront him, by once paying that homage to any other, which is due to him alone. Note, Those shall have their praise, if not of men, yet of God, who prefer their souls before their bodies, and will rather lose their lives than forsake their God. Those know not the value and value nobly, who do not think it worth suffering for. (2.) They did it with a glorious contradiction to their prince: they changed the king's word, they went contrary to it, and thereby put contempt upon both his precepts and threatenings, and made him repent and revoke both. Note, Even kings themselves must own that, when their commands are contrary to the commands of God, he is more to be obeyed and trusted in, than the king himself, in had they did it, with a gracious confidence in their God. They trusted in him that he would stand by them in what they did, that he would either bring them out of the fiery furnace, back to their place on earth, or lead them through the fiery furnace, forward to their place in heaven; and in this confidence they became fearless of the king's wrath, and regardless of their own lives. Note, A steadfast faith in God will produce a steadfast faithfulness to God. Now this honourable testimony, thus publicly borne by the king himself to these servants of God, we may well think, would have a good influence upon the rest of the Jews that were, or should be, captives in Babylon. Their neighbours could not with any confidence urge them to do that, nor could they for shame do that which was done by those who were preserved by the king himself for not doing. Nay, and what God did for these his servants, would help not only to keep the Jews close to their religion while they were in captivity, but to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, for which end they were sent into captivity; and when it had been that blessed effect on them, they might be assured that God would deliver them out of that captivity, as now he delivered their brethren out of this.

3. He issues out a royal edict, strictly forbidding any to speak evil of the God of Israel, v. 29. We have reason to think that both the sins and the troubles of Israel had great occasion, though no just occasion, to the Chaldeans to blaspheme the God of Israel, and, it is likely, Nebuchadnezzar himself had encouraged it; but now, though he is no true convert, nor is wrought upon to worship him, yet he resolves never to speak ill of him again, nor to suffer others to do so; Whoever shall speak any thing amiss, any error, (so some,) or rather any reproach or blasphemy, whoever shall speak with contempt of the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cast into the fiery furnace, and from hence he shall be cut in pieces, as Agag was by the sword of Samuel, and their houses shall be demolished, and made a dunghill. The miracle now wrought by the power of this God, in defence of his worshippers, publicly in the sight of the thousands of Babylon, was a sufficient justification of this edict. And it would contribute much to the glory of the Jews, their captivity, to be by this law screened from the fiery darts of reproach and blasphemy, with which otherwise they would have been continually annoyed. Note, It is a great mercy to the church, and a good point gained, when its enemies, though they have not their hearts turned, yet have their mouths stopped, and their tongues tied. If a heathen prince band, or even the king of the Jews, philosophers, much more should Christian princes do it; nay, in this thing, one would think that men should be a law to themselves, and that those who have so little love to God, that they care not to speak well of him, yet could never find in their hearts, for we are sure they could never find cause, to speak any thing amiss of him.

4. He not only reverses the attainers of these three men, but restores them to their places in the government, (makes them to prosper, so the word is,) and prefers them to greater and more advantageous trusts than they had been in before; He promoted them in the province of Babylon, which was much to their honour, and the comfort of their children in captivity there. Note, It is the wish of princes to prefer and employ men of steadfastness in religion; for these are most likely to be faithful to them, who are faithful to God; and it is likely to be well with them, when God's favourites are made theirs.

CHAP. IV.

The penman of this chapter is Nebuchadnezzar himself; the story concerning him here recorded is given in his own words, as he himself drew it up, and published it; but Daniel, a prophet, by inspiration, inserts it in his history, and so it is become a part of sacred writ, and a very obvious instance of the mysterious working of God. Note, Nebuchadnezzar, in a certain measure, is a rival with God Almighty for the sovereignty as perhaps any mortal man ever was; but here he fairly owns himself conquer'd, and gives it under his hand, That the God of Israel is above him. Here is, 1. The preface to his narrative, wherein he acknowledges God's dominion over him, v. 1., 2. II. The narrative itself, wherein he relates, 1. His dream, which puzzled the magicians, v. 1., 18. 2. His interpretation, by Daniel, who showed him that it was a prognostication of his own fall, advising him therefore to repent and reform, v. 19., 27. 3. The accomplishment of it in his running through the fiery furnace, v. 28., 30. 4. The conclusion of the narrative, with an humble acknowledgment and adoration of God as Lord of all, v. 37. This was extorted from him by the sight of the glory which has all men's hearts in his hand, and stands upon record a lasting proof of God's sovereignty, a monument of his glory, a trophy of his victory, and a warning to all not to be carried away by the speciousness, while they lift up or harden their hearts against God.

1. NEBUCHADNEZZAR the king, unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth: Peace be multiplied unto you. 2. I thought it good to shew the signs and wonders that the high God hath wrought toward me. 3. How great are his signs! and how mighty are his wonders! his kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and his dominion is from generation to generation.

Here is,

1. Something of a form which was usual in writs, proclamations, or circular letters, issued out by the king, v. 1. The royal style which Nebuchadnezzar makes use of, has nothing in it of pomp or fancy, but is plain, short, and unaffected; Nebuchadnezzar the king. If at other times he made use of great swelling words of vanity in his title, now he had them all aside; for he was old, he was lately recovered from a distraction which had humbled and mortified him, and proved to the dread of the breath of contemplation of God's greatness and sovereignty. The declaration is directed, not only to his own subjects, but to all to whom this present writing shall come; to all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth. He is not only willing that they should all hear of it, though it carry the account of his own infancy, (which perhaps none durst have published,) that he had not done it himself, and therefore Daniel published the original paper,) but he strictly charges and commands all manner of persons to take notice of it: for all are concerned, and it may be profitable to all. He salutes those to whom he writes, in the usual form, Peace be multiplied unto you. Note, It becomes kings with their commands to dispense their good wishes, and, as fathers of the country, to bless their subjects. So the common form with us: We send greeting. Omniaque his praebet literae feminenverirt, salutem.—To all to whom these presents shall come, health; and sometimes, Salutem semperiteram—Health and salvation everlasting.

II. Something of substance and matter. He writes thus:

1. To acquaint others with the providences of God that had related to him; (v. 2.) I thought it good to show the signs and wonders that the high God (so he calls the true God) has wrought toward me. He thought it seemly, (so the word is,) that it was his duty, and did well become him, that it was a debt he owed to God and the world, now that he was restored, to relate these illustrious transactions, both by the example of them, the vast and memorable places, and record for future ages, how justly God had humbled him, and how graciously he had at length restored him. All the nations, no doubt, had heard what befell Nebuchadnezzar, and rang of it; but he thought it fit that they should have a distinct account of it from himself, that they might know the hand of God in it, and what impressions were made upon his own spirit by it, and might speak of it not as a matter of news, but as a matter of religion. The events concerning him were not only wonders to be admired, but signs to be instruct ed by, signifying to the world that Jehovah is greater than all gods. Note, We ought to show to others God's dealings with us, both the rebukes we have been under, and the favours we have received; because they are signs not only of God's eternal disposal, but of his scattered dispensations upon himself, as this here did upon Nebuchadnezzar, yet we must not conceal it, as long as it may redound to the glory of God. Many will be forward to tell what God has done for their souls, because that turns to their own praise, who care not for telling what God has done against them, and how they have deserved it; whereas we ought to give glory to God, not only by praising him for his mercies, but by confessing our faults, and acknowledging the punishment of our iniquity, and in both taking shame to ourselves, as this mighty monarch here does.

2. To show how much he was himself affected with them, and convinced by them, v. 3. We should always speak of the word and works of God with concern and seriousness, and show ourselves affected with those great things of God, which we desired not, but should take notice of.

(1.) He admires God's doings. He speaks of them as one amazed; How great are his signs and how mighty are his wonders? Nebuchadnezzar was now old, had reigned above forty years, and had seen as much of the world and the revolutions of it as most men ever did; and yet never till now, when himself was nearly touched, was he brought to admire surprising events as God's signs and his wonders. Now, How great, how mighty, are they? Note, The more we see events to the Lord's doing, and see in them the product of divine power, and the conduct of a divine wisdom, the more marvellous they will appear in our eyes, Ps. cxviii. 23.—lxxvi. 2.

(2.) He infers from hence God's dominion. This is that which he is at length brought to subscribe to; His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom; and not like his a kingdom which he saw and let pass; but, in a dream, hastening towards a period. He now owns that there is a God that governs the world, and has an universal, incontestable, absolute dominion in and over all the affairs of the children of men. And it is the glory of this kingdom, that it is everlasting; other reigns are confined to one generation, and other dynasties to a few generations, but God's dominion is from generation to generation. It should seem, Nebuchadnezzar is now humbled, and here refers to what Daniel had foretold of a kingdom which the God of heaven would set up, that should never be destroyed, (ch. ii. 44.) which, though meant of the kingdom of the Messiah, he understood of the providential kingdom. Thus we may make a profitable practical use and application of those prophetic scriptures, which yet we do not fully, and perhaps not rightly, taking the meaning of.

4. I. Nebuchadnezzar was at rest in his house, and flourishing in my palace: I saw a dream which made me afraid, and the thoughts upon my bed and the visions of my head troubled me. 6. Therefore made I a decree to bring in all the wise men of Babylon before me, that they might make known unto me the interpretation of the dream. 7. Then came in the magicians, the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers; and I told the dream before them; but they did not make known unto me the interpretation thereof. 8. But at the last Daniel came in before me, (whose name was Belteshazzar, according to the name of my god, and in whom is the spirit of the holy gods,) and before him I told the dream, saying, 9. O Belteshazzar, master of the magicians, because I know that the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, and no secret troubleth thee, tell me the visions of my dream that I have seen, and the interpretation thereof. 10. Thus were the visions of my head in my bed: I saw, and, behold, a tree in the midst of the earth, and the height thereof was great. 11. The tree grew, and was strong, and the height thereof reached unto heaven, and the sight thereof to the end of all the earth. 12. The leaves thereof were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all: the beasts of the field had shadow under it, and the fowls of the heaven dwelt in the boughs thereof, and all flesh was fed of it. 13. I saw in the visions of my head upon my bed, and, behold, a watch and a holy one came down from heaven. 14. He cried aloud, and said thus, Hewn down the tree, and cut off his branches, shake off his leaves, and scatter his fruit: let the beasts get away from under it, and the fowls from his branches. 15. Nevertheless, leave the stump of his roots in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts in the grass of the earth. 16. Let his heart be changed from man's, and let a beast's heart be given unto him; and let seven times pass over him. 17. This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones; to the intent that the living may know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will, and setteth up over it the basest of men. 18. This dream I king Nebuchadnezzar have seen. Now thou,
O Belteshazzar, declare the interpretation thereof; forasmuch as all the wise men of my kingdom are not able to make known unto me the interpretation: but thou art able; for the spirit of the holy gods is in thee.

Nebuchadnezzar, before he relates the judgments of God that had been brought upon him for his pride, gives an acount of the fair warning he had of them before they came, which if he had duly regarded, they might have been prevented. But therefore he was told of them, and of the issue of them, before they came to pass, that, when they did come to pass, by comparing them with the prediction of them, he might see, and say, that they were the Lord's doing; and might be brought to believe that there is a divine revelation in the world, as well as a Divine Providence, and that the works of God agree with his word.

Now, in the account he here gives of his dream, by which he had notice of what was coming, we may observe,

I. The time when this alarm was given him; (v. 4.) He was at rest in his house and flourishing in his palace. He had conquered Egypt, and with it completed his victories, and ended his wars, and made himself monarch of all those parts of the world, which was about the thirty-fourth or thirty-fifth year of his reign, Ezck. xxix. 17. Then he had this dream, which was accomplished about a year after; seven years his distraction continued, upon his recovery from which he penned this declaration, lived about two years after, and died in his forty-fifth year. He had undergone a long fatigue in his wars, had made many a tedious and dangerous campaign in the field; but now at length he is at rest in his house, and there is no adversary, nor evil occurring. Note, God can reach the greatest of men with his terrors then when they are most secure, and think themselves at rest and flourishing.

II. The impression it made upon him; (v. 5.) I saw a dream, which made me afraid. One would think no little thing would frighten him that had been a man of war from his youth, and used to look the perils of war in the face without change of countenance; yet, when God pleases, a dream strikes a terror upon him. His bed, no doubt, was soft, and easy, and well guarded, and yet his own thoughts upon his bed make him uneasy, and the visions of his head, the creatures of his own imagination, trouble him. Note, God can make the greatest of men uneasy, even then when they say to their souls, Take your ease, eat, drink, and be merry; can make those who have been the troublers of the world, and have tormented thousands, to be their own tormentors, their own tormentors; and those that have been the terror of the mighty, a terror to themselves. By the construction which this dream put him into, and the impression it made upon him, he perceived it to be, not an ordinary dream, but sent of God on a special errand.

III. His consulting, in vain, with the magicians and astrologers concerning the meaning of it. He had not now forgotten the dream, as before, ch. ii. 1. He had it ready enough, but he wanted to know the interpretation of it, and what was figured by it, v. 6. Orders are immediately given to summon all the wise men of Babylon, that were such foals as to pretend by magic, divinations, inspecting the entrails of beasts, or observations of the stars, to predict things to come; they must all come together, to see if any, or all of them in consultation, could interpret the king's dream. It is probable that these people had sometimes, in a like case, given the king some sort of satisfaction, and by the rules of their art had answered the king's queries so as to please him, whether it were right or wrong, hit or missed; but now that his expectation from them was disappointed, he told them the dream, (v. 7.) but they could not tell him the interpretation of it; though they had boasted, with great assurance, (ch. ii. 4, 7.) that if they had but the dream told them, they would without fail interpret it. But the key of this dream was in a sacred prophecy; (Ezek. xxxi. 3.) which God had revealed to Daniel, and had bid him tell Nebuchadnezzar here, to a sure cut down, for his pride; and that was a book they had not studied, or acquainted themselves with, else they might have been let into the mystery of this dream. Providence ordered it so that they should be first puzzled with it, that Daniel's interpreting it afterwards might redound to the glory of the God of Daniel. Now was fulfilled what Isaiah foretold, ch. xliv. 13, 17; that when the ruin of Babylon was drawing on, her enchantments and sorceries, her astrologers and stargazers, should not be able to do her any service.

IV. The court he made to Daniel, to engage him to expound his dream to him; At the last Daniel came in, v. 8. Either he declined associating with the rest, because of their badness; or they had been denied the art which the king would rather that his own magicians should have the honour of doing it if they could, than that Daniel should have it; or Daniel being governor of the wise men, (ch. ii. 48.) was, as usual, last consulted. Many make God's word their last refuge, and never have recourse to it till they are driven off by all other arts. He compliments Daniel highly, very highly, takes notice of the name which he had himself given him, in the choice of which he thinks he was very happy, and that it was a good omen, his name was Belteshazzar, from Bel, the name of my god; he applauds his rare endowments, he has the spirit of the holy gods, so he tells him to his face; (v. 9.) with which we may suppose that Daniel was so far from being puffed up, that he was rather very much grieved to hear that which he had by gift from the God of Israel, the true and living God, ascribed to Nebuchadnezzar's god, a dunghill deity. Here is a strange medley in Nebuchadnezzar, but such as is commonly found in those that side with their corruptions against their convictions. 1. He retains the language and dialect of Babylonia, and makes Belteshazzar, his idolatrous deity; and upon that the holy God of Israel would not allow them to convert to the faith and worship of the living God. He is an idolater, and his speech bewrayeth him. For he speaks of many gods, and is not brought to acquaintance in one as sufficient, no, not in him who is all-sufficient. And some think, when he speaks of the spirit of the holy gods, that he supposes there are some evil, malignant deities, whom men are concerned to worship, only to prevent them doing them a mischief, and some who are good, beneficent deities, and that by the spirit of them Daniel was animated. He also owns that Bel was his god still, though he had once and again acknowledged the God of Israel to be Lord of all, ch. ii. 47.—iii. 20. He also applauds Daniel, not as a servant of God, but as master of the magicians, (v. 9.) supposing his knowledge to differ from theirs, not in kind, but only in degree; and he consulted him not as a prophet, but as a celebrated magician; so endeavouring to save the credit of the art, when those blundered and were nonsensical, who were masters of the art. See how close his idolatry sat to him; he has got a notion of many gods, and has chosen Bel for his god, because he can have no certain notion of his choice, though the absurdity of both had been evidenced to him, more than once, beyond contradiction. He, like other heathens, would not change his gods, though they were no gods, Jer. 6.
11. Many persist in a false way, only because they think they cannot in honour leave it. See how loose his convictions sat, and how easily he had dropped them: he once called the God of Israel a God of gods, ch. ii. 47. Now he sets him upon a level with the rest of those whom he calls the holy gods.

Note. If convictions be not speedily prosecuted, it is a thousand to one but in a little time they are quite lost and forgotten. Nebuchadnezzar, not God, is the subject of his consciousness, and by his own hand had been brought to make of the sovereignty of the true God, soon went backward, and relapsed to the same veneration he had always had for his false gods. And yet, 2. He professes a great opinion of Daniel, whom he knows to be a servant of the true God, and of him only. He looked upon him as one that had such an insight, such a foresight, as none of his magicians had; I know that no secret troubles thee. Note, The spirit of prophecy quite outdoes the spirit of divination, even the enemies themselves being judges; for so it was adjudged here, upon a fair trial of skill.

V. The particular account he gives him of his dream.

1. He saw a stately flourishing tree, remarkably and all the limbs of the wood. This tree was planted in the midst of the earth, (v. 10.) fitly re-presenting him who reigned in Babylon, which was about the midst of the then known world. His dignity and eminency above all his neighbours were signified by the height of this tree, which was exceeding great, it reached unto heaven: he overtopped those about him, and aimed to have divine honours given him; nay, he overpowered those about him; and the potent armies he had to command of, with which he carried all before him, are signified by the strength of this tree; it grew, and was strong. And so much were Nebuchadnezzar and his growing greatness the talk of the nations, so much had they their eye upon him, (some a jealous eye, all a wondering eye,) that the sight of this tree is said to be to the end of all the earth. This tree had every thing in it that was pleasant to the eye, and good for food; (v. 12.) The leaves thereof were fair; denoting the pomp and splendour of Nebuchadnezzar's court, which was the wonder of strangers, and the glory of his own subjects. Nor was this tree for sight and state only, but for use. (1.) For protection; the boughs of it were for shelter, both to the beasts and to the fowls. Princes should be a screen to their subjects from the heat, and protection to their nations from invasion. (2. 2.) For provision. The Assyrian was compared to a cedar, (Ezck. xxxii. 6.) which affords shadow only; cut this tree here had much fruit, in it was meat for all, and all flesh was fed of it. This mighty monarch, it should seem by this, not only was great, but did good; he did not impose his will upon his subjects, but gave them encouragement to the contrary; nor was his power made use of to the injury and interest abroad brought wealth and trade to it. They that exercise authority would be called benefactors, (Luke xxi. 25.) and the most effectual course they can take to support their authority is, to be really benefactors. And see what is the best that great men with their weight and power can attain to, and that is, to have the honour of having many to live upon them, and to be maintained by them; for as goods are increased, they are increased that eat them.

2. He heard the doom of this tree read, which he perfectly remembered, and relates it here, perhaps, word for word as he heard it. The sentence was passed upon it by an angel, whom he saw come down from heaven, and heard proclaim this sentence aloud. This angel is here called a watcher, or watchman; not only because angels by their nature are spies, and all eyes are upon them, but because they are sleep, but because by their office they are ministering spirits, and attend continually to their ministrations, watching all opportunities of serving their great Master. They, as watchers, encamp round them that fear God, to deliver them, and bear them up in their hands. This angel was a messenger, or ambassador, (so some read it,) and a holy one. Holiness becomes God's house; therefore angels attend, and are employed by him, are holy ones; they preserve the purity and rectitude of their nature, and are in every thing conformable to the divine will.

Let us review the doom passed upon the tree.

(1.) Orders are given that it be cut down; (v. 14.) now also the axe is laid to the root of this tree. Though it is ever so high, ever so strong, that can not secure itself from the hand of him that slays it; the branches and fowls, that are sheltered and sustained by the boughs of it, are driven away and dispersed; the branches are cropped, the leaves shaken off, and the fruit scattered. Note, Worldly prosperity in his highest degree is a very uncertain thing; and it is no uncommon thing for those that have lived in the greatest pomp and power, to be stripped of all that which they trusted in, and gloried in. By the turns of providence, those who made a figure become captives, those who lived in plenty, and above what they had, are reduced to straits, and live far below what they had, and these perhaps are brought to be beheld to others, who once had many depending upon them, and making suit to them. But the trees of righteousness, that are planted in the house of the Lord, and bring forth fruit to him, shall not be cut down, nor shall their leaf wither.

(2.) Care is taken that the root be preserved; (v. 15.) Leave the stump of it in the earth, exposed to all weather; there let it lie neglected and buried in the grass; let the beasts that formerly sheltered themselves under the boughs, now repose themselves upon the stump; but, that it may not be raked to pieces, or trodden to dirt, and to show that it is yet reserved for better days, let it be hooped round with a bar of iron, over which it shall stand firm. Note, God in judgment remembers mercy; and may yet have good things in store for those whose condition seems most forlorn. There is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, that through the scent of water it will bud; Job xiv. 7-9.

(3.) The meaning of this is explained by the angel himself to Nebuchadnezzar; (v. 16.) whoever is a man symbolic by this tree, he is sentenced to be deposed from the honour, state, and dignity of a man, to be deprived of the use of his reason, and to be and live like a brute, till seven times pass over him; Let a beast's heart be given unto him. This is surely the saddest and sorriest of all temporal judgments, worse a thousand times than death, and though like it, least felt by man, yet to be paddled by him, by his heart and his understanding, more than any other. Nay, whatever outward affliction God is pleased to lay upon us, we have reason to bear it patiently, and to be thankful that he continues to us the use of our reason, and the peace of our conscience. But those proud tyrants who set their heart as the heart of God, (Ezck. xxviii. 2.) justly may be deprived of the heart of man, and have a beast's heart given them.

(4.) The truth of it is confirmed; (v. 17.) This matter is by the decree of the watchers, and the demand by the word of the holy ones. God has determined it, as a righteous Judge; he has signed the seals to know the time determined, and the decree gone forth. And, [1.] The angels of heaven have subscribed to it; as attesting it, approving it, and applauding it. It is by the decree of the watchers; not that the great God needs the counsel or concurrence of the angels in any thing he determines or does, but as he uses their ministration in executing his counsels, so he is sometimes represented, after events were past, mingled or mixed up in the matter with them: "Whom shall I send? Isa. vi. 8. Who shall persuade Ahaz? 1 Kings xxii. 20. So it denotes the solemnity of this sentence. The king's brevies, or short writs, pass, Teste me jube-—In my presence; but charters used to be signed, His testibus—In presence of us which names are underwritten; such was Nebuchadnezzar's doom, it was by the decree of the watchers.

[2.] The saints on earth petitioned for it, as well as the angels in heaven; The demand is by the word of the holy ones. God's suffering people, that had long groaned under the heavy yoke of Nebuchadnezzar's tyranny, cried to him for vengeance; they made the demand, and God gave this answer to it; for when the oppressed cry to God, he will hear, Exod. xxii. 27. So it is written, in Abah's time, that there should be no more rain, at Elias's word, when he made intercession against Israel, 1 Kings xvii. 1.

(5.) The design of it is declared; therefore orders are given for the cutting down of this tree, to the intent that the living may know that the Most High rules. This judgment must be executed, to convince the unthinking, unbelieving world, that verily there is a God that judges in the earth, a God that governs the world, that not only has a kingdom of his own in it, and administers the affairs of that kingdom, but rules also in the kingdom of men, in the dominion that one man has over another, and gives that to whomever he will from him promotion comes, Ps. lxv. 6, 7. He advances men to power and dominion that little expected it, and crosses the projects of the ambitious and aspiring. Sometimes he sets up the basest of men, and serves his own purposes by them; mean men, as David from the sheep-fold; he raises the poor out of the dust, to set them among princes, Ps. exii. 7, 8. Nay, sometimes he sets up bad men, to be a scourge to a provoking people. Thus he can do, thus he may do, thus he often does, and gives not account of any of his acts; by himself, or by Nebuchadnezzar it was designed that the living should be made to know this. The dead know it, that are gone to the world of spirits, the world of retribution, they know that the Most High rules; but the living must be made to know it, and lay it to heart, that they may make their peace with God before he be too late.

Thus has Nebuchadnezzar fully and faithfully related his dream, what he saw, and what he heard, and then demands of Daniel the interpretation of it, (v. 18.) for he found that no one else was able to do it, but is confident that he was; For the spirit of the holy gods is in thee, or of the Holy God; the proper title of the God of Israel. Much may be expected from those that have in them the Spirit of the Holy God. Whether Nebuchadnezzar had any jealousy that it was his own doom that was read by this dream, does not appear; perhaps he was so vain and secure as to imagine that it was some other prince that was a rival with him, of whose fall he had the pleasing prospect given him in this dream: but, be it for him or against him, he is very solicitous to know the meaning of it, and desires of God, upon Daniel to give it him. Note, When God gives us general warnings of his judgments, we should be desirous to understand his mind in them, to hear the Lord's voice crying in the city.

19. Then Daniel, (whose name was Bel- teshazzar,) was astonished for one hour, and his thoughts troubled him. The king spake and said, Belteshazzar, let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. Belteshazzar answered and said, My lord, the dream be to them that hate thee and the interpretation thereof to thine enemies. 20. The tree that thou sawest, which grew, and was strong, whose height reached unto the heaven, and the sight thereof to all the earth; 21. Whose leaves were fair, and the fruit thereof much, and in it was meat for all; under which the beasts of the field dwelt, and upon whose branches the fowls of the heaven had their habitation: 22. It is thou, O king, that art grown and become strong: for thy greatness is grown, and reacheth unto heaven, and thy dominion to the end of the earth. 23. And whereas the king saw a watcher and a holy one coming down from heaven, and saying, Hiew the tree down, and destroy it; yet leave the stump of the roots thereof in the earth, even with a band of iron and brass in the tender grass of the field; and let it be wet with the dew of heaven, and let his portion be with the beasts of the field, till seven times pass over him; 24. This is the interpretation, O king, and this is the decree of the Most High, which is come upon my lord the king: 25. That they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and they shall wet thee with the dew of heaven, and seven times shall pass over thee, till thou know that the Most High ruleth in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.

We have here the interpretation of Nebuchadnezzar's dream; and when once it is applied to himself, and it is declared that he is the tree in the dream, (Mututum nomine, de te fabula narratur—Change but the name, the fable speaks of thee,) when once it is said, Thou art the man, there needs little more to be said for the explication of the dream; out of his own mouth he is judged; so shall his doom be himself has decided it. The thing was so plain, that Daniel, upon hearing the dream, was restrained for one hour, v. 19. He was struck with amazement and terror at so great a judgment coming upon speak a prince: his flesh trembled for fear of God. He was likewise struck with confusion, when he found himself under a necessity of being the man that must bring to the king those heavy tidings, which, having received so many favours from the king, he had rather he should have heard from any one else; so far is he from desiring the woful day, that he dreads it, and the thoughts of it trouble him. They that came after the ruined sinner, are said to meet with this day, as they that went before, and saw it coming, (as Daniel here,) were affrighted, Job xlvii. 20.

1. The preface to the interpretation is a civil compliment which, as a courtier, he passes upon the king. The king observed him to stand as one astonished, and thinking he was loath to speak out for fear of offending him, he encouraged him to deal plainly and faithfully with him; Let not the dream, or the interpretation thereof, trouble thee. This he speaks either, (1.) As one that sincerely desired to know the truth. Note, Those that consult the oracles of God must be ready to receive them as they are, whether they be for them or against them, and must accordingly give their ministers leave to be free with them. Or, (2.) As one that despised the truth, and set it at defiance when God spake, as he saith, Is. xlii. 28. We are tempted to think that this was his meaning; Let it not trouble thee, for I am resolved it shall not trouble me; nor will I lay it to heart. But whether he have any concern for himself or no, Daniel is concerned for him, and therefore wishes, The dream be to them that hate thee. Let the ill it bodes light on the head of thine enemies, not on thine head.

2. The interpretation itself is only a repetition of the dream, with application to the king. As for the tree which thou sawest flourishing, (v. 20, 21.) it is thou, O king, v. 22. And willing enough would the king be to hear this, as before he heard, Thou art the head of gold, but for that which follows. He shows the king his present prosperous state in the glass of his own dream; Thy greatness is grown, and reaches as near heaven as human greatness can do, and thy dominion is to the end of the earth, ch. ii. 37, 38. As for the dream which passed over him, (v. 22.) it is the decret of the Most High, which comes upon my lord the king, v. 24. He must not only be deposed from his throne, but driven from men, and being deprived of his reason, and having a beast's heart given him, his dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field, and with them he shall be a fellow-commoner, he shall eat grass as oxen, and, like them, lie out all the months, and be covered with dust and ashes to the seventh hour of the day; for seven times over him, seven years; and then he shall know that the Most High rules: and when he is brought to know and own that, he shall be restored to his dominion again, v. 26. Thy kingdom shall be sure unto thee, shall remain as firm as the stump of the tree in the ground, and thou shalt have it, after thou shalt have known that the beast doth rule. God everhad the heavens, because it is in heaven that he has prepared his throne, (Ps. ciil. 19.) from thence he beholds all the sons of men, Ps. xxxiii. 13. The heavens, even the heavens, are the Lord's; and the influence which the visible heavens have upon this earth, is intended as a faint representation of the dominion the God of heaven has over this lower world, and the power of the heavens against him, Isa. xlvii. 18. Note, Then only we may expect comfortably to enjoy our right in, and government of, both our selves and others, when we dutifully acknowledge God's title to, and dominion over, us and all we have.

3. The close of the interpretation is the pious counsel which Daniel, as a prophet, gave the king; (v. 27.) whether he appeared concerned or not at the interpretation of the dream, a word of advice would be very seasonable, if careless, to awaken him, if troubled, to comfort him; and it is not inconsistent with the dream and the interpretation of it, for Daniel knew not but it might be conditional, like the prediction of Nineveh's destruction. Observe, (1.) How humbly he gives his advice, and with what tenderness and respect; O king, let my counsel be acceptable unto thee; take it in good part, as coming from love, and well meant, and let it not be misconstrued. Note, Sinners need to be courted to their own good, and accosted gently, to do well for themselves. The apostle beseeches men to suffer the word of exhortation, Heb. xiii. 22. We think it a good point gained, if people will be persuaded to take good counsel kindly; nay, if they will take it patiently. (2.) What his advice is; he does not counsel him to enter into a course of hypocrisy, for the preventing of the distemper in his head, but to break off a course of sin that he was in; to reform his life; he wrote to the Jews, Break off thy iniquity by showing mercy to these poor; purifying those oppressed ones, setting them at liberty, or making their captivity easy to them. Note, It is necessary, in repentance, that we not only cease to do evil, but learn to do well; not only do no wrong to any, but do good to all. (3.) What the motive is, with which he backs this advice; If it may be a lengthening of thy tranquillity. Though it should not wholly prevent the judgment, yet by this means a reprove may be obtained, as by Ahah's humbling himself; 1 Kings xxi. 29. Either the trouble may be the longer before it comes, or the shorter when it does come; yet he cannot assure him of this, but it may be, it may prove so. Note, The very probability of preventing a temporal judgment, is conducive enough to a work so good in itself as the leaving off our sins, and reforming of our lives, much more the certainty of preventing our eternal ruin. This would be a healing of thine errors, (so some read it;) "thus the quarrel will be taken up, and all will be well again."

29. All this came upon the king Nebuchadnezzar. 29. At the end of twelve months he walked in the palace of the kingdom of Babylon. 30. The king spake and said, Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the house of the kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty? 31. While the word was in the king's mouth, there fell a voice from heaven, saying, O king Nebuchadnezzar, to thee it is spoken; The kingdom is departed from thee: 32. And they shall drive thee from men, and thy dwelling shall be with the beasts of the field: they shall make thee to eat grass as oxen, and seven times shall pass over thee, until thou know that the Most High rules in the kingdom of men, and giveth it to whomsoever he will.
The same hour was the thing fulfilled upon Nebuchadnezzar: and he was driven from men, and did eat grass as oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven, till his hairs were grown like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's dream accomplished, and Daniel's application of it to him justified and confirmed. How he took it we are not told, whether he was pleased with Daniel or displeased; but here we have—

1. God's presence with him; All this came upon him, but not till twelve months after, (ver. 29.) so long there was a lengthening of his tranquillity, though it does not appear that he broke off his sins, or showed any mercy to the poor captives, for this was still God's quarrel with him, that he opened not the house of his prisoners, Isa. xiv. 17. Daniel having counselled him to repent; God so far confirmed his word, that he gave him space to repent: let him alone this year also, this one year more, before he brought this judgment upon him. Note, God is therefore long-suffering with provoking sinners, because he is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance, 2 Pet. iii. 9.

2. His pride and haughtiness, and abuse of that power which he had by the place of the kingdom of Babylon, in pomp and pride, pleasing himself with the view of that vast city, which, with all the territories thence to belonging, was under his command, and he said, either to himself or to those about him, perhaps some foreigners to whom he was showing his kingdom and the glory of it, Is it not this great Babylon? Yes, it is great, of vast extent, no less than forty miles in the city, and two or three miles within; it is full of inhabitants, and they full of wealth; it is a golden city, and that is enough to speak it great, Isa. xiv. 4. See the grandeur of the houses, walls, towers, and public edifices; every thing in Babylon he thinks good; and this great Babylon I have built. Babylon was built many ages before he was born, but because he had fortified and beautified it, and we may suppose much of it was rebuilt during his long and prosperous reign, he boasts that he has built it; as Augustus Caesar boasted concerning Rome, Lateritiam inveni, marmoream reliqui—I found it brick, but I left it marble. He boasts that he built it for the house of the kingdom, the metropolis of his empire. This vast city, compared with the countries that belonged to his dominions, was but a poor house. He built it for himself and his sons, and all that were subject to him, and what he did it by the might of his power; he built it for his security and convenience, yet, as if he had no occasion for it, boasts that he built it purely for the honour of his majesty. Note, Pride and self-conceit are sins that most easily beget great men, who have great things in the world. Truly it takes the glory to themselves which is due to God only.

3. His punishment for his pride. When he was thus strutting, and vaunting himself, and adorning his own shadow, while the proud word was in the king's mouth, the powerful word came from heaven, by which he was immediately deprived, (1.) Of his kingdom as a king; The kingdom is departed from thee. When he had the greatest possible bulwarks for the preserving of his kingdom, now, in an instant, it is departed from him; when he thought it so well guarded, that none could take it from him, behold, it departs of itself. As soon as he becomes utterly incapable to manage it, it is of course taken out of his hands. (2.) He is deprived of his honour as a man; he no longer enjoys the advantage of that means loses his dominion; They shall drive thee from men, ver. 32. And it was fulfilled; (ver. 33.) he was driven from men the same hour.

On a sudden he fell stark mad, distracted in the highest degree that ever any man was. His understanding and memory were gone, and all the faculties of a rational soul broken, so that he became a perfect brute in the shape of a man. He went naked, and on all fours, like a brute; did himself shun the society of reasonable creatures, and run wild into the fields and woods; and was driven out by his own servants, who, after some time of trid, despairing of his return to his right mind, abandoned him, and looked after him no more. He had not the spirit of a beast of prey, (that of the royal lion,) but of the unoffending ox, and less sensible creature, for he was made to eat grass as oxen; and, probably, he did not speak with human voice, but lowed like an ox. Some think that his body was all covered with hair; however, the hair of his head and beard, being never cut or combed, grew like eagles' feathers, and his nails like birds' claws.

Let us pause a little, and view this miserable spectacle; and let us receive instruction from it. [1.] Let us see here what a mercy it is to have the use of our reason, how thankful we ought to be for it, and how careful we ought to be not to do anything which may either provoke God, or may have a natural tendency, to put us out of the possession of our own souls. Let us learn how to value our own reason, and our present estate in the midst of those that are under the yoke, and especially those; nor let us forget the prevailing power of meekness, patience, and reason; or be very tender in our censures of them and conduct toward them, for it is a temptation common to men, and a case which, some time or other, may be our own. [2.] Let us see here the vanity of human glory and greatness; Is this Nebuchadnezzar the Great? What, this desppicable animal, which is meaner than the poorest beggar? Is this he that looked so glorious on the throne, so formidable in the camp, that had politics enough to subdue and govern kingdoms, and now has not so much sense as to keep his own clothes on his back; Is this the man that made the earth to tremble, that did shake kingdoms? Isa. xiv. 16. Never let the wise man then glory in his wisdom, or the mighty man in his strength. [3.] Let us see here how God resists the proud, and delights to abuse them, and put contempt upon them. Nebuchadnezzar would be more than a man, and therefore God justly makes him less than a man, and puts him upon a level with the beasts, that set up for a rival with his Maker. See Job xi. 11—13.

34. And at the end of the days, I Nebuchadnezzar lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, and mine understanding returned unto me; and I blessed the Most High; and I praised and honoured him that liveth for ever, whose dominion is an everlasting dominion, and his kingdom is from generation to generation: 35. And all the inhabitants of the earth are reckoned as nothing; and he doeth according to his will in the army of heaven, and among the inhabitants of the earth; and none can stay his hand, or say unto him, What dost thou? 36. At the same time my reason returned unto me; and, for the glory of my kingdom, mine honour and brightness returned unto me; and my counsellors and my lords sought unto me; and I was established in my kingdom; and excellent majesty was added unto me. 37. Now I Nebuchadnezzar praise and exalt and nourish the King of heaven, all whose works are truth, and his ways judgment; and those that walk in pride he is able to abase.

We have here Nebuchadnezzar's recovery from his distraction, and his return to his right mind, at the end of the days prefixed, of the seven years; so long he continued a monument of God's justice, and a trophy of his victory over the children of pride; and he was made more so by being struck mad, than if he had been in an instant struck dead with a thunderbolt. Yet it was a mercy to him that he was kept alive; for, while there is life, there is hope that we may yet praise God, as he did here; At the end of the days, (says he,) I lifted up mine eyes unto heaven, (v. 34.) looked no longer down toward the earth as a beast, but began to look up as a man; Our hominum subline dedit—Heaven gave to man an erect countenance. But there was more in it than this; he looked up as a devout man, as a penitent, for a humble petitioner for mercy, being perhaps never till now made sensible of his own misery. And now, I. He has the use of his reason so far restored to him, that with it he glorifies God, and humbles himself under his mighty hand. He was told that he should continue in that forlorn case, till he should know that he should have dominion. He has brought to the knowledge of that: Mine understanding returned to me, and I blessed the Most High. Note. Those may justly be reckoned void of understanding, that do not bless and praise God; nor do men ever rightly use their reason till they begin to be religious, nor live as men till they live to the glory of God. As reason is the substratum or subject of religion, (so that creatures which have no reason are not capable of religion,) so religion is the crown and glory of reason, and we have our reason in vain, and shall one day wish we had never had it, if we do not glorify God with it. This was the first act of Nebuchadnezzar's returning reason; and when this became the employment of it, he was then, and not till then, qualified for all the other enjoyments of it. And till he was for a great while disabled to exercise it in other things, he never was brought to apply it to this, which is the greatest end for which our reason is given us. His folly was the means whereby he became wise; he was not recovered by his dream of this judgment, (that was soon forgotten like a dream,) but he is made to feel it, and then his ear is opened to discipline. To bring him to himself, he must first be beside himself. And by his own means, and not by the wisdom of God, who was not then in his mind, and all good work does, that was forethought there, were not of himself, (for he was not his own man,) but it was the gift of God.

Let us see what Nebuchadnezzar is now at length effectually brought to the acknowledgment of; and we may learn from it what to believe concerning God.

1. That the most high God lives for ever, and his being knows neither change nor period, for he has it of himself. His flatterers often complimented him with, O king, live for ever! But he is now convinced that no king lives for ever, but the God of Israel only, who is still the same.

2. That his kingdom is like himself, everlasting, and his dominion from generation to generation; there is no succession, no revolution, in his kingdom. All the kings are but for a season, for ever, and of his government there is no end.

3. That all nations before him are as nothing; he has no need of them, he makes no account of them. The greatest of men, in comparison with him, are less than nothing. Those that think highly of God, think meanly of themselves.

4. That his kingdom is universal, and both the armies of heaven and the inhabitants of the earth are his subjects, and under his check and control. Both angels and men are employed by him, and accountable to him; the highest angel is not above his command, nor the meanest of the children of men beneath his cognizance. The angels of heaven are his armies, the inhabitants of the earth his tenants.

5. That his power is irresistible, and his sovereignty uncontrollable, for he does according to his will, according to his design and purpose, according to his dispositions and decrees; whatever he pleases that he does; whatever he appoints it, that is established; and none can resist his will, change his counsel, or stay his hand, or say unto him, What dost thou? Can none arrange his proceedings, inquire into the meaning of them, or demand a reason for them. Wo to him that strives with his Maker; that says to him, What dost thou, or, Why dost thou so?

5. That every thing which God does, is well done; his works are truth, for they all agree with his word. His ways are judgment, both wise and righteous, exactly consonant to the rules both of prudence and equity, and no fault to be found with them.

7. That he has power to humble the haughtiness of his enemies that act in contradiction to him, or competition with him; Those that walk in pride he is able to abase; (v. 37.) he is able to deal with those that are not justly confident of their own sufficiency to contend with him.

II. He has the use of his reason so far restored to him, as with it to re-enjoy himself, and the pleasures of his re-established prosperity; (v. 36.) At the same time my reason returned to me; he had said before, (v. 34.) that his understanding returned to him, and here he mentions it again, for the use of our reason is a mercy we can never be enough thankful for. Now his lords sought to him; he did not need to seek to them, and they soon perceived, not only that he had recovered his reason, and was fit to rule, but that he had recovered it with advantage, and was more fit to rule than ever. It is probable that the dream and the interpretation of it were well known, and much talked of, at court; and the former part of the prediction being fulfilled, that he should go distracted, they doubted not but that, according to the prediction, he should come to himself again at seven years' end, and, in confidence of that, when the time was expired, were ready to receive him; and then his honour and brightness returned to him, the same that he had before his madness seized him. He is now established in his kingdom as firmly as if there had been no interruption given him for his reason; and now, he is not only wiser, wiser than ever; and he that but the other day was in the depth of disgrace and ignominy, has now excellent majesty added to him, beyond what he had when he went from kingdom to kingdom conquering and to conquer. Note. 1. When men are brought to honour God, particularly by a penitent confession of sin and a believing acknowledgment of his sovereignty, then, and not to a thing, they may expect that God will put honour upon them; will not restore them to the dignity they lost by the sin of the first Adam, but add excellent majesty to them from the righteousness and grace of the second Adam.

2. Afflictions shall last no longer than till they have done the work for which they were sent. When this prince is brought to own God's dominion over him, and the same, then, and not to a thing, they may expect that God will put honour upon them; will not restore them to the dignity they lost by the sin of the first Adam, but add excellent majesty to them from the righteousness and grace of the second Adam.

All the accounts we take and give of God's dealing with us ought to conclude with praises to him. When Nebuchadnezzar is restored to his kingdom, he praises and extols and honours the King of heaven, (v. 37.) before he applies himself to his secular business. Therefore we have our reason, that we may be in a capacity of praising him, and therefore our prosperity, that we may have cause to praise him.
It was not long after this that Nebuchadnezzar ended his life and reign. Abydenus, quoted by Eusebius, (Præf. Evang. I. 9) reports from the tradition of the Chaldeans, that upon his death-bed he foretold the taking of Babylon by Cyrus. Whether he continued in the same good mind that here seems to be, or whether he did anything appear to the contrary but that he did: and if so great a blasphemer and persecutor did find mercy, he was not the last. And if our charity may reach so far as to hope he did, we must admire free grace, by which he lost his vote for awhile, that he might save his soul for ever.

CHAP. V.

The destruction of the kingdom of Babylon had been long and often foretold when it was at a distance; in this chapter we have it accomplished, and a prediction of it the very same night that it was accomplished. Belshazzar now reigned in Babylon; some compute he had reigned seventeen years, others but three; we have here the story of his exit, and the period of his kingdom. We must know, that about two years before this, Cyrus, king of Persia, a growing monarch, came against Babylon with a great army: Belshazzar met him, fought him, and was routed by him in a pitched battle. He and his scattered forces retired into the city, where Cyrus besieged them; they were very secure, because the river Euphrates was their moat, and they had twenty years before been in it, but in the second year of the siege, he took it, as is here related. We have in this chapter, I. The riotous, idolatrous, sacrilegious feast which Belshazzar made, in which he filled up the measure of his iniquity, v. 1-14. II. The alarm given him in the midst of his jollity by a hand-writing on the wall, which none of his wise men could read or tell him the meaning of, v. 5-9. III. The interpretation of the mystical characters by Daniel, who, was at length brought in to him, and dealt plainly with him, and showed him his doom written, v. 10-25. IV. The immediate accomplishment of the interpretation in the slaying of the king and seizing of the kingdom, v. 30, 31.

1. BELSHAZZAR the king made a great feast to a thousand of his lords, and drank wine before the thousand. 2. Belshazzar, while he tasted the wine, commanded to bring the golden and silver vessels which his father Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple which was in Jerusalem; that the king and his princes, his wives and his concubines, might drink therein. 3. Then they brought the golden vessels that were taken out of the temple of the house of God which was in Jerusalem; and the king and his princes, his wives and his concubines, drank in them. 4. They drank wine and praised the gods of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. 5. In the same hour came forth fingers of a man's hand, and wrote over against the candlestick upon the plaster of the wall of the king's palace; and the king saw the part of the hand that wrote. 6. Then the king's countenance was changed, and his thoughts troubled him, so that the joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another. 7. The king cried aloud to bring in the astrologers, the Chaldeans, and the soothsayers. And the king spake, and said to the wise men of Babylon. Whosoever shall read this writing, and shew me the interpretation thereof, shall be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about his neck, and shall be the third ruler in the kingdom. 3. Then came in all the king's wise men: but they could not read the writing, nor make known to the king the interpretation thereof. 9. Then was king Belshazzar greatly troubled, and his countenance was changed in him, and his lords were astonished.

We have here Belshazzar the king very gay, but all of a sudden very gloomy, and in straits in the face of Cyrus, who was a well-disposed monarch, and had confidence in God, and God affrights him; and wait what will be the issue of this contest, and whether he that hardened his heart against God prospered. I. See how the king affronted God, and put contempt upon him. He made a great feast, or banquet of wine; probably, it was some anniversary solemnity, in honour of his birth-day, or coronation-day, or some of their idolatry; historians say that Cyrus, who was now with his army besieging Babylon, knew of this feast, and, presuming that they then would be off their guard, solemnly buried it in sleep and wine, took that opportunity to attack the city, and so with the more ease made himself master of it. Belshazzar upon this occasion invited a thousand of his lords to come and drink with him. Perhaps he thought as such a preparation lay in it. Hence they glorified themselves in defence of the city against the besiegers; or these were his great council of war, with whom, when they had well drunk, he would advise what was further to be done. And they were to look upon it as a great favour that he drank wine before them, for it was the pride of those eastern kings to be seldom seen. He drank wine before them, that he might thus as had glorified himself and outdone himself in the king of Nineveh, yet forty days, or fewer, and Babylon shall be destroyed. He should therefore, like the king of Nineveh, have proclaimed a fast; but, as one resolved to walk contrary to God, he proclaims a feast, and beholds, joy and gladness, slaying oxen, killing sheep, eating flesh, and drinking wine, as if he dared the Almighty to do his worst, Isa. xxvii. 12, 13. To show how little fear he had of being forced to surrender, for want of provisions, he spent thus extravagantly. Note, Security and sensuality are sad presages of approaching ruin. Those that will not be warned by the judgments of God, may expect to be wounded by them.

2. He put an affright upon the temple of God, and bade defiance to his sanctuary; (v. 2) while he tasted the wine, he commanded to bring the vessels of the temple, that they might drink in them. When he tasted how rich and fine the wine was, "O," said he, "it is pity but we should have holy vessels to drink such delicate wine as this in," which was looked upon as a piece of wit, and to carry on the humour, the vessels of the temple were immediately sent for. Nay, there seems to have been something more in it than a frolic, and that it was done in a malicious despite to the God of Israel; the heart of his people was very much upon those sacred vessels, as appears from Jer. xxxvii. 16, 18. Their principal care was, at their return, was about
Now, we may suppose, they had an expectation of their deliverance approaching, reckoning the seventy years of their captivity near a part of the time that they might perhaps name given out some words to that purport, that shortly they should have the vessels of the sanctuary restored to them, in defiance of which, Belshazzar here proclaims them to be his own, will keep them in store no longer, but make use of them among his own plate. Note, That Mirth is sinful indeed, and fills the measure of men's iniquity apiece, which provoked God to raise the wood and stone, for no worse cause than to ripened Babylon for ruin—that no songs would serve them but the songs of Zion, (Ps. cxvii. 3.) no vessels but the vessels of the sanctuary. Let those who thus sacrilegiously alienate what is dedicated to God and his honour, know that he will not be mocked.

3. He put an affront upon God himself, and made defiance to his deity; for they drank wine, and praised the gods of gold and silver, v. 4. They gave that glory to images, the work of their own hands, and creatures of their own fancy, which is due to the true and living God only. They praised him either with sacrifices offered to them, or with songs sung in honour of them. When their heads were guilty, and their hearts merry with wine, they were in the fittest frame to praise the gods of gold and silver, wood and stone; for no worse think that men in their senses, who had the command of a clear and sober thought, could not be guilty of so gross an absurdity; they must be intoxicated ere they could be so infatuated. Drunken worshippers, who are not men, but beasts, are the most proper for the service of dandhill deities, that are not gods, but devils. They have erred through wine, Isa. xxviii. 7. They drank wine, and praised their idol-gods, as if they had been the founders of their feasts and the givers of all good things to them. Or, When they were drinking wine, they praised their gods by drinking healths to them, and the king drank wine before them, (v. 1.) he began the health, first to this god, and then to the other, till they went through the bead-roll or farrago of them, those of wood and stone not excepted. Note, Immorality and impiety, vice and profaneness, strengthen the hands, and advance the interests, one of another. Drunken frolics were an introduction to idolatry, and then idolatrous healths were a shoeing-horn to further drunkenness.

II. See how God affrighted the king, and struck a terror upon him. Belshazzar and his lords are in their cups, and in their revels, and in their apiece, and all upon the merry pin, drinking confusion, it may be, to Cyrus and his army, and roaring out huzzas, in confidence of the speedy raising of the siege; but the hour was come when that must be fulfilled, which had been long ago said of the king of Babylon, when his city should be besieged by the Persians and Medes; (Isa. xxxii. 3.) The night of the fiftieth of the king's feast, and the third ruler in the kingdom next to the king, that knew no better. Nay, he should be primus pars regni—chief minister of state, the third ruler in the kingdom, next to the king, and his heir apparent.

4. The king is disappointed in his expectations from them; they could none of them read the writing, much less interpret it, (v. 8.) which increases the king's confusion; (v. 9.) he likes the writing not at all, but reads it over, and turns it toward him. His lords also, that had been parter's with him in his jollity, are now sharers with him in his terrors; they also were astonished, and at their wits' end; and neither their numbers nor their refreshment by wine would serve to keep up their spirits. The reason why the wise men could not read the writing was, not because it was written in any language or characters unknown to them, but
God either cast a mist before their eyes, or put such confusion upon their spirits, that they could not read it; that the honour of expounding this mystical writing might be reserved for Daniel. Note, The terror of an awakened, convinced conscience may justly be increased by the utter insufficiency of all creatures to give it ease or satisfaction.

10. Now the queen, by reason of the words of the king and his lords, came into the banquet-house; and the queen spake and said, O king, live for ever: let not thy thoughts trouble thee, nor let thy countenance be changed: 11. There is a man in thy kingdom, in whom is the spirit of the holy gods: and, in the days of thy father, light, and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, was found in him; whom the king Nebuchadnezzar thy father, the king, I say, thy father, made master of the magicians, astrologers, Chaldeans, and soothsayers; 12. Forasmuch as an excellent spirit, and knowledge, and understanding, interpreting of dreams, and shewing of hard sentences, and dissolving of doubts, were found in the same Daniel, whom the king named Belteshazzar: now let Daniel be called, and he will shew the interpretation.

13. Then was Daniel brought in before the king. And the king spake and said unto Daniel, Art thou that Daniel, which art of the children of the captivity of Judah, whom the king my father brought out of Jewry? 14. I have even heard of thee, that the spirit of the gods is in thee, and that light, and understanding, and excellent wisdom, is found in thee. 15. And now the wise men, the astrologers, have been brought in before me, that they should read this writing, and make known unto me the interpretation thereof: but they could not shew the interpretation of the thing: 16. And I have heard of thee that thou canst make interpretations and dissolve doubts: now, if thou canst read this writing, and make known to me the interpretation thereof, thou shalt be clothed with scarlet, and have a chain of gold about thy neck, and shalt be the third ruler in the kingdom. 17. Then Daniel answered and said before the king, Let thy gifts be to thyself, and give thy rewards to another; yet I will read the writing unto the king, and make known to him the interpretation. 18. O thou king, the most high God gave Nebuchadnezzar thy father a kingdom, and majesty, and glory, and honour. 19. And, for the majesty that he gave him, all people, nations, and languages, trembled and feared before him: whom he would he slew, and whom he would he kept alive, and whom he would he set up, and whom he would he put down.

20. But when his heart was lifted up, and his mind hardened in pride, he was deposed from his kingly throne, and they took his glory from him: 21. And he was driven from the sons of men; and his heart was made like the beasts, and his dwelling was with the wild asses: they fed him with grass like oxen, and his body was wet with the dew of heaven; till he knew that the most high God ruled in the kingdom of men, and that he appointeth over it whomsoever he will. 22. And thou art he, O Belshazzar, last not humbled thy heart, though thou knewest all this; 23. But hast lifted up thyself against the Lord of heaven; and they have brought the vessels of his house before thee, and thou and thy lords, thy wives and thy concubines, have drunk wine in them; and thou hast praised the gods of silver and gold, of brass, iron, wood, and stone, which see not, nor hear, nor know: and the God in whose hand thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified. 24. Then was the part of the hand sent from him; and this writing was written. 25. And this is the writing that was written, MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN. 26. This is the interpretation of the thing: MENE; God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it. 27. TEKEL; Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting. 28. PERES; Thy kingdom is divided, and given to the Medes and Persians. 29. Then commanded Belshazzar, and they clothed Daniel with scarlet, and put a chain of gold about his neck, and made a proclamation concerning him, that he should be the third ruler in the kingdom.

Here is,
1. The information given to the king, by the queen-mother, concerning Daniel, how fit he was to be consulted in this difficult case. It is supposed that this queen was the widow of Evil-merodach, and was that famous Nitocris whom Herodotus mentions as a woman of extraordinary prudence. She was not present at the feast, as the king's wives and concubines were; (v. 2) It was not agreeable to her age and gravity to keep a merry night. But tidings of the fright which the king and his lords were put into being brought to her apartment, she came herself to the banqueting-house, to recommend to the king a physician for his melancholy. She entreats him not to be discouraged by the insufficiency of his wise men to solve this riddle, for that there was a man in his kingdom, that could more than once helped his grandfather at such a dead lift, and, no doubt, could help him, v. 11, 12. She could not undertake to read the writing herself, but directs him to one that could; let Daniel be called now, who should have been called first. Now observe,
2. The high character she gives of Daniel; He is a man in whom is the spirit of the holy gods, who has something in him more than human, not only the spirit of a man, which, in all, is the candle of the Lord, but a divine spirit. According to the language of his country and religion, she could not give a higher encomium of any man, than speaking of him as having a very admirable head; Light and understanding, and wisdom, like the wisdom of the gods, were found in him. Such an insight had he into things secret, and such a foresight of things to come, that it was evident he was divinely inspired; he had knowledge and understanding beyond all the other wise men for interpreting of dreams, explaining enigmas, or hard sense and riddles; and reason there was of this wisdom, he had a wonderful sagacity of this kind: but it should seem that in these things Daniel had more of an immediate divine direction; Behold a greater than Solomon himself is here. Yet what was the wisdom of them both, compared with the treasures of the wisdom hid in Christ? (2.) He had an admirable good heart; An excellent spirit was found in him, which was a great ornament to his wisdom and knowledge, and qualified him to receive that gift; for God gives to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy. He was of an humble, holy, heavenly spirit, had a devout and gracious spirit, a spirit of zeal for the glory of God and the good of men. This was indeed an excellent spirit.

The account she gives of the respect that Nebuchadnezzar had for him: he was much in his favour, and was preferred by him; the king this father, (that is, thy grandfather, but even to many generations Nebuchadnezzar might well be called the father of that royal family, for he it was that raised him so high to such a pitch of grandeur,) the king, I say, thy father, made him master of the magicians. Perhaps Belshazzar had sometimes, in his pride, spoken slightly of Nebuchadnezzar, and his politics, and the methods of his government, and the ministers he employed, and thought himself wiser than he; and therefore his motherharps upon that. The king, I say, thy father, to whose good management all thou hast is owing, he pronounced him chief of, and gave him dominion over all, the wise men of Babylon, and named him Belteshazzar, according to the name of his god, thinking thereby to put honour upon him; but Daniel, by constantly making use of his Jewish name himself, (which he resolved to keep, in token of his faithful adherence to his religion,) had worn out that name; only the queen-dowager remembered it, otherwise he was generally called Daniel. Note, It is a very good office to revive the remembrance of the good services of worthy men, who are themselves modest, and willing that they should be forgotten.

3. The motion she makes concerning him; Let Daniel be called, and he will show the interpretation. By this it appears that Daniel was now forgotten at court; Belshazzar was a stranger to him, knew not that he had such a jewel in his kingdom; with the new king there came in a new ministry, and the old one was laid aside. Note, There are a great many good men, whose services, though they have been of very great value, are made use of no more, or made very useful, that lie long buried in obscurity; and some that have done eminent services, that live to be overlooked, and taken no notice of; but whatever men are, God is not unrighteous to forget the services done to his kingdom. Daniel being turned out of his place, lived privately, and sought not any opportunity to come into notice again; yet he lived near the court, as within call, though Babylon was now besieged, that he might be ready, if there were occasion, to do any good office, by what interest he had among the great ones, for the children of his people. But Providence so ordered it, that now, just at the fall of that monarchy, he should by the queen's means be brought to court again, that he might lie there ready for preferment in the ensuing government. Thus do the righteous shine forth out of obscurity, and before honour is humility.

II. The king having given him scope to speak, and his request to read and expound the writing. Daniel was brought in before the king, v. 13. He was now near 90 years of age, so that his years, and honours, and former preferments, might have entitled him to a free admission into the king's presence; yet he was willing to be conducted in, as a stranger, by the master of the ceremonies. Note, 1. The king asks, with an air of laughter, Art thou that Daniel? the great interpreter of dreams, and the best of this kind? Being a Jew, and a captive, he was loath to be behelden to him, if he could have helped it. He tells him what an encomium he had heard of him, (v. 14.) that the spirit of the gods was in him; and he had sent for him to try whether he deserved so high a character or no. 3. He acknowledges that all his wise men of Babylon were baffled; they could not render this writing; nor show the interpretation, v. 15. But, 4. He promises him the same rewards that he had promised them, if he would do it, v. 16. It was strange that the magicians, when now, and in Nebuchadnezzar's time, once and again, they were nonplussed, did not offer at something, to save their credit; if they had with a good assurance said, This is the meaning of such a dream, such a fraud as this! His majesty would have disdained it; but God ordered it, that they had nothing at all to say, as, when Christ was born, the heathen oracles were struck dumb.

III. The interpretation which Daniel gave of these mystic characters, which was so far from easing the king of his fears, that we may suppose it increased them rather. Daniel was now in years, and Belshazzar was young; and therefore he seems to take a greater liberty of dealing plainly and roundly with him than he had done upon the like occasions with Nebuchadnezzar. In reproving any man, especially great men, there is need of wisdom to consider all circumstances: for they are the reproofs of instruction, that are the way of life. In Daniel's discourse here,

1. He undertakes to read the writing which gave them this alarm, and to show them the interpretation of it, v. 17. He shrugs the offer he made him of rewards, is not pleased that it was mentioned, for he is none of those that divine for money; what gratitudes Belshazzar gave him afterward, he thankfully accepted, but he scorned to induct for them, or to read the writing to the king, for and in consideration of such and such honours promised him. Note, We must not seek gifts to be to ourselves; they will be long time, and give thy fee to another, to any of the wise men which thou wou'dst have most wished to earn it; I value it not." Daniel sees his kingdom now at its last gasp, and therefore looks with contempt upon his gifts and rewards. And thus should we despise all the gifts and rewards this world can give, did we see, as we may by faith, its final period hastening on. Let it be its perishing not to have the credit of being the means of a work done for two of our eyes and hearts upon; but let us do our duty in the world, do it all the real service we can, read God's writing to it in a profession of religion, and by an agreeable conversation, make known the interpretation of it, and then trust God for his gifts, his rewards, in comparison with which all the world can give is mere trash and nothing. He describes to the king God's dealings with his father Nebuchadnezzar, which were intended for instruction and warning to him, v. 18.—21. This is not intended for a flourish or an amusement, but is a necessary preliminary to the interpretation of the writing. Note, That we may understand aright what God is doing with us, it is of use to us to review what he has done with others.
(1.) He describes the great dignity and power to which the Divine Providence had advanced Nebuchadnezzar; (v. 18, 19.) He had a kingdom, and majesty, and honour, far above what any heathen prince ever had before him; he thought that he got it by his own extraordinary conduct and courage, and ascribed his successes to a projecting, active genius of his own; but Daniel tells him, who now enjoyed what he had laboured for, that it was the most high God, the God of gods, and Lord of kings, as Nebuchadnezzar himself had call'd God, and gave power to him, that dominion, that vast dominion, that majesty wherewith he presided in the affairs of it, and that glory and honour which by his prosperous management he had acquired. Note, Whatever degree of outward prosperity any arrive to, they must own that it is of God's giving, not their own getting. Let it never be said, My might, and the power of my hand, hath gotten me this wealth, this preferment; but let it always be remembered that it is God that gives men power to get wealth, and gives success to their endeavours. Now the power which God gave to Nebuchadnezzar is here described to be very great in respect both of ability and of authority. [1.] His ability was so strong, that it was irresistible; such was the might of his power, that God gave power to him, walk he had at commandment, and such an admirable des- terity he had at commanding them, that, which way soever his sword turned, it prospered; he could cap tivate and subdue nations by threatening them, without striking a stroke, for all people trembled and feared before him, and would compound with him for their lives upon any terms. See what force is, and what the fear of it does. It is that by which the brutal part of the world, even of the world of mankind, both governs, and is governed. [2.] His authority was so absolute, that it was uncontrollable. The power which was allowed him, which descend ed upon him, or which, at least, he assumed, was without contradiction, was absolute and despotic, none shared with him either in the legislative or in the executive part of it; but in dispensing punishments, he condemned or acquitted at pleasure; Whom he would he slew, and whom he would he saved alive; though both were equally innocent, or equally guilty. The Jesuit cuenta The power of life and death, was entirely in his hand. In dispensing rewards he granted or denied preferments at pleasure; Whom he would he set up, and whom he would he cast down; so that no man could evade him without giving a reason so much as to himself; but it is all ex mea ment—of his own good pleasure, and at his own benevolence. His will stands for a reason. Such was the constitution of the eastern monarchies, such the manner of their kings. (2.) He sets before him the sins which Nebuchadnezzar had been guilty of, whereby he had prov ed himself God's enemy, and had provoked God to bring, not a slight, but a severe punishment upon him. He did him no good, he was neither a beneficent nor a prudent, no, but an abomi nably oppressive to God. He had preferred ungodly men to the great detriment of the public; for this he is accountable to the most high God that gave him his power. Note, It is a very hard and rare thing for men to have an absolute, arbitrary power, and not to make an ill use of it. Camden has a distich of Giraldus, wherein he speaks of it as a rare instance, common among the ancients, that Henry the Second of England, that never any man had so much power, and did so little hurt with it.
signed contempt of him, hast praised the gods of silver and gold, which see not, nor hear, nor know any thing, as if they were to be preferred before the God that sees, and hears, and knows every thing. So were they ashamed to the words of this man, and were well enough pleased with gods that neither see, nor hear, nor know, for then they may sin securely; but they will find, to their confusion, that though those are the gods they choose, those are not the gods they must be judged by, but one to whom all things are naked and open.

(3.) That he had not answered the end of his creation and existence; The God in whose hands thy breath is, and whose are all thy ways, hast thou not glorified. This is a general charge, which stands good against us all; let us consider how we shall answer it. Observe, [1.] Our dependence upon God as our Creator, Preserver, Benefactor, Owner, and Ruler; not only from his hand our breath was at first, but in his hand our breath is still; it is he that holds our souls in life, and if he take away our breath we die. Our times being in his hand, so is our breath, by which our times are measured. In him we live, and move, and have our being; we live by him, live upon him, and cannot live without him. The way of man is not in himself, not at his own command, at his own disposal, but his are all our ways; for our hearts are in his hand, and so are the hearts of all men, of all sorts, of all nations. [2.] Our duty to God, in consideration of this dependence, we ought to glorify him, to devote ourselves to his honour, and employ ourselves in his service, to make it our care to please him, and our business to praise him. [3.] Our default in this duty, notwithstanding that dependence; we have not done it; for we have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God. This is the foundation of all, he that is without sin among you is first cast out. [2.] Our duty to God, in consideration of this dependence, we ought to glorify him, to devote ourselves to his honour, and employ ourselves in his service, to make it our care to please him, and our business to praise him. [3.] Our default in this duty, notwithstanding that dependence; we have not done it; for we have all sinned, and have come short of the glory of God. This is the foundation of all, he that is without sin among you is first cast out.

4. He now proceeds to read the sentence, as he found it written upon the wall: "Then" (says Daniel) "when thou wast come to such a height of impiety as thus to transgress upon the most sacred things, in that thou wast in the midst of thy sacrilegious, idolatrous feast, then was the part of the hand, the writing fingers, sent from him, from that God whom thou didst so daringly affront, and whom thou hadst so long with thee, but would bear no longer; he sent them, and this writing; thou now seest, was written, v. 24. It is he that now writes bitter things against thee, and makes thee to pjomove thy iniquities," Job xxxiii. 26. Note, As the sins of sinners are written in the book of God's omniscience, so the doom of sinners is written in the book of God's law; and the day is coming when these books shall be opened, and they shall be judged by them.

Now the writing was, Mene, Mene, Tekel, Uphaaar- su, v. 25. It is well that we have an authentic instance of what is called in Scripture the writing of things to come, and the future; so that we may have some insight into what the future will be. [1.] Mene; that is repeated, for the thing is certain. [2.] Mene; that is, to be numbered, as in Hebrew and Chaldee, He has numbered and finished; which Daniel explains thus, (v. 26.) "God has numbered thy kingdom, the years and days of the continuance of it; these were numbered in the counsel of God, and now they are finished; the term is expired for and during which thou wast to hold it, and now it must be surrendered. Here is an end of thy kingdom.

(2.) Tekel; that signifies, in Chaldee, Thou art weighed, and in Hebrew, Thou art too light. So Dr. Lightfoot. For this king and his actions are weighed in the just and unerring balances of divine equity. God does as perfectly know his true character as the goldsmith knows the weight of that which he has weighed in the nicest scales. God does not give judgment against him till he has first pondered his actions, and considered the merits of his case. But thou art found wanting unworthily to have such a trust lodged in thee, a vain, light, empty man; a man of no weight or consideration.

(3.) Upharsin; which should be rendered, and Pheres, or Persia. Persia, in Hebrew, signifies the Persians; Persin, in Chaldee, signifies divining; Daniel puts both together; (v. 28.) Thy kingdom is divided, is rent from thee, and given to the Medes and Persians, as a prey to be divided among them.

Now this may, without any force, be applied to the doom of sinners. Mene, Tekel, Persia, may easily be made to signify, death, judgment, and hell. At death, the sinner's days are numbered and finished; after death, the judgment, when he will be weighed in the balance, and found wanting; and after judgment, the sinner will be cut asunder, and given to the devil and his angels. Daniel does not here give Belshazzar such advice and encouragement to repent as he had given Nebuchadnezzar, because he saw the decree was gone forth, and he would not be allowed any space to repent.

One would have thought that Belshazzar would have been exasperated against Daniel, and seeing his own doom decreed against him, and against him. But he was so far convicted by his own conscience of the reasonableness of all he said, that he objected nothing against it; but, on the contrary, gave Daniel the reward he promised him, put on him the scarlet gown, and the gold chain, and proclaimed him the third ruler in the kingdom; (v. 28.) because he would be as good as his word, and because it was not Daniel's fault if the exposition of the hand-writing was not such as he desired. Note, Many show great respect to God's prophets, who yet have no regard to his word. Daniel did not value these titles and ensigns of honour, yet would not refuse them, because they were tokens of his prince's good will; but we have reason to think that he received them with a smile, foreseeing how soon they would all wither with him that had bestowed them. They were like Joshua's gourd, which came up in a night, and perished in a night, and therefore it was folly for him to be exceeding glad of them.

30. In that night was Belshazzar the king of the Chaldeans slain. 31. And Darius the Median took the kingdom, being about threescore and two years old.

Here is, 1. The death of the king. Reason enough he had to tremble, for he was just falling into the hands of the king of terrors. v. 30. In that night, when his heart was merry with wine, the besiegers broke into the city, aimed at the palace, where they found the king, and gave him his death's wound; he could not find any place so secret as to conceal him, or so strong as to protect him. Heathen writers speak of Cyrus's taking Babylon by surprise, with the assistance of two deserters that showed him the best way into the city. And it was foretold what a consternation it would be to the court, Jer.
Daniel does not give a continued history of the reigns in which he lived, nor of the state-affairs of the kingdoms of Chaldea and Persia, though he was himself a great man in those affairs; for what are those to us? But he selects such particular passages of story as serve for the concern of God, and the encouragement of our obedience to him; for the things written aforetime were written for our learning. It is a very observable, instructive story that we have in this chapter, how Daniel by faith stopped the mouths of lions, and gave a good report, Heb. xi. 33. The three children were cast into the fiery furnace for not committing a known sin, Daniel was cast into the lion's den for not omitting a known duty; and God's miraculously delivering of both them and him is left upon record for the encouragement of his servants in all ages to be resolute and constant, both in their abhorrence of that which is evil, and in their adherence to that which is good, whatever it cost them. In this chapter we have, I. Daniel's preferment in the court of Darius, v. 1. 3. II. The envy and malice of his enemies against him, v. 4. 5. III. The decree they obtained against praying for thirty days, v. 6. &c. IV. Daniel's continuance and constancy in prayer, notwithstanding that decree, v. 10. V. Information given against him for it, and the casting of him into the den of the lions, v. 11. 15. VI. His miraculous preservation in the lions' den, and deliverance out of it, v. 18. 20. VII. The casting of his accusers into the den, and their destruction there, v. 24. VIII. The decree which Darius made upon this his honour of Daniel's Medecine, and the prosperity of Daniel afterward, v. 25. 26. And this God is our God for ever and ever.

1. It pleased Darius to set over the kingdom a hundred and twenty princes, which should be over the whole kingdom; 2. And over these, three presidents, of whom Daniel was first; that the princes might give accounts unto them, and the king should have no damage. 3. Then this Daniel was preferred above the presidents and princes, because an excellent spirit was in him; and the king thought to set him over the whole realm. 4. Then the presidents and princes sought to find occasion against Daniel concerning the kingdom; but they could find none occasion nor fault; so much as he was faithful, neither was there any error or fault found in him. 5. Then said these men, We shall not find any occasion against this Daniel, except we find it against him concerning the law of his God.

We are here told concerning Daniel, 1. What a great man he was. When Darius, upon his accession to the crown of Babylon by conquest, new-modelled the government, he made Daniel prime minister of state, set him at the helm, and made him first commissioner both of the treasuries, and of the great princes, and other officers of state; and the kingdom was very large; all he got by his conquests and conquests was, that he had so many more countries to take care of; no more can be expected from himself than what one man can do, and therefore others must be employed under him. He set over the kingdom 120 princes, (v. 1.) and appointed them their districts, in which they were to administer justice, and to observe the ordinances of God, and to preserve the king's revenue. Note, Inferior magistrates are ministers of God to us for good as well as the sovereign; and therefore we must submit ourselves to both the king as supreme, and to the governors that are constituted and commissioned by him, 1 Pet. ii. 13. 14. Over these princes there was a triaunvrite, or three presidents, who were to take and state the public accounts, to receive appeals from the princes, or complaints against them in case of mal-administration, that the king should have no damage, (v. 2.) that he should not sustain loss in his revenue, and that the power he delegated to the princes might not be abused to the oppression of the subject, for by that the king (whether he thinks so or no) receives real damage, both as it alienates the affections of his people from him, and provokes the designs of his God against him. Of these three Daniel was the chief, because he was found to go beyond them all in all manner of princely qualifications. He was preferred above the presidents and princes; (v. 3.) and so wonderfully well pleased the king was with his management, that he thought to set him over the whole realm, and let him place and dispose at his pleasure.

Now, (1.) We must take notice of it to the praise of Darius, that he would prefer a man thus purely for his personal merit, and his fitness for business; and those sovereigns that would be well served, must go by that rule. Daniel had been a great man in the kingdom that was conquered, and for that reason, one would think, should have been looked upon as an enemy, and as such imprisoned or banished; he was a man of great endowments, and a ruined one, and upon that account might have been despised as a stranger and captive; but Darius, it seems, was very quick-sighted in judging of men's capacities, and was soon aware that this Daniel had something extraordinary in him, and therefore, though no doubt, he had creatures of his own, yet a few, that expected preferment in this newly-modelled kingdom, and were gaping for it, and those that had been long his confidants would depend upon it that they should be now his presidents, yet so well did he consult the public welfare, that finding Daniel to excel them all in prudence and virtue, and probably having heard of his being divinely inspired, he made him his right hand. (2.) We must take notice of it, to the glory of God, that though Daniel was now very old, (it is above seventy years since he was brought a captive to Babylon,) yet he was as able as ever for business both in body and mind; and that he who had continued faithful to his religion, through all the temptations of the foregoing reigns, in a new government was as much respected as ever. He kept in by being an oak, not by being a shallow; by a constancy in virtue, not by a pliability to vice. Such honesty is the best policy, for it secures a reputation; and those who thus honour God, he will honour them.

2. What a good man he was; An excellent spirit was in him, v. 3. And he was faithful to every trust, dealt fairly between the sovereign and the subject and took care that neither should be wronged, so that there was no error, or fault, to be found in him, v. 4. He was not only not chargeable with any treachery or dishonesty, but not even with any mistake or indiscretion. He never made any blunder, nor had any occasion to plead misunderstanding or want of fitness for his excuse. This is recorded for an example to all that are in places of public trust, to approve themselves both careful and conscientious, that they may be free, not only from fault, but from error; not only from crime, but from mistake.

3. What all this was borne him, both for his greatness and for his goodness. The presidents and princes envied him, because he excelled them, and, probably, hated him, because he had a watchful eye upon them, and took care they should not wrong the government, to enrich themselves. See here, (1.) The cause of envy; and that is everything that is good. Solomon complains of it as vexation, that for every right work a man is envied of his neighbour; (Eccl. iv. 4.) that the better a man is, the worse he is thought of by his rivals. Daniel is envied because he has a more excellent spirit than his neighbours. (2.) The effect of envy; and that is everything that is bad. Those that envied Daniel, sought not less than his ruin; his disgrace would not serve them, it was his death that they desired. Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who can stand before envy? Prov. xxx. did not all the presidents and princes unite against Daniel, who was placed over his in the management of his place; they sought to find occasion against him, something on which to ground an accusation concerning the kingdom; some instance of neglect or partiality, some hasty word spoken, some person borne hard upon, or some necessary business overlooked. And if they could but have found the mote, the muck-hill, of a mistake that had been made, they would have brought the beam, to the mountain, of an unpardonable misdemeanor. But they could find no occasion against him; they owned that they could not. Daniel always acted honestly, and now the more warily, and stood the more upon his guard, because of his observers, Ps. xxvii. 11. Note, We have all need to walk circumspectly, because we have many eyes upon us, and some that watch for our halting. These especially have need to carry their caji even, that it have it full. They concluded, at length, that they should not find any occasion against him, except concerning the law of his God, v. 5. It seems then that Daniel kept up the profession of his religion, and held it fast without wavering or shrinking; and yet that was no bar to his preferment: there was no law that required him to be of the king's religion, or incapacitated him to bear office in the state, unless he were. It was all one to the king what God he prayed to, so long as he did the business of his place faithfully and well; he was at the king's service sine qua non—so far as the altar; but there he left him. In this matter therefore his enemies hoped to insure him. Quæverunt et crimen, (Jer. xxx. 36.; 2 Chron. xxiv. 3; 27; 32.) the charge brought against him could not be charged upon him, he was accused of impiety, Grotius. Note, It is an excellent thing, and much for the glory of God, when those who profess religion conduct themselves so inoffensively in their whole conversation, that their most watchful, spiteful enemies may find no occasion of blaming them, save only in the matters of their God, in which their work according to their conscience or courage. It is observable that when Daniel's enemies could find no occasion against him concerning the kingdom, they had so much sense of justice left, that they did not soburn witnesses against him to accuse him of crimes he was innocent of, and to swear treason upon him, wherein they shame many that were called Jews, and are called Christians.

6. Then these presidents and princes assembled together to the king, and said thus unto him, King Darius, live forever. 7. All the presidents of the kingdom, the governors, and the princes, the counselors, and the captains, have consulted together to establish a royal statute, and to make a firm decree, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days, save of thee, O king, he shall be cast into the den of lions. 8. Now, O king, establish the decree, and sign the writing, that it be not changed, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 9. Wherefore king Darius signed the writing and the decree. 10. Now when Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he went into his house; and, his windows being open in his chamber toward Jerusalem, he kneeled upon his knees three times a-day, and prayed, and gave thanks before his God, as he did aforetime.

Daniel's adversaries could have no advantage against him from any law now in being; they therefore contrived a new law, by which they hope to insinuate him, and in a matter in which they knew they should be sure of him; and such was his fidelity to his God, that they gained their point. Here is, 1. Darius's impious law. I call it Darius's because he gave the royal assent to it, and otherwise it would not have been enacted. King Darius was not only以後 it had been contrived it not, and was perfectly wheeled to consent to it. The presidents and princes framed the edict, brought in the bill, and by their management it was agreed to by the convention of the states, who perhaps were met at this time upon some public occasion; it is pretended that this bill which they would have to pass into a law, was the result of mature deliberation, that all these presidents of the kingdom, the governors, princes, counselors, and captains, had consulted together about it, and that they not only agreed to it, but advised it, for divers good causes and considerations, that they had done what they could to establish it for a firm decree, may, they intimate to the king, that it was carried nemine contradicente—unanimously; All the presidents are of this mind; and yet we are sorely to blame, if we think because Daniel, the chief of the three presidents, did not agree to it; and have reason to think that many more of the princes excepted against it, as absurd and unreasonable. Note, It is no new thing for that to be represented, and with great assurance too, as the sense of the nation, which is far from being so; and that which few apprehend, is sometimes confirmed by many, and raised into an establishment. This code, out of the iniquity of kings, who, being under a necessity of seeing and hearing with other people's eyes and ears, are many times wretchedly imposed upon! These designing men, under colour of being bidden to the king, but really intending the ruin of his favourite, press him to pass this into a law, and make it a royal statute, that whosoever shall ask a petition of any god or man for thirty days, save of the king, should be put to death after the most barbarous manner, should be cast into the den of lions, v. 7. This is the bill they have been hatchling, and they lay it before the king to be signed, and passed into a law. Now, 1. There is nothing in it that has the least appearance of good, but that it magnifies the king, and makes him seem both very great, and very kind to his subjects, which, they suggest, will be of good service to him now that he is newly come to his throne, and will confirm his interests. All men must be made to believe that the king is so rich, and withal so ready to all petitioners, that none in any want or distress need apply themselves either to God or man for relief, but to him only. And besides the petitions, Daniel gives occasion to all that have any petition to present to him. It is indeed much for the honour of kings, to be benefactors to their subjects, and to have their ears open to their complaints and requests; but if they pretend to be their sole benefactors, and undertake to be them instead of God, and challenge that respect from them, which is due to God only, it is manifest that they aim at nothing short of the Person of God. There is a great deal in it that is apparently evil; it is bad enough to forbid asking a petition of any man, must not a beggar ask an alms, or one neighbour beg a kindness of another? If the child want bread, must he not ask of his parents, or be cast into the den of lions if he do? Nay, they that have business with the king, may they not pretend those about him to introduce them? But it was much worse, and an impudent affront to all religion, to forbid asking a petition of any god. It is by prayer that we give glory to God, fetch in mercy from God, and so keep up our communion with God; and to interdict prayer for thirty days, is for so long to rob God of all the tribute he has from man, and to rob man of all the comfort he has in God. When the light of nature teaches us that the providence of God has the ordering and disposing of all our affairs, does not the law of nature oblige us by prayer to acknowledge God, and seek to him? Does not every man's heart direct him, when he is in want or distress, to call upon God, and must this be made high treason? We could not live a day without God; and can men live thirty days without prayer? Will the king himself be tied up so long as he is praying to God; or if he be allowed to, will he undertake to do it for all his subjects? Did ever any nation thus slight their gods? But see what absurdities malice will drive men to. Rather than not bring Daniel into trouble for praying to his God, they will deny themselves and all their friends the satisfaction of praying to theirs. Had they proposed only to prohibit the Jews from praying to their God, Daniel and his friends were so free to express that they knew the king would not pass such a law, and therefore made it thus general. And the king, puffed up with a fancy that this would set him up as a little god, was fond of the feather in his cap, (for so it was, and not a flower in his crown,) and signed the writing and the decree, (v. 9,) which, being once done according to the constitution of the united kingdom of the Medes and Persians, was irrevocable, and any pretence whatsoever to be altered or dispensed with, or the breach of it pardoned.

II. Daniel's pious disobedience to this law, v. 10. He did not retire into the country, or abscond for some time, though he knew the law was levelling against him; but because he knew it was so, therefore he stood his ground, knowing that he had now a firm hold of the king, and a pleasing impression upon him, and showing that he preferred his favour, and his duty to him, before life itself. When Daniel knew that the writing was signed, he might have gone to the king, and expostulated with him about it; nay, he might have remonstrated against it, as grounded upon a misrepresentation that all the presidents had consented to it, whereas he that was chief of them, and who was next in the order of the ministry, and first sent to his house, and applied himself to his duty, cheerfully trusting God with the event. Now observe,

1. Daniel's constant practice, which we were not informed of before this occasion, but which we have reason to think was the general practice of the pious Jews. (1.) He prayed in his house, sometimes himself alone, and sometimes with his family about him, and made a solemn business of it. Cornelius was a man that prayed in his house, Acts x. 50. Note, Every house not only may be, but ought to be, a house of prayer. There are all who have an altar, and on it we must offer spiritual sacrifices. (2.) In every prayer he gave thanks, when we pray to God for the mercies we want, we must praise him for those we have received. Thanksgiving must be a part of every prayer. (3.) In his prayer and thanksgiving he had an eye to God as his God, his in covenant; and set himself as in his presence, and did this with a regard to God. (4.) When he prayed and gave thanks, he kneeled upon his knees, which is the most proper gesture in prayer, and most expressive of humility, and reverence, and submission to God. Kneeling is a begging posture, and we come to God as beggars, beggars for our lives, when it concerns to be important. (5.) He opened the windows of his chamber, that the sight of the visible heavens might aid him in his prayer, and be a remembrance of that God who dwells above the heavens: but that was not all; he opened them toward Jerusalem, the holy city, though now in ruins, to signify the affection he had for its very stones and dust, (Ps. cxi. 14,) and the remembrance he had of its concerns daily in his prayers. This, though he himself lived great in Babylon, yet he testified his concurrence with the meanest of his nation, and a dependence upon that God who was in their behalf and preferring it before his chief joy, Ps. cxxvii. 5, 6. Jerusalem was the place which God had chosen to put his name there; and when the temple was dedicated, Solomon's prayer to God was, that if his people should in the land of their enemies pray unto him with their eye toward the land which he gave them, and the city he had chosen, and the house which was built to his name, then he would hear and maintain their cause, (1 Kings vii. 48, 49,) to which prayer Daniel had reference in this circumstance of his devotions. (6.) He did this three times a day, three times every day, according to the example of David, (Ps. lv. 17,) Morning, evening, and at noon I will pray. It is good to have our hours of prayer, not to bind, but to mind, conscience; we think it would not be amiss to have refreshments of them by food thrice a day, that we may thus be enabled to observe our souls? This is surely as little as may be to answer the command of praying always. (7.) He did this so openly and avowedly, that all who knew him, knew it to be his practice; and he thus showed it, not because he was proud of it, (in the place where he was, there was no room for that temptation, for it was not reputation, but reproach, that attended it,) but because he was not ashamed of it. Though Daniel was a great man, he did not think it below him to be thrice a day upon his knees before his Maker, and to be his own chaplain; though he was an old man, he did not think himself past it, nor, though it had been his practice from his youth up, was he weary of this well-doing. Though he was a man of business, vast business, for the service and the public good, he had time to take a leaf out of God's book, and to set apart an hour in the day from the daily exercises of devotion. How inexcusable then are they who have but little time to do in the world, and yet will not do thus much for God and their souls! Daniel was a man famous for prayer, and for success in it; (Ezek. xiv. 14,) and he came to be so by thus making a conscience of prayer, and making a business of it daily; and in this practice he shewed the success of it.

2. Daniel's constant adherence to this practice, even when it was made by the law a capital crime. When he knew that the writing was signed, he continued to do so he did aforetime, and altered not one circumstance of the performance. Many a man, yea, and many a good man, would have thought it prudence to omit it for these thirty days, when he could not do it without hazard of his life; he might have prayed so much the oftener when those days were expired, and the danger was over, or he might have performed the duty at another time, and another place, so secretly, that it should not be possible for his enemies to discover it; and so he might both satisfy his conscience, and keep up his commi-nion with God, and yet avoid the law, and continue in his usefulness: but if he had done so, it would have been thought, both by his friends and by his enemies, that he had thrown up the duty for this time, through cowardice and base fear, which would have tended very much to the dishonour of God and the discourgagement of his friends. Others who moved in a lower sphere, might well enough act with, caution; but Daniel, who has so many eyes upon him, must act with courage; and the rather because he knows that the law, when it was made, was particularly levelled against him. Note, We must not omit duty for fear of suffering, no, nor so much as seem to come short of it. In trying times, great stress is laid upon our confessing Christ before men; (Matt. x. 32) and we must take heed, lest, under pretence of discretion, we be found guilty of cowardice in the cause of God. If we do not think that this example of Daniel obliges us to do likewise, yet I am sure it does set us an example of courage, for he exposed himself in it. By his constancy to his duty it now appears that he had never been used to admit any excuse for the omission of it; for if ever any excuse would have served to put it by, this would have served now. (1.) That it was forbidden by the king his master, and in honour of the king too; but it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that, We are to obey God rather than men. (2.) That it would be the loss of his life: but it is an undoubted maxim, in answer to that, They who throw away their souls, (as those certainly do, that live without prayer,) to save their lives, make but a bad bargain for themselves; and though herein they make them-

selfs, like the king of Tyre, wiser than Daniel, at their end they will be fools.

11. Then these men assembled, and found Daniel praying and making supplication before his God. 12. They came near, and spake before the king concerning the king's decree; Hast thou not signed a decree, that every man that shall ask a petition of any god or man within thirty days, save thee, O king, shall be cast into the den of lions? The king answered and said, The thing is true, according to the law of the Medes and Persians, which altereth not. 13. Then answered they, and said before the king, That Daniel, which is of the captivity of the children of Judah, regardeth not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed, but maketh his petition three times a-day. 14. Then the king, when he heard these words, was sore displeased with himself, and set his heart on Daniel to deliver him; and he laboured till the going down of the sun to deliver him. 15. Then these men assembled unto the king, and said unto the king, Know, O king, that the law of the Medes and Persians is, That no decree nor statute which the king establisheth may be changed. 16. Then the king commanded, and they brought Daniel, and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spake and said unto Daniel, Thy God, whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee. 17. And a stone was brought, and laid upon the mouth of the den; and the king sealed it with his own signet, and with the signet of his lords, that the purpose might not be changed concerning Daniel.

Here is, 1. Proof made of Daniel's praying to his God, notwithstanding the late edict to the contrary; (v. 11.) These men assembled; they came tumultuously together, the whole number that were used, v. 6. borrowed from Ps. ii. 1. Why do the heathen rage? They came together, to visit Daniel, perhaps under pretence of business, at that time which they knew to be his usual hour of devotion; and if they had not found him so engaged, they would have upbraided him with his faint-heartedness, and distrust of his God; but (which they rather feared to suspect) they found him praying and making supplication before his God. For his love they are his adversaries; but like his father David, he gives himself unto prayer, Ps. cix. 4.

2. Complaint made of it to the king. When they had found occasion against Daniel concerning the law of his God, they lost no time, but applied themselves to the king, (v. 12.) and having appealed to him, who was the law, he was the public state, which can call nothing his own but what he has by the king's favour, and yet he regards not thee, O king, nor the decree that thou hast signed. Note, It is no new thing for that which is done faithfully, in conscience toward God, to be misrepresented as done obstinately and in contempt of the civil powers, that is, for the best saints to be reproached as the worst men. Daniel regarded God, and therefore prayed, and then he had cause to complain to the king and his government, yet this is construed as not regarding the king. That excellent spirit which Daniel was endued with, and that established reputation which he had gained, could not protect him from these poisonous darts. They do not say, He makes his petition to his God, lest Darius should take notice of that to his praise, but only He makes his petition, which is the thing the law forbids. The great concern the king was in hereupon.

He now perceived that, whatever they pretended, it was not to honour him, but in spite to Daniel, that they had proposed that law, and now he is sore displeased with himself, for gratifying them in it, v. 14. Note, When men indulge a proud vainglorious humour, and please themselves with that which feeds it, they know not, but their persecutors for them are the greatest consiles; their flatterers may prove their tormentors, and are but spreading a net for their feet. Now the king sets his heart to deliver Daniel; both by argument and by authority he labours till the going down of the sun to deliver him, to persuade his accusers not to insist upon his prosecution. Note, We often do that, through inconsideration, which after a while we repent of, and do again; which is a good reason why we should ponder the faith of our feet, for then all our ways will be established.

4. The violence with which the prosecutors demanded judgment, v. 15. We are not told what Daniel said; the king himself is his advocate, he needs not plead his own case, but silently commits himself and it to him that judges righteously; but the prosecutors insist upon it, that the law must have its course; it is a fundamental maxim in the constitution of the government of the Medes and Persians, which is now become a universal statute, that there could be no occasion to alter it, or dispense with it, as if any human foresight could, in framing a law, guard against all inconveniences. But, if this maxim be duly applied to Daniel's case, (as I am apt to think it is, but perverted,) it honours the king's legislative power, it hampers his executive power, and incapacitates him to show that mercy which upholds the throne, and to pass laws for indemnities, which are the glories of a reign. Those who allow not the sovereign's power to dispense with a disabling statute, yet never question his power to pardon an offence against a penal statute. But Darius is denied this power. See what need we have to pray for princes, that God would give them wisdom, for they are often embroiled in great difficulties, even the wisest and best are.

5. The executing of the law upon Daniel. The king himself, with the utmost reluctance, and against his conscience, signs the warrant for his execution; and Daniel, that venerable, grave man, who carried such a mixture of majesty and sweetness in his person, who was so often looked upon the universal monarch, and his majesty great upon the bench, and at the council-board, and greater upon his knees, who had power with God and man, and had prevailed, is brought, purely for worshipping his God, as if he had been one of the vilest of malefactors, and thrown into the den of lions, to be devoured by them, v. 16. One cannot think of it without the utmost compassion to the guilty parties, and the utmost contempt on the executors, and justly, too, the four ungodly prosecutors. To make sure work, the stone laid upon the mouth of the den is sealed, and the king (an over-easy man) is persuaded to do it with his own signet, (v. 17.) that unhappy signet with which he had confirmed the law that Daniel fails by. But his lords cannot trust him, unless they add their signets too. Thus when Christ was buried, his adversaries sealed the stone that was rolled to the door of his sepulchre.

6. The encouragement which Darius gave to Daniel to trust in God; Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee, v. 16. Here, (1.) He justifies Daniel from guilt, owning all his crime to be serving his God continually, and continuing to do that which was good and right. (2.) He leaves it to God to deliver him from punishment, should he not prevail to do it; He will deliver thee. He is sure that his God can deliver him, for he believes him to be an almighty God, and he has reason to think he will do it, having heard of his delivering Daniel's companions in a like case from the fiery furnace, and concluding him to be always faithful to those who approve themselves faithful to him. Note, Those who serve God continually he will continually preserve, and will bear them out in his service.

18. Then the king went to his palace, and passed the night fasting; neither were instruments of music brought before him; and his sleep went from him. 19. Then the king arose very early in the morning, and went in haste unto the den of lions. 20. And when he came to the den, he cried with a lamentable voice unto Daniel; and the king spake and said unto Daniel, O Daniel, servant of the living God, is thy God, whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions? 21. Then said Daniel unto the king, O king, live for ever. 22. My God hath sent his angel, and hath shut the lions' mouths, that they have not hurt me: forasmuch as before him innocency was found in me; and also before thee, O king, have I done no hurt. 23. Then was the king exceeding glad for him, and commanded that they should take Daniel out up out of the den. So Daniel was taken up out of the den, and no manner of hurt was found upon him, because he believed in his God. 24. And the king commanded, and they brought those men which had accused Daniel, and they cast them into the den of lions, them, their children, and their wives; and the lions had the mastery of them, and brake all their bones in pieces or ever they came at the bottom of the den.

Here is, 1. The melancholy night which the king had, upon Daniel's account, v. 18. He had said indeed, that God would deliver him out of the danger, but at the same time he could not forgive himself for throwing him into the danger; and justify that God deprived him of a friend whom he had himself used so barbarously. He went to his palace, vexed at himself for what he had done, and calling himself unwise and unjust for not adhering to the law of God and nature, with a non obstante—a negative, to the law of the Medes and Persians. He ate no supper, but passed the night fasting: his heart was already full of grief and fear. He forgot not, for a moment, the things that he had sung to a heavy heart. He went to his palace, and could not get no sleep; was full of toasting and fretting till the dawning of the day. Note, The best way to have a good night is, to keep a good conscience; then we may lay ourselves down in peace.

2. The solicitous inquiry he made concerning Daniel the next morning, v. 19, 20. He was up early, very early; for how could he lie in bed when he could not sleep for dreaming of Daniel, nor lie awake quietly for thinking of him? And he was no sooner up than he went in haste to the den of lions, for he could not satisfy himself to send a servant, (that would not sufficiently testify his affection to Daniel,) nor had he patience to stay so long as till a servant would return. When he comes to the den, not without some hopes that God had graciously undone what he had wickedly done, he cries with a lamentable voice, as one full of concern and trouble, O Daniel, art thou alive? He longer to know, yet trembles to ask the question, fearing to be answered with the roaring of the lions after more prey; O Daniel, servant of the living God, has thy God whom thou servest continually, able to deliver thee from the lions? If he might not understand himself when he called him the living God, he could not doubt of his ability to keep Daniel alive, for he that has life in himself, quickens whom he will; but has he thought fit in this case to exer-
his power? What he doubted of, we are sure of,
that the servants of the living God have a Master who is well able to protect them, and bear them out in his service.
3. The joyful news he meets with—that Daniel is alive, is safe and well, and unhurt in the lions' den,
v. 21, 22. Daniel knew the king's voice, though it was now a lamentable voice, and spake to him with all the deference and respect that were due to a precious jewel in his kingdom. He does not reprove him for his unkindness to him, and his cai-ness in yielding to the malice of his prosecutors;
but, to show that he has heartily forgiven him, he meets him with his good wishes. Note, We should not upbraid those with the coldness they have done us, who, we know, did them with reluctance, and are very ready to upbraid themselves with them.
The king decreed that Daniel should have the king's office, and that the crier should be sent to him: Before Daniel gives the king the very plausible answer, it is triumphant.
(1.) God has preserved his life by a miracle.
Darius had called him Daniel's God; (thy God whom thou servest;) to which Daniel does as it were say back, Yes, he is my God, whom I own, and who owns me, for he has sent his angel; the same bright and glorious Being that was seen in the form of the son of God with the three children in the heated furnace, live for ever, and ever. Daniel,
who has a visible appearance enlightened the dark den,
and kept Daniel company all night, and had shut
the lions' mouths, that they had not in the least hurt him. The angel's presence made even the lions' den his strong hold, his palace, his paradise;
he never had had a better night in his life. See the power of God over the fiercest creatures, and believe his power to restrain the roaring lion that goes about, inhumanly seeking to devour, from bursting those that are his. See the care God takes of his faithful worshippers, especially when he calls them out to suffer for him. If he keep their souls from sin, comfort their souls with his peace, and receive their souls to himself, he does in effect shut the lions' mouths, that they cannot hurt them. See how ready the angels are to minister for the good of God's people, for they own themselves their felnovomates.
(2.) God has therein pleased his cause. He was represented to the king as disaffectioned to him and his government; we do not find that he said any thing
in his own vindication, but left it to God to clear up his integrity as the light; and he did it effectually
by working a miracle for his preservation. Daniel,
in what he had done, had not offended either God or the king; whom I prayed to, innocency was found in me.
He pretends not to a meritorious excellence; but the testimony of his conscience concerning his sincerity is his comfort; As also that before thee, O king, I have done no hurt,
nor designed thee any affront.
4. The discharge of Daniel from his confinement.
His prosecutors cannot but own that the law is satis, fied, though they are not, or, he is absolved, it is by far more superior to that of the Medes and Persians; and therefore no cause can be shown why
Daniel should not be fetched out of the den; (v. 23.)
The king was exceeding glad to find him alive, and gave orders immediately that they should take him out of the den, as Jeremiah out of the dungeon; and which they searched, no manner of hurt was found among him, he was not wounded nor bruised, nor was kept perfectly well, because he believed in his God. Note, Those who boldly and cheerfully trust in God to protect them in the way of their duty, shall never be made ashamed of their confidence in him, but shall always find him a present Help.
5. The committing of his prosecutors to the same prison, or place of execution rather, v. 24. Daniel is animated by this miracle wrought for Daniel, and now begins to take courage, and act like himself.
Those that would not suffer him to show mercy to Daniel, shall, now that God has done it for him, be made to feel his resentments; and he will do justice for God who had showed mercy for him. Daniel's accusers, now that his innocence is cleared, and Heaven itself is become his Compurgator, have the same punishment inflicted upon them which they designed against him, according to the law of retaliation. Such were they that should have been crushed:
they should have been made to feel the sharpness of the sword, in the downfall of the accuser. Such were they to be reckoned now that Daniel was proved innocent; for though the fact was true, yet it was not a fault. They were cast into the den of lions, which perhaps was a punishment newly invented by themselves; however, it was what they maliciously designed for Daniel. Nee lex est justitior nulla, quam neces artifices arte perire sole:—No law can be more just than that which adjudg'd the divers of barbarity to perish by it, Ps. xvi. 13, 16.
—ix. 15, 16. And now Solomon's observation is verified, (Prov. xi.) The righteous is delivered out of trouble, and the wicked cometh in his stead.
In this execution we may observe, (1.) The king's severity in ordering their wives and children to be thrown to the lions with them. How righteous are God's statutes above those of the nations! For God must appear to be just against false accusers. Deut.
xxiv. 16. Yet it was done in extraordinary cases, as that of Achan, and Saul, and Haman. (2.) The lions' fierceness. They had the mastery of them immediately, and tore them to pieces before they came to the bottom of the den.
This verified and magnified the miracle of their sparing Daniel; for hereby it appeared that it was not because they had not appetite, but because they had not leave. Mastiffs that are kept muzzled, are the more fierce when the muzzle is taken off;
so were these lions. And the Lord is known by these judgments which he executes.
25. Then king Darius wrote unto all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth;
Peace be multiplied unto you. 26. I make a decree, That in every domion of my kingdom men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel; for he is the living God, and steadfast for ever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end. 27. He delivereth and rescueth, and he worketh signs and wonders in heaven and in earth, who hath delivered Daniel from the power of the lions. 28. So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius,
and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian.
Darius here studieth to make some amends for the dishonour he had done both to God and Daniel,
in casting Daniel into the lion's den, by doing ho-
our to both.
1. He gives honour to God by a decree published to all nations, by which they are required to fear
before him. And this is a decree which is indeed fit to be made inalterable, according to the laws of the Medes and Persians; for God, in the gospel, preached to them that dwell on the earth,
Rev. xiv. 7. Fear God, and give glory to him.
Observe, (1.) To whom he sends this decree: to all people, nations, and languages, that dwell in all the earth, v. 25. These are great words, and it is ture that all the inhabitants of the earth are obliged to that which is here decreed; but here they mean
no more than every dominion of his kingdom,
which, though it contained many nations, contained
not all nations; but so it is, those that have much, are ready to think they have all. (2.) What the matter of the decrees? That men tremble and fear before the God of Daniel. This goes farther than Nebuchadnezzar’s decree upon the like occasion,
for that only restrained people from speaking amiss
of this God; but this requires them to fear before him, to keep up and express awful, reverent thoughts of him. And well might this decree be prefaced, I think, with this Peace be made with you: for the only foundation of true and abundant peace is laid in the fear of God; for that is true wisdom. If we live in the fear of God, and walk
according to that rule, peace shall be upon us.
Peace shall be multiplied to us. But though this decree goes far, it does not go far enough; had he done right, and come up to his present convictions,
he should have commanded all men not only to tremble and fear before this God, but to love him and trust in him, to forsake the service of their idols, and to worship him only, and call upon him as Daniel did. But idolatry had been so long and so deeply rooted, that it was not to be extirpated by the edicts of princes, not by any power less than that, which went along with the glorious gospel of Christ. (3.) And this came under the convictions moving him to make this decree. They are sufficient to have justified a decree for the total suppression of idolatry, much more will they serve to support this. There is good reason why all men should fear before this God: for, [1.] His being is transcendent. He is the living God; lives as a God, whereas the gods we worship are dead things, have not so much as an animal life. [2.] His go-

government is incontestable; he has a kingdom, and a dominion; he not only lives, but reigns as an absolute Sovereign. [3.] Both his being and his go-government are unchangeable. He is himself steadfast for ever, and with him is no shadow of turning.

And his kingdom too is that which shall not be destroyed by any external force, nor has his dominion any thing in itself that threatens a decar or tends towards it, and therefore it shall be even to the end.
[4.] He has an ability sufficient to support such an authority, v. 27. He delivers his faithful servants from trouble, and rescues them out of trouble; he works signs and wonders, quite above the utmost power of nature to effect, both in heaven and on dearth, by which it appears that he is sovereign both in heaven and earth. He has given a dream of all this, in delivering his servant Daniel, from the power of the lions. This miracle, and that of the delivering of the three children, were wrought in the eye of the world, were seen, published, and attested by two of the greatest monarchs that ever were, and were illustrious confirmations of the first principles of religion, abstracted from the narrow scheme of Judaism, effectual confutations of all the counsels of Hercules, and proper preparations for pure catholic Christianity.

2. He puts honour upon Daniel; (v. 28.) So this Daniel prospered. See how God brought to him good out of evil. This bold stroke which his enemies made at his life, was a happy occasion of taking them off, and their children too, who otherwise would still have stood in the way of his preferment, and have been upon all occasions vexations to him; and now he prospered more than ever, was more in favour with his prince and in reputation
with the people; which gave him a great opportunity of doing good to his brethren. Thus out of the eater (and that was a lion too) came forth meat,
and out of the strong sweetness.

CHAP. VII.

The six former chapters of this book were historical; we now enter with fear and trembling upon the six latter,
which are prophetical, wherein are many things dark,
and hard to be understood, which we dare not positively determine the sense of, and yet many things plain and profitable, which I trust God will enable us to make a good use of. In this chapter, we have, 1. Daniel’s vision of the four beasts, v. 1–13. II. His vision of God’s throne of government and judgment, v. 9. 14. III. The interpretation of these visions, given him by an angel that stood by, v. 15. 28. Neither of them look as far into the end of time, or whether they were to have a speedy accomplishment, is hard to say, nor are the most judicious interpreters agreed concerning it.

1. In the first year of Belshazzar king of Babylon, Daniel had a dream, and visions of his head upon his bed: then he wrote the dream, and told the sum of the matters. 2. Daniel spake and said, I saw in my vision by night, and, behold, the four winds of the heaven strove upon the great sea.
3. And four great beasts came up from the sea, diverse one from another. 4. The first was like a lion, and had eagles’ wings: I beheld till the wings thereof were plucked,
and it was lifted up from the earth, and made stand upon the feet as a man, and a man’s heart was given to it. 5. And, behold, another beast, a second, like to a bear,
and it raised itself upon one side, and it had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth of it: and they said thus unto it, Arise, devour much flesh. 6. After this I beheld, and lo, another, like a leopard, which had upon the back of it four wings of a fowl: the beast had also four heads; and dominion was given to it. 7. After this I saw in the night visions, and, behold, a fourth beast, dreadful and terrible, and strong exceedingly; and it had great iron teeth: it devoured and brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with the feet of it: and it was diverse from all the beasts that were before it; and it had ten horns. 8. I considered the horns, and, behold, there came up among them another little horn, before whom there were three of the first horns plucked up by the roots: and, behold, in this horn were eyes like the eyes of man, and a mouth speaking great things.

The date of this chapter places it before ch. v.
which was in the last year of Belshazzar, and ch. 6.
which was in the first of Darius; for Daniel had those visions in the first year of Belshazzar, when the captivity of the Jews in Babylon was drawing ear a period. Belshazzar’s name here is, in the original, spelled differently from what is used to be;
before it was Bel-she-azar—Bel is he that treasures up riches. But this is Bel-eshe-azar—Bel is on fire by the enemy. Bel was the god of the Chaldeans;
he had prospered, but is now to be consumed.
We have, in these verses, Daniel’s vision of the four monarchies that were oppressive to the Jews.
Observe,

The circumstances of this vision. Daniel had interpreted Nebuchadnezzar’s dream, and now he is himself honoured with like divine discoveries; (v.
1.) He had visions of his head upon his bed, when he was asleep: so God sometimes revealed himself and his mind to the children of men, when deep sleep fell upon them, Job xxxiii. 15. For when we are most retired from the world, and taken off from the things of sense, we are most fit for communion with God. But when he was awake, he wrote the dream for his own use, lest he should forget it as a dream which passes away; and he told the sum of the matters to his brethren the Jews for their use, and gave it in writing; that it might be communicated to those at a distance, and preserved for their children after them, who should see these things accomplished. The Jews, misunderstanding some of the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, flattered themselves with hopes, that, after their return to their own land, they should enjoy a complete and uninterrupted tranquillity; but that they might not so deceive themselves, and their calamities be made doubly grievous by the disappointment, God by this prophet lets them know that they shall have tribulation; these promises of their prosperity were to be accomplished in the spiritual blessings of the kingdom of grace; as Christ has told his disciples they must expect persecution, and the promises they depend upon will be accomplished in the eternal blessings of the kingdom of glory. Daniel both wrote these things, and spake them, to intimate that the church should be taught both by the scriptures, and by ministers' preaching, both by the written word, and by word of mouth; and ministers in their preaching are to tell the sum of the matters thus set forth.

II. The vision itself, which foretells the revolutions of government in those nations, which the church of the Jews, for the following ages, was to be under the influence of.

1. He observed the four winds to strive upon the great sea, v. 2. They strive which should blow strongest, and at length blow alone. This represents the contests among princes for empire, and the shakings of the nations by these contests, to which those mighty monarchies, which he was now to have a prospect of, owed their rise. One wind from any point of the compass, if it blow hard, will cause a great commotion in the sea; but what a tumult must needs be: raised when the four winds strive for mastery? Is it which the kings of the earth that are in the sea, and the beasts which are in the sea, are a noisy and violent as the battle of the winds; but how is the poor sea tossed and torn, how terribly are its concussions, how violent its convulsions, while the winds are at strife which shall have the sole power of troubling it? Note, This world is like a stormy, tempestuous sea; thanks to the proud, ambitious winds that vex it.

2. He saw four great beasts come up from the sea, from the troubled waters, in which aspiring minds love to fish. The monarchs and monarchies are represented by beasts, because too often it is by brutish rage and tyranny that they are raised and supported. These beasts were diverse one from another, (v. 3.) of different shape, to denote the different genius and complexness of the nations in whose hands they were lodged.

(1.) The first beast was like a lion, v. 4. This was the Chaldean monarchy, that was fierce and strong, and made the kings absolute. This lion had eagles' wings, with which to fly upon the prey. It denotes the wonderful speed that Nebuchadnezzar made in his conquest of kingdoms. But he soon saw the wings plucked, a full stop put to the career of this strongest conqueror; but the winds had been tributaries to them, revolted from them, and make head against them; so that this monstrous animal, this winged lion, is made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart is given to it. It Las lost the heart of a lion, which it had been famous for, (one of our English kings was called Cæsar de Lion—Lion-heart,) has lost its courage, and is become feeble and faint, dreading every thing, and daring nothing; they are put in fear, and made to bow themselves to be but men. Sometimes the value of a nation strangely sunk, and which cowards and effeminate, so that what was the head of the nations, in an age or two becomes the tail.

(2.) The second beast was like a bear, v. 5. This was the Persian monarchy, less strong and generous than the former, but no less ravenous. This bear raised up itself on one side against the lion, and soon mastered it. It raised up one devouring motion; so something of the Persia and Media, which in Nebuchadnezzar's image were the two arms in one beast, now set up a joint government. This bear had three ribs in the mouth of it between the teeth, the remains of those nations it had devoured, which were the marks of its voraciousness; and yet an indication that though it had devoured much, it could not devour all; some ribs still stuck in the tooth of it, which it could not conquer. Whereupon it was said to it, Arise, devour much flesh; let alone the bones, the ribs, that cannot be conquered, and set upon that which will be an easier prey. The princes will stir up both the kings and the people to push on their conquests, and let nothing stand before them. Note, Conquests, unjustly made, are but like those of the beasts of prey, and in this much they resemble the lions; but they do not as they do, have their own kind, as wicked and unreasonable men do.

(3.) The third beast was like a leopard; v. 6. This was the Grecian monarchy founded by Alexander the Great, active, crafty, and cruel, like a leopard; he had four wings of a fowl; the lion seems to have had but two wings; but the leopard has four, for though Nebuchadnezzar made great despatch in his conquests, Alexander made much greater. In six years' time he gained the whole empire of Persia, a great part besides of Asia, made himself master of Syria, Egypt, India, and other nations; this beast had four heads; upon Alexander's death, his conquests were divided among his four chief captains; Seleucus Nicarnor had Asia the Great; Perdiccas, and after him Antigonus, had Asia the Less; Cassander had Macedonia, and had Syria, Cappadocia, and Phœnicia; Demetrius had Egypt. Daniel was given this beast; it was given of God, from whom alone projection comes.

(4.) The fourth beast was more fierce, and formidable, and mischievous, than any of them, unlike any of the other, nor is there any among the beasts of prey to which it might be compared, v. 7. The learned are not agreed concerning this anonymous beast; some make it to be the Roman empire, which, when it was in its glory, comprehended ten kingdoms, Italy, France, Spain, Germany, Britain, Sarmatia, Panonía, Asia, Greece, and Egypt; and then the little horn which rose by the fall of three of the other horns, (v. 8.) they make to be the Turkish empire, which rose in the room of Asia, Greece, and Egypt. Others make this fourth beast to be the kingdom of the Jews; the Seldemide, which was very cruel and oppressive to the people of the Jews, as we find in Josephus and the history of the Maccabees. And herein that empire was diverse from those which went before, that none of the preceding powers compelled the Jews to renounce their religion, but the kings of Syria did, and used them barbarously. Their armies and commanders were like the great iron teeth. The winds were their tributaries to revolte, from them, and made head against them; so that this monstrous animal, this winged lion, is made to stand upon the feet as a man, and a man's heart is given to it. It has lost the heart of a lion, which it had been famous for, (one of our English kings was called Cæsar de Lion—Lion-heart,) has lost its courage, and is become feeble and faint, dreading every thing, and daring nothing; they are put in fear, and made to bow themselves to be but men. Sometimes the value of a nation strangely sunk, and which cowards and effeminate, so that what was the head of the nations, in an age or two becomes the tail.

The ten horns are then supposed to be ten kings that reigned successively in Syria; and then the little horn is Antiochus Epiphanes, the last of the ten, who by one means or other undermined three of the kings and got the government. He was a man of great sagacity, and therefore is said to have eyes like the eyes of a man; and was very bold and daring, had a mouth speaking great things. We shall meet with him again in these prophecies.

9. I beheld till the thrones were cast down; and the Ancient of days did sit, whose garment was white as snow; and the hair of his head like the pure wool: his throne was like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire. 10. A fiery stream issued and came forth from before him: thousand thousands ministered unto him, and ten thousand times ten thousand stood before him: the judgment was set, and the books were opened. 11. I beheld then, because of the voice of the great words which the horn spake; I beheld, even till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. 12. As concerning the rest of the beasts, they had their dominion taken away: yet their lives were prolonged for a season and time. 13. I saw in the night visions, and, behold, one like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the Ancient of days, and they brought him near before him. 14. And there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all people, nations, and languages, should serve him: his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed.

Whether we understand the fourth beast to signify the Syrian empire, or the Roman, or the former as the figure of the latter, it is plain that these verses are intended for the comfort and support of the people of God, in reference to the persecutions they were to suffer under God's enemies, both from the one and from the other, and from all their proud enemies, in every age; for it is written for their learning on whom the ends of the world are come, that they also, through patience and comfort of this scripture, might have hope.

Three things are here discovered, that are very encouraging.

1. That there is a judgment to come, and God is the Judge. Now men have their day, and every pretender thinks he should have his day, and struggles for it. But he that sits in heaven, laughs at them, for he sees that his day is coming, Ps. xxxvii. 13. I beheld, (v. 9.) till the thrones were cast down, not only the thrones of these beasts, but all rule, authority, and power, that are set up in opposition to the kingdom of God among men; (1 Cor. xv. 24.) such are the thrones of the kingdoms of the world, in comparison with God's kingdom; they that see them set up, need but wait awhile, and they will see them cast down. I beheld till thrones were set up, (so it may as well be read.) Christ's throne, and the throne of his Father. One of the rabbins confesses that these thrones are set up, one for God, another for the Son of David. It is the judgment that is here set, v. 10. Now this is intended, 1. To speak God's wise and righteous government of the world by his providence; and an unspeakable satisfaction it gives to all good men, in the midst of the convulsions and revolutions of states and kingdoms, that the Lord has prepared his throne in the heavens, and his kingdom rules over all; (Ps. ciii. 19.) that very God that judges the earth, Ps. lxxvii. 11.

2. Perhaps it points at the destruction brought by the providence of God upon the empire of Syria, or that of Rome, for their tyrannizing over the people of God. But, 3. It seems principally designed to describe the last judgment, for though it comes not immediately upon the fourth beast, nor till he is slain, but, though it be yet to come, perhaps many ages to come, yet it was intended that in every age the people of God should encourage themselves, under their troubles, with the belief and prospect of it. Enoch, the seventh from Adam, prophesied of it, Jude 14. Does the mouth of the enemy speak about this judgment? 8. He is the Judge, and he shall judge the world, and the mouth of the Lord has spoken. Many of the New Testament predictions of the judgment to come have a plain allusion to this vision here; especially St. John's vision of it, Rev. xxi. 12. (1.) The Judge is the Ancient of days himself, God the Father, the glory of whose presence is here described. He is called the Ancient of days, because he is God, from everlasting to everlasting. Among men, we reckon that with the ancient is wisdom, and days shall speak; shall not all flesh then be silent before him who is the Ancient of days? The glory of the Judge is here set forth by his garment, which was white as snow, denoting his splendour and purity in all the administrations of his justice; and the brightness of his head white, as a pure and luminous light, and he appears venerable. (2.) The throne is very formidable. It is like the fiery flame, dreadful to the wicked that shall be summoned before it. And the throne being movable upon wheels, or, at least, the chariot in which he rode his circuit, the wheels thereof are as burning fire, to devour the adversaries; for our God is a consuming fire, and with him are everlasting burnings, Isa. xxxiv. 14. This is enlarged upon, v. 10. As to all his faithful friends there proceeds out of the throne of God and the Lamb a pure river of water of life, (Rev. xvi. 1.) so to all his imposable enemies there issues and comes forth from his throne a fiery stream, a stream of brimstone, (Isa. xxxv. 5.) a fire that shall devour before him. This is a just Witness, and his word a word upon the wheels. (3.) The attendants are numerous and very splendid. The Shechinah is always attended with angels, it is so here; v. 10. Thousand thousands minister to him; and ten thousand thousand stand before him. It is his glory that he has such attendants, but much more his glory that he neither needs them nor can be benefited by them. See how numerous the heavenly hosts are; there are thousands of angels; and how obsequious they were, they stand before God, ready to go on his errands, and to take the first intimation of his will and pleasure. They will particularly be employed as ministers of his justice in the last judgment; when the day of man shall come, and all the holy angels with him. Enoch prophesied that the Lord should come with his holy myriads. (4.) The process is fair and unexceptionable; The judgment is set, publicly, and openly, that all may have recourse to it; and the books are opened; as in courts of judgment among men, the proceedings are in writing and upon record, which is laid down when the cause comes to a hearing; the examination of witnesses is produced, and affidavits are read, to clear the matter of fact, the statute and common law books consulted to find out what is the law, so, in the judgment of the great day, the equity of the sentence will be as incontestably evident as if there were books opened to justify it.
II. That the proud and cruel enemies of the church of God will certainly be reckoned with, and brought down in due time, v. 11, 12. This is here represented to us,

1. In the destroying of the fourth beast, God's quarrel with this is the cause of the silence of the great Nebuchadnezzar, in which the harp spoke, bidding defiance to Heaven, and triumphing over all that is sacred; this provokes God more than anything, for the enemy to behave himself proudly, Deut. xxxvii. 27. Therefore Pharaoh must be humbled, because he has said, Who is the Lord? and has said, I will pursue, I will overtake. Enoch foretold that therefore the Lord would come to judge the world, that he may show provinces all that are ungodly, of their hard speeches, Jude 15.

Note. Great words are but idle words, for which men must give account in the great day. And see what comes of this beast that talks so big; he is slain and his body destroyed, and given to the burning flame. The Syrian empire, after Antiochus, was destroyed; he himself died of a miserable disease, his family was rooted out, the kings of Persia, the Parthians, and the Romans, and at length made a province of the Roman empire by Pompey. And the Roman empire itself, (if we take that for the fourth beast,) after it began to persecute Christianity, declined and wasted away, and the body of it was destroyed. So shall all thine enemies perish, O Lord, and be slain before thee.

2. In the diminishing and weakening of the other three beasts, v. 12.) They had their dominion taken away from them, while their wickednesses they had done to the church and people of God; but a prolonging in life was given them, for a time and a season, a set time, the bounds of which they could not pass. The power of the foregoing kingdoms was quite broken, but the people of them still remained in a mean, weak, and low condition; we may allude to this, in describing the remaining sin in the hearts of good people; they have corruptions in them, the lives of which are prolonged, so that they are not perfectly free from sin, but the dominion of them is taken away, so that sin does not reign in their mortal bodies. And thus God deals with his church's enemies; sometimes he breaks the teeth of them, (Ps. iii. 7,) when he does not break the neck of them; crushes the persecutors of the people, but they may have space to repent. And it is fit that God, in doing his own work, should take his own time and way.

III. That the kingdom of the Messiah shall be set up, and kept up, in the world, in despite of all the opposition of the powers of darkness. Let the heathen rage and fret as long as they please, God will set his King upon his holy hill of Zion. Daniel saw him standing, and conversed and left friends with the prospect of it. This is the same with Nebuchadnezzar's foresight of the stone cut out of the mountain without hands, which brake in pieces the image, but in this vision there is much more of pure gospel than in that.

1. The Messiah is here called the Son of man; one like unto the Son of man; for he was made in the likeness of sinful flesh, was formed in fashion as a man. I saw one like unto the Son of man, one exactly agreeing with the idea formed in the divine counsels of him that in the fulness of time was to be the Mediator between God and man. He is like unto the Son of man, but is indeed the Son of God. Our Saviour seems plainly to refer to this vision, when he says, (John v. 27,) that the Father has therefore given him his power, execute every thought of his heart, he is the Son of man, and because he is the person whom Daniel saw in vision, to whom a kingdom and dominion were to be given. 2. He is said to come with the clouds of heaven. Some refer this to his incarnation; he descended in the clouds of heaven, came into the world unseen, as the glory of the Lord took possession of the temple in a cloud. The empires of the world were beasts that rose out of the sea; but Christ's kingdom is from above, he is the Lord from heaven. He comes with the cloud, as he came to his ascension; when he returned to the Father, the eye of his disciples followed him, till a cloud received him out of their sight, Acts i. 9. He made that cloud his chariot, wherein he rode triumphantly to the upper world. He comes swiftly, irresistibly, and comes in state, for he comes with the clouds of heaven.

3. He is here represented as having a mighty interest in Heaven. When the cloud received him out of the sight of his disciples, it is worth while to inquire (as the sons of the prophets concerning Elijah in a like case) whither it carried him, whether it lodged him; and here we are told, abundantly to our satisfaction, that he came to the Ancient of days; for he ascended to his Father and our Father, to his God and our God; (John xx. 17.) from him he came forth, and came back to him, and he received him with him, and to sit down at his right hand. It was with a great deal of pleasure that he said, Now I go to him that sent me. But was he welcome? Yes, no doubt he was, for they brought him near before him; he was introduced into his Father's presence, with the attendance and adorations of all the angels of God, Heb. i. 6. God caused him to draw near and approach to him, as an Advocate and Counselor for us, (Jer. xxx. 21.) that we through him might be made nigh. By this solemn near approach, which he made to the Ancient of days, it appears that the Father accepted the sacrifice he offered, and the satisfaction he made, and was entirely well pleased with all he had done. He was brought near, as our High Priest, who for us enters within the veil, and as our Forerunner.

4. He is here represented as having a mighty influence upon this earth, v. 14. When he went to be glorified with his Father, he had a power given him over all flesh; (John xxii. 2, 3,) with the prospect of this, Daniel and his friends are here comforted, that not only the dominion of the church's enemies shall be taken away, (v. 12.) but the church's Head and best Friend shall have the dominion of his enemies given him to him every tongue shall confess, every tongue confess, Phil. ii. 9, 10. To him are given glory and a kingdom, and they are given by him who has an unquestionable right to give them, which, some think, with an eye to these words, our Saviour teaches us to acknowledge in the close of the Lord's prayer, For thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory. It is here foretold that the kingdom of the exalted Redeemer shall be, (1.) A universal kingdom, the only universal monarchy, whatever others have pretended to, or aimed at; All people, nations, and languages shall fear him, and be under his jurisdiction, either as his willing subjects, or as his conquered captives; to be either ruled, or overruled by him. One way or other, the kingdoms of the world shall all become his kingdoms. (2.) An everlasting kingdom; His dominion shall not pass away to any returns, to be glorified to any invader, and his kingdom is that which shall not be destroyed. Even the gates of hell, or the infernal powers and policies, shall not prevail against it. The church shall continue militant, to the end of time, and triumphant to the endless ages of eternity.

15. I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body, and the visions of my head troubled me. 16. I came near unto one of them that stood by, and asked him...
the truth of all this. So he told me, and made me know the interpretation of the things. 17. These great beasts, which are four, are four kings, which shall arise out of the earth. 18. But the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever, even for ever and ever. 19. Then I would know the truth of the fourth beast, which was diverse from all the others, exceeding dreadful, whose teeth were of iron, and his nails of brass; which devoured, brake in pieces, and stamped the residue with his feet; 20. And of the ten horns that were in his head, and of the other which came up, and before whom three fell; even of that horn that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, whose look was more stout than his fellows. 21. I beheld, and the same horn made war with the saints, and prevailed against them; 22. Until the Ancient of days came, and judgment was given to the saints of the Most High; and the time came that the saints possessed the kingdom. 23. Thus he said, The fourth beast shall be the fourth kingdom upon earth, which shall be diverse from all kingdoms, and shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down, and break it in pieces. 24. And the ten horns out of this kingdom are ten kings that shall arise: and another shall rise after them; and he shall be diverse from the first, and he shall subdue three kings, 25. And he shall speak great words against the Most High, and shall wear out the saints of the Most High, and think to change times and laws: and they shall be given into his hand, until a time and times and the dividing of time. 26. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his dominion, to consume and to destroy it unto the end. 27. And the kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heaven, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High, whose kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and all dominions shall serve and obey him. 28. Hitherto is the end of the matter. As for me Daniel, my cogitations much troubled me, and my countenance changed in me: but I kept the matter in my heart.

1. The deep impressions which these visions made upon the prophet. God in them put honour upon him, and gave him satisfaction, yet not without a great delay of pain and perplexity: (v. 15.) I Daniel was grieved in my spirit in the midst of my body. The word here used for the body properly signifies a sheath or scabbard, for the body is no more to the soul that is the weapon, it is that which we principally to take care of. The visions of my head troubled me, and again, (v. 28.) my cogitations much troubled me. The manner in which these things were discovered to him, quite overwhemled him, and though he spake in the visions, the spirits failed him, and the trance he was in tired him, and made him faint. The things themselves that were discovered, amazed and astonished him, and put him into a confusion, till by degrees he recollected and conquered himself, and set the comforts of the vision over against the terrors of it. 11. His earnest desire to understand the meaning of them; and the care he took to find out and explain them, stood by, to one of the angels that appeared attending the Son of man in his glory, and asked him the truth, the true intent and meaning of all this. Note, It is a very desirable thing to take the right and full sense of what we see and hear from God; and those that would know, must ask by faithful and fervent prayer, and by accomplishing a diligent search. 11. The key that was given him; that is, into the understanding of this vision. The angel told him, and told him so plainly, that he made him know the interpretation of the things; and so made him somewhat more easy.

1. The great beasts are great kings and their kingdoms, great monarchies and their monarchies, which shall arise out of the earth, as those beasts did out of the water, v. 17. That is, But these four kings are four kings, and shall be exchanged by the kingdom of the saints; they shall subdue the earth, and their foundation is in the dust; they are of the earth, earthly, and they are written in the dust, and to the dust they shall return. 2. Daniel pretty well understands the three first beasts, but concerning the fourth he desires to be better informed, because it differed so much from the rest, and was exceeding dreadful, and not only so, but very mischievous, for it devoured and broke in pieces, v. 19. Perhaps this was it that Daniel into such a fright, and this part of the visions of his head troubled him more than any of the rest. But especially he desired to know what the little horn was, that had eyes, and a mouth that spake very great things, and whose countenance was more fearless and formidable than that of any of his fellows, v. 21. While no more is intimated than that the children of men make war with one another, and prevail against one another, the prophet does not show himself so much concerned: (Let the shepherd strive with the shepherd of the earth, and be dashed in pieces one against another) but when they make war with the saints, when the precious sons of Zion, comparable to fine gold, are broken as earthen pitchers, it is time to ask, "What is the meaning of this? Will the Lord cast off his people? Will he suffer their enemies to trample upon them, and triumph over them? What is this same horn that shall prevail so far against the saints?" 22. To this Daniel interpreter answers, (v. 23—25.) That this fourth beast is a fourth kingdom, that shall devour the whole earth, or, as it may be read, the whole land. That the ten horns are ten kings, and the little horn is another king that shall subdue three kings, and shall be very ab sive to God and his people, shall act, (1.) Very importunity toward God; he shall speak great words against the Most High, and against his holy ones, and shall cause divers to fall; (2.) Very inimically toward the people of God; he shall wear out the saints of the Most High; he will not cut them off at once, but wear them out by long oppressions, and a constant course of hardships put upon them; ruining their estates, and weakening their families. The design of Satan has been to wear out the saints of the Most High, that they may be no more, in remembrance; but the attempt is vain, for while the world stands God will. have a church in it. He shall think to change times and laws, to abolish all the ordinances and institutions of religion, and to bring every body to say and do just as he would have them. He shall trample upon laws and customs, human and divine; Divort, and mutat, quadraturavit—He builds, he changes square into round, as if he meant to alter even the ordinances of heaven themselves. And in these daring attempts he shall for a time prosper, and have success; they shall be given into his hand until time, times, and half a time, for three years and a half, that famous prophetic measure of time which we meet with in the Revelation of John (ch. xii. 7) and elsewhere; and thus he builds, he brings in his kingdom, sometimes 1260 days, which come all to one. But at the end of that time the judgment shall sit, and take away his dominion; (v. 26.) which he expands, (v. 11.) of the beast being slain, and his body destroyed. And, as Mr. Mede reads, (v. 12.) As to the rest of the beast, the ten horns, especially the little ruffling horn, (as he calls it,) they had their dominion taken away.

Now the question: Who is this enemy, whose rise, reign, and ruin are here foretold? Interpreters are not agreed; some will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Scythes, and the little horn to be Antiochus, and show the accomplishment of all this in the history of the Maccabees; so Junius, Piscator, Polium, Broughton, and many others; but others will have the fourth kingdom to be that of the Antichrist, and the little horn, the successor of the Emperors, as Calvin says: the anticleric, the papal kingdom, says Mr. Joseph Mede, that wicked one, which, as this little horn, is to be consumed by the brightness of Christ's second coming. The pope assumes a power to change times and laws, hotrearmat—{i.e. an absolute and despotic power, as he calls it; others make the little horn to be the Twelve empires: so Luther, Vatablus, and others. Now I cannot prove either side to be in the wrong; and therefore since prophecies sometimes have many fulfillments, and we ought to give scripture its full latitude, (in this as in many other controversies,) I am willing to allow that they are both in the right; and that this prophecy has primary reference to the Syrian empire, and was intended for the encouragement of the Jews who suffered under Antiochus and his successors. It is often foretold, but might foresee a glorious issue of them at last, and the final overthrow of their proud oppressors; and, which is best of all, might foresee, not long after, the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world, with the hopes of which it was usual with the former prophets to comfort the people of God in their distresses. But yet it has a further reference, and foretells the like persecuting power and rage in Rome, heaven and hell, and no less in Rome papal, against the Christian religion, that was in Antiochus against the pious Jews and their religion. And St. John, in his visions and prophecies which point primarily at Rome, has plain reference, in many particulars, to these visions here.

3. He has a joyful prospect given him of the preservation of God's kingdom among men, and its victory over all opposition at last. And it is very observable that in the midst of the predictions of the force and fury of the enemies, this is brought in abruptly, (v. 18.) and again, (v. 22.) before it comes, in the course of the vision, to be interpreted, v. 26. 27. And this also refers, (1.) To the prosperous days of the Jewish church after it had weathered the storm of Antichrist, and the power which the Maccabees obtained over their enemies. (2.) To the setting up of the kingdom of the Messiah in the world by the preaching of his gospel. For judgment Christ comes into this world, to rule by his Spirit, and to make all his saints kings and priests to their God. (3.) To the second coming of Jesus Christ, when the saints shall judge the world, shall sit down with him on his throne, and triumph in the complete downfall of the devil's kingdom. Let us see what is here foretold. [1.] The Ancient of days will come, v. 26. He will bring in his kingdom over the whole world by his Son, to whom he has committed all judgment; and, as an earnest of that, he comes for the deliverance of his oppressed people, comes for the setting up of his kingdom in the world. [2.] The judgment shall sit, v. 26. God will make it to appear that he judges in the earth, and will, both in wisdom and in equity, plead his people's righteous cause. He shall set a standard for the nations, and cause righteousness by that Man whom he has ordained. [3.] The dominion of the enemy shall be taken away, v. 26. All Christ's enemies shall be made his footstool, and shall be consumed and destroyed to the end: these words the apostle uses concerning the man of sin; (2 Thess. ii. 8.) He shall be consumed with the spirit of Christ's mouth, and destroyed with the brightness of his coming. [4.] Judgment is given to the saints of the Most High. The apostles are intrusted with the preaching of a gospel by which the world shall be judged: all the saints by their faith and obedience condemn an unbelieving, disobedient world; in Christ's Head they shall judge the world, shall judge the twelve tribes of Israel, Matt. xix. 28. See what reason we have to honour them that are the Lord; how great and how holy is the sight of the saints in the eye of the world, and how much contempt soever is poured upon them, they are the saints of the Most High; they are near and dear to God, and he owns them for his, and judgment is given to them. [5.] That which is most insisted upon, is that the saints of the Most High shall take the kingdom, and possess the kingdom for ever; v. 18. And again, (v. 22.) The same speaks that the saints shall take the kingdom, and possess it for ever. And again, (v. 27.) The kingdom and dominion, and the greatness of the kingdom under the whole heavens, shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High. Far be it from us to infer hence, that dominion is founded on grace, or that this will warrant any, under pretence of saints'ship, to usurp kingdome; no, Christ's kingdom is for ever, and for ever and for ever; but this speaks that the saints of the Most High shall possess the kingdom, and reign with Christ for ever. This is what is here foretold, and the like was prophesied of Daniel, and is mighty to comfort men in these dark days.

Daniel, in the close, when he ends that matter, tells us what impressions this vision made upon him: it overwhelmed his spirits to that degree, that his counsels were changed, and it made him look pale; but he kept the matter in his heart. Note, The heart must be the treasury and storehouse of divinest things. God's word is the life of his church. as the Virgin Mary kept the sayings of Christ, Luke ii. 31. Daniel kept the matter in his heart; with a design, not to keep it from the church, but to keep it for the church, that what he had received from the Lord, he might fully and faithfully deliver to the people. Note, It concerns God's prophets and ministers to treasure up the things of God in their minds, and to digest them well. If we would have God's word ready in our mouths when we have occasion for it, we must keep it in our hearts at all times.

CHAP. VIII.

The visions and prophecies of this chapter look only and entirely at the events that were then shortly to come to pass in the monarchicals of Persia and Greece, and seem not to have any farther reference at all, either to the things which were then affecting the soul of the Chaldaean monarchy, for that was now just at its period; and therefore this chapter is written not in Chaldee, as the six foregoing chapters were, for the benefit of the Chaldaens, but in Hebrew, as the rest of the chapters to the end of the book, for the service of the Jews, that they might know what troubles were before them, and what the issue of them would be, and might provide accordingly. In this chapter, we have, 1. The vision itself of the ram and the he-goat, and the little horn that should fight and prevail against the people of God, for a certain limited time, v. 1. 14. 11. The interpretation of this vision by an angel, who is made known, Daniel xii. 5. 6. The design of the vision was, to deliver the he-goat, which is the Persian empire, under the Grecian, and the little horn a king of the Grecian monarchy, that should set himself against the Jews and religion, which was Antiochus Epiphanes, v. 15. 22. The Jewish church, from its beginning, had been all along, more or less, blessed with prophets, men divinely inspired to explain God's mind to them in his providences, and give them some prospect of what was coming upon them: but, soon after Ezra's time, divine inspiration ceased, and there was no more any prophet till the gos- pel-day dawned. And therefore the events of that time were here foretold by Daniel, and left upon record, that even in God's neglection, he leave himself without witness, or them without a guide.

1. In the third year of the reign of king Belshazzar a vision appeared unto me, even unto me Daniel, after that which appeared unto me at the first. 2. And I saw in a vision; and it came to pass, when I saw, that I was at Shushan in the palace, which is in the province of Elam; and I saw in a vision, and I was by the river of Ulai. 3. Then I lifted up mine eyes and saw, and behold, there stood before the river a ram which had two horns, and the two horns were high; but one was higher than the other, and the higher came up last. 4. I saw the ram pushing westward, and northward, and southward; so that no beasts might stand before him, neither was there any that could deliver out of his hand; but he did according to his will, and became great. 5. And as I was considering, behold, a he-goat came from the west, on the face of the whole earth, and touched not the ground; and the goat, had a notable horn between his eyes. 6. And he came to the ram that had two horns, which I had seen standing before the river, and ran unto him in the fury of his power. 7. And I saw him come close unto the ram, and he was moved with choler against him, and smote the ram, and brake his two horns; and there was no power in the ram to stand before him, but he cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him: and there was none that could deliver the ram out of his hand. 8. Therefore the he-goat waxed very great; and when he was strong, the great horn was broken; and for it came up four notable ones, toward the four winds of heaven. 9. And out of one of them came forth a little horn which waxed exceeding great, toward the south, and toward the east, and toward the pleasant land. 10. And it waxed great, even to the host of heaven; and it cast down some of the host and of the stars to the ground, and stamped upon them. 11. Yea, he magnified himself even to the prince of the host, and by him the daily sacrifice was taken away, and the place of his sanctuary was cast down. 12. And a host was given him against the daily sacrifice by reason of transgression, and it cast down the truth to the ground; and it practised, and prospered. 13. Then I heard one saint speaking, and another saint said unto that certain saint which spake, How long shall be the vision concerning the daily sacrifice, and the transgression of desolation, to give both the sanctuary and the host to be trodden under foot? 14. And he said unto me, Unto two thousand and three hundred days; then shall the sanctuary be cleansed.

Here is, 1. The date of this vision, v. 1. It was in the third year of the reign of Belshazzar, which proved to be his last year, as many reckon; so that this chapter also should be, in order of time, before the fifth. That Daniel might not be surprised at the destruction of Babylon, now at hand, God gives him foresight of the destruction of other kingdoms hereafter, which in their day had been as potent as that of Babylon. Could we foresee the changes that shall be hereafter, when we are gone, we should the less admire, and be less affected with the changes in our own day; for that which is done, is that which shall be done, Exod. i. 9. Then it was, that a vision appeared unto me, a sure vision, to Daniel. Here he solemnly attests the truth of it; it was to him, even to him, that the vision was shown; he was the eye-witness of it. And this vision puts him in mind of a former vision, which appeared to him at the first, in the first year of this reign, which he makes mention of, because this vision was an explanation and confirmation of that, and points at many of the same events. That seems to have been a dream, a vision in his sleep; this seems to have been when he was awake. 2. The scene of this vision; the place where that was laid, was in Shushan the palace, one of the royal seats of the kings of Persia, situated on the banks of the river Ulai, which surrounded the city; it was in the province of Elam, and that part of Persia which lay next to Babylon. Daniel was then in Persia, for he was now in Babylon, a captive, in some employment under Belshazzar, and might not go to such a distant country, especially being now an enemy's country; but he was there in vision; as Ezekiel, when a captive in Babylon, was often brought, in the spirit, to the land of Israel. Note, The soul may be at liberty when the body is in captivity; for when we are bound, the Spirit of the Lord maybind us elsewhere. There were no such bounds in that country, and therefore there he was made to fancy himself to be as strongly as if he had really been there.

III. The vision itself, and the process of it.

1. He saw a ram with two horns, v. 3. This was the second monarchy, of which the kingdom of Media and Persia were the two horns. The horns were very high; but that which came up last was the higher, and got the start of the former. So the last shall be first, and the first last. The kingdom of Persia, which rose last, in Cyrus, became more eminent than that of the Medes.

2. He saw this ram pushing all about him with his horns, (v. 4.) westward, toward Babylon, Syria, Greece, and the lesser Asia; northward, toward the Medes, Elamites, and Assyrians, and thence to the Caspian sea; and eastward, toward Arabia, Ethiopia, and Egypt; for all these nations did the Persian empire, one time or other, make attempts upon for the enlarging of their dominion. And at last it became so powerful, that no beasts might stand before him. The ram, which is a species of animals often preyed upon, becomes formidable even to the beasts of prey themselves, so that there was no standing before him, no escaping him, none that could deliver out of his hand, but all must yield to him. The kings of Persia did according to their will, prospered in all their ways abroad, had an uncontrollable power at home, and became great; he thought himself great, because he did what he would: but to do good is that which makes men truly great.

3. He saw this ram overcome by a he-goat. He was considering this ram, (questioning that so weak an animal should come to be so prevalent,) and thinking what would be the issue; and behold, a he-goat came, v. 5. This was Alexander the Great, the son of Philip king of Macedon; he came from the west, from Greece, which lay west from Persia; he fetched a great compass with his army, he came upon the face of the whole earth; he did in effect conquer the world, and then sat down and went to drink, because there was not another world to be conquered. Unus Pelleae juvenis non sufficit orbis—One world was too little for the youth of Pelle. This he-goat (a creature famed for comeliness in going, Prov. xxx. 31.) went on with incredible swiftness, so that he touched not the ground, so lightly did he move; he rather seemed to fly above the ground than to go upon the ground; or, none touched him in the earth, he met with little or no opposition. This he-goat, or buck, had a notable horn between his eyes, like a unicorn. He had strength, and knew his own strength; he saw himself a match for all his neighbours. Alexander pushed his conquests so fast, and with so much fury, that none of the kingdoms he attacked had courage to make a stand, or give check to the progress of his victorious armies; he made himself master of the greatest part of the then known world. Well might he be called a notable horn, for his name still lives in history, as the name of one of the most celebrated commanders in war that ever the world knew. Alexander's victories and achievements are still the entertainment of the ingenious. This he-goat came to the ram that had two horns, v. 6. Alexander with his victorious army attacked the kingdom of Persia, an army consisting of no more than 30,000 men and 5,000 horse. He ran unto him, to surprise him ere he could get intelligence of his motions, in the fury of his power; he came close to the ram. Alexander with his army came up with Darius Codomatus, then emperor of Persia, being moved with choler against him, v. 7. It was with the greatest violence that Alexander pushed on his war against Darius, who, though he brought vast numbers into the field, yet, for want of conduct, was no match for him, so that Alexander was too hard for him whenever he engaged him; smote him, cast him down to the ground, and stamped upon him; which three expressions, some think, refer to the three famous victories that Alexander obtained over Darius, at Granicus, at Issus, and at Arbela, by which he was at length totally routed, having in the last battle, had 600,000 men killed, so that Alexander became absolute master of all the Persian empire; brake his two horns, the kingdoms of Media and Persia; the ram that had destroyed all before him, (v. 4.) now is himself destroyed; Darius has no power to stand before Alexander, nor has he any friends or allies to help to deliver him out of his hand. Note, Those kingdoms, which, when they had power, abused it, and, because none could cope with them, made an end of others, by doing any wrong, may expect to have their power, at length, taken from them, and to be served in their own kind, Isa. xxxiii. 1.

4. He saw that he-goat made hereby very considerable; but the great horn that had done all this execution, was broken, v. 8. Alexander was about twenty years old when he began his wars; when he was about twenty-six he conquered Darius, became master of the whole Persian empire; but when he was about thirty-two or thirty-three years of age, when he was strong, in his full strength, he was broken; he was not killed in war, in the bed of honour, but died of a drunken surfeit, or, as some suspect, by poison, and left no child living behind him, to enjoy that which he had emulously laboured for, but left a lasting monument of the vanity of worldly power, and the insufficiency to make a man happy.

5. He saw this kingdom divided into four parts, and that instead of that one great horn there came up four notable ones, Alexander's four captains to whom he bequeathed his conquests; and he had so much, that, when it was divided among four, they had each of them enough for any one man. These four notable horns were toward the four winds of heaven, the same with the four heads of the leopard; (ch. vii. 6.) the kingdoms of Syria and Egypt, Asia and Greece—Syria lying to the east, Greece to the west, Asia Minor to the north, and Egypt to the south. Note, Those that heap up riches, know not who shall gather them, nor whose all those things shall be, which they have provided.

6. He saw a little horn arise, which made great persecution of the church and people of God; and this was the principal thing that was intended to be showed him in this vision, as afterward, ch. xi. 36, 38. All agree that this was Antiochus Epiphanes; so he called himself, the Illustrious, but others called him Antiochus Epiphanes—Antiochus the Favours. He is called here (as before ch. vii. 8.) a little horn, because he was not like the former horn; there were others between him and the kingdom, and he was of a base, servile disposition, had nothing in him of princely qualities, and had been for some time a hostage and prisoner at Rome, whence he made his escape, and, though the youngest brother, and his elder living, got the kingdom.
He waxed exceeding great toward the south, for he seized upon Egypt, and toward the east, for he invaded Persia and Armenia. But that which is here especially taken notice of, is, the mischief that he did to the people of the Jews. They are not expressly named, for prophecies must not be too plain; but they are here so described that it would be easy for those who understood scripture-language, to know to whom this threat was made. The events of this before, might be awakened to prepare themselves and their children beforehand, for these suffering, trying times.

(1.) He set himself against the pleasant land, the land of Israel, so called, because it was the glory of all lands, for fruitfulness and all the delights of human life, but especially for the tokens of God's presence in it, and its being blessed with divine relations and institutions; it was mount Zion that was beautiful for situation, and the joy of the whole earth, Ps. xlvii. 2. The pleasantness of that land was, that there the Messiah was to be born, who would be both the Consolation and the Glory of his people Israel. Note, We have reason to reckon that a pleasant place, which is a holy place, in which the tabernacle dwells, and where we may have opportunity of communing with him. Surely, It is good to be here.

(2.) He fought against the host of heaven, the people of God, the church, which is the kingdom of heaven, the church-militant here on earth. The saints, being born from above, and citizens of heaven, and doing the will of God, by his grace, in some measure if they are called the host of heaven; so, the priests and Levites, who were employed in the service of the tabernacle, and there exercised a good warfare, were this host of heaven. These Antichus set himself against, he waxed great to the host of heaven, in opposition to them, and in defiance of them.

(3.) He cast down some of the host, that is, of the stars (for they are called the host of heaven) to the ground, and stamped upon them. Some of those that were most eminent both in church and state, that were burning and shining lights in their generation, he either forced to comply with his idolatries, or put them to death; he got them into his hands, and then trampled upon them, and triumphed over them; as good old Eleazar, and the seven brethren his brothers, and the two thousand three hundred eighty and five that followed him, because they would not eat swine's flesh, 2 Mac. vi. 7. He gloried in it, that herein he insulted Heaven itself, and exalted his throne above the stars of God, Isa. xiv. 13.

(4.) He magnified himself even to the prince of the host. He set himself against the High Priest, Onias, whom he deprived of his dignity; or, rather, against God himself, who was Israel's King of old, who reigns for ever as Zion's King, who himself heads his own hosts that fight his battles. Against him Antichus magnified himself; as Pharaoh, when he said, Who is the Lord? Note, Those who persecute the people of God, persecute God himself.

(5.) He took away the daily sacrifice; the morning and evening lamb, which God appointed to be offered on Mount Zion. He cast this aside. Antichus forbade and restrained the offering of it. No doubt, he took away all other sacrifices, but the daily sacrifice only is mentioned, because that was the greatest loss of all other; for in that they kept up their constant communion with God, which they preferred before that which is only occasional. God's people reckon their daily sacrifices, their morning and evening exercises of duties most needful of their daily business, and the most delightful of their daily comforts, and would not for all the world part with them.

(6.) He cast down the place of his sanctuary. He did not burn and demolish the temple, but he cast it down, when he profaned it, made it the temple of Jupiter Olympus, and set up his image in it. He also cast down the truth to the ground, trampled upon the book of the law, that word of truth, tore it, and burnt it, and did what he could to have destroyed it quite, that it might have been lost and forgotten for ever. These were the projects of that wicked prince, that threatened to turn all truth to the ground, and would you think it in these he prospered. He carried the matter very far, seemed to have gained his point, and went near to have extinguished that holy religion which God's right hand had planted.

But lest he or any other should triumph, as if herein he had prevailed against God himself, and been too hard for him, the matter is here explained, and set in a true light. [1.] He could not have done this, if God had not permitted him to do it; could have had no power against Israel, unless it had been given him from above. God put this power into his hand, and gave him a host against the daily sacrifice. God's providence put that sword into his hand, by which he was enabled thus to bear down all before him. Note, We ought to eye and own the hand of God in all the events of God's success, and the successes of the church's enemies against the church. They are but the rod in God's hand. [2.] God would not have permitted it, if his people had not provoked him to do so. It is by reason of transgression, the transgression of Israel, to correct them for that, that Antichus is employed to give them all this trouble. Note, When the pleasant land and the holy people was thrown down, and all the crosses and sacrifices of the church's enemies against the church. Lastly, He heard the time of this calamity limited and determined; not the time when it should come, that is not here fixed, because God would have his people always prepared for it, but how long it should last; that, when they had no more any prophets to tell them how long, (Ps. lxxiv. 9. which no man seems to have been calculated for the Hebram and the heathens, and the dark and doleful day,) they might have this prophecy to give them a prospect of deliverance in due time. Now concerning this, we have here,

(1.) The question asked concerning it, v. 13. Observe, [1.] By whom the question was put; I heard one saint speaking to this purport, and then another saint seconded him; O that we knew how long it should last! (2.) Accordingly this is a seconded question; an inquiry concerning it by a seconded inquiry; what a thing must be of not to second the question of those who have already expressed themselves concerning it. Thus John in the fifth chapter, and Christ's disciples, and all the apostles, and the Christian church, and all the saints of God, were decked by Peter, to ask Christ a question, John xiii. 23, 24. [2.] To whom the question was put. He said unto Polymni, that seake, Some make this certain saint to be a superior angel who order stood more than the rest, to whom therefore they came with their inquiries. Others make it to be the eternal Word, the Son of God. He is the unknown One. Palmeni seems to be compounded of Peloni Ammoni, which is used, Ruth iv. 1, for Ho, such a one, and 2 Kings vi. 8, for such a place. Christ was yet the nameless One. Wherefore ask ed Daniel his master, 'And what is his name?' (ver. 18.) He is the numberer of secrets, as some translate it; for from him there is nothing hid; the wonderful numberer, so others. His name is called Wonderful. Note, If we would know the mind of God, we must apply ourselves to Jesus Christ, who lay in the bosom of the Father, and in whom are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, not hid from himself, but from us. One question was asked, 'How long shall the vision concerning the daily sacrifice? How long shall the prohibition of it continue? How long shall the pleasant land be made unpleasant by that severe interdict? How long shall the transgression of desolation, the image of Jupiter, that great transgression which makes all our sacred things desolate, how long shall that stand in the temple? How long shall the sanctuary and the holy place be trodden under foot by the oppressor?' Note, Angels are concerned for the prosperity of the church on earth, and desire to see an end of its desolations. The angels asked, for the satisfaction of Daniel, not doubting but he was desirous to know, how long those calamities should last? The question taken in general, is, that they should not last always: the rest of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous, though it may come upon their lot. Christ comforted himself in his sufferings with this, The things concerning me have an end; (Luke xxi. 37.) and so may the church in hers. But it is desirable to know how long they shall last, that we may provide accordingly.

(23.) The answer given to this question, v. 14. Christ gives instruction to the holy angels, for they are our fellow-servants; but here the answer was given to Daniel, because for his sake the question was asked: He said unto me, God sometimes gives in great favours to his people, in answer to the inquiries and requests of their friends for them. Now Christ assures him, [1.] That the trouble shall end; it shall be in 2300 days, and no longer: so many evenings and mornings, (so the word is,) so many Jy's, so many natural days, reckoned, as in the beginning of Genesis, by the evenings and mornings; because it was the evening and morning sacrifice that they most lamented the loss of, and thought the time passed very slowly while they wanted them. Some make the morning and the evening, in this number, to stand for two; and then 2300 evenings and as many mornings will make but 1150 days; and about so many days it was that the daily sacrifice was interrupted, and this comes nearer to the computation (ch. vii. 25.) of a time, times, and the dividing of a time. But it is less forced to understand them of so many natural days; 2300 days make six years and three months, and eleven days, and just so long they passed from the defection of the people, procured by Medo-Persia, the High Priest in the 142d year of the kingdom of the Schizoid, the sixth month of that year, and the sixth day of the month, (so Josephus dates it,) to the cleansing of the sanctuary, and the re-establishment of religion among them, which was in the 488th year, the ninth month, and the twenty-fifth day of the month. [1 Mac. iv. 32.] God reckons the time of his people's affliction by days, for in all their afflictions he is afflicted; (Rev. ii. 10.) Then shall have tribulation ten days. [2.] He assures him, that they should see better days after; Then shall the sanctuary be cleansed. Note, The cleansing of the sanctuary is a happy token for good to all people; when they begin to be reformed, they will soon be relieved. Though the righteous God may, for the correction of his people, suffer his sanctuary to be profaned for awhile, yet the jealous God will, for his own glory, see to the cleansing of it in due time. Christ died to cleanse his church, and he will so cleanse it as at length to present it blameless to himself.

15. And it came to pass, when I, even I Daniel, had seen the vision, and sought for the meaning, then, behold, there stood before me as the appearance of a man. 16. And I heard a man's voice between the banks of Ulai, which called, and said, Gabriel, make this man to understand the vision. 17. So he came near where I stood; and when he came, I was afraid, and fell upon my face: but he said unto me, Understand, O son of man: for at the time of the end shall be the vision. 18. Now, as he was speaking with me, I was in a deep sleep on my face to the ground: but he touched me, and set me upright. 19. And he said, Behold, I will make thee know what shall be in the last end of the indignation: for at the time appointed the end shall be. 20. The ram which thou sawest having two horns are the kings of Media and Persia. 21. And the rough goat is the king of Grecia: and the great horn that is between his eyes is the first king. 22. Now that being broken, whereas four stood up for it, four kingdoms shall stand up out of the nation, but not in his power. 23. And in the latter time of their kingdom, when the transgressors are come to the full, a king of fierce countenance, and understanding dark sentences, shall stand up. 24. And his power shall be mighty, but not by his own power: and he shall destroy wonderfully, and shall prosper, and practise, and shall destroy the mighty and the holy people. 25. And through his policy also he shall cause craft to prosper in his hand; and he shall magnify himself in his heart, and by peace shall destroy many: he shall also stand up against the Prince of princes; but he shall be broken without hand. 26. And the vision of the evening and the morning which was told is true: wherefore shut thou up the vision: for it shall be for many days. 27. And I Daniel fainted, and was sick certain days; afterward I rose up, and did the king's business; and I was astonished at the vision, but none understood it.

Here we have,

1. Daniel's earnest desire to have this vision explained to him; (v. 15.) I sought the meaning. Note, Those that rightly know the things of God cannot but desire to know more and more of them.
and to be led further into the mystery of them; and those that would find the meaning of what they have seen or heard from God, must seek it, and seek it diligently; Seek and ye shall find. Daniel considered the thing, compared it with the former discoveries, to try if he could understand it; but especially he sought by prayer, as he had done (ch. ii. 13.) and he did not seek in vain.

11. Orders given to the angel Gabriel to inform him concerning this vision; one in the appearance of a man, who, some think, was Christ himself, for who besides could command angels? He orders Gabriel to make Daniel understand this vision. Sometimes God is pleased to make use of the administration of an angel, to protect his children, but to instruct them; to serve the kind intentions, not only of his providence, but of his grace.

III. The consternation that Daniel was in, upon the approach of his instructor; (v. 17.) When he came near, I was afraid. Though Daniel was a man of great prudence and courage, and had been conversant with the visions of the Almighty, yet the approach of an extraordinary messenger from heaven put him into this fright. He fell upon his face, not to worship the angel, but because he could no longer bear the dazzling lustre of his glory. Nay, being prostrate upon the ground, he fell into a deep sleep, (v. 18.) which came not from any neglect of the vision, or indifference towards it, but was an effect of his faintness, and the oppression of spirit he was under. He was God's appointed agent to repeat the visions to Daniel; The disciples in the garden slept for sorrow; and as there, so here, the spirit was willing, but the flesh was weak. Daniel would have kept awake, and could not.

IV. The relief which the angel gave to Daniel, with great encouragement to him to expect a satisfactory discovery of the meaning of this vision. He came to him, and said, Daniel, my servant; I have thought upon thee, and thou shalt hear this vision. Thus when Jehoiachin, in a like case, was in a like consternation, Christ laid his right hand upon him, Rev. i. 17. It was a gentle touch that the angel here gave to Daniel, to show that he came not to hurt him, but to plead against him with his great power, or with a hand heavy upon him, but to help him, to put strength into him, (Job xxiii. 6.) which God took upon him, and set him upon his throne. He did not think of it, in theng and grousing on this earth, we are very unfit to hear from God, and to converse with him. But if God design instruction for us, he will by his grace awaken us out of our slumber, raise us from things below, and set us upright. 2. He promised to inform him; "Understand, O son of man, v. 17. Thou shalt understand, if thou wilt but apply thy mind to understand." He calls him son of man, to intimate that he would consider his frame, and would deal tenderly with him, accommodating himself to his capacity as a man. Or, thus he preaches humility to him; though he be admitted to converse with angels, he must not be puffed up with it, but must remember that he is a son of man. Or, perhaps, this title puts an honour upon him; the Messiah was lately called the Son of man, (ch. v. 23.) and Daniel is akin to him, and a figure of him, as a prophet, and one greatly beloved. He assures him that he shall be made to know what shall be in the last end of the indignation, v. 19. Let it be laid up for a comfort to those who shall live to see these calamitous times, that there shall be an end of them, the indignation shall cease, (Isa. x. 28.) it shall be overpast, Isa. xxxi. 29. It may intermit and return again, but the last end shall be glorious; good will follow it, and good will be brought out of it. He tells him, (v. 17.) "At the time of the end shall be the vision; when the last end of the indignation comes, when the course of this providence is completed, then the vision shall be made plain and intelligible by the event, as the event shall be made plain and intelligible by the vision." Or, "At the time of the end of the Jewish church, in the latter days of it, shall this vision be accomplished, three or four hundred years hence; and understand it therefore, that thou mayest leave it on record for the generations to come." But it asks more particularly, "When is the time of the end? And how long will it be before it arrive?" Let this answer suffice, (v. 19.) At the time appointed the end shall be; it is fixed in the divine counsel, which cannot be altered, and which must not be tried into.

V. The exposition which he gave him of the vision.

1. Concerning the two monarchies of Persia and Greece, v. 20-22. The ram signifies the succession of the kings of Media and Persia; the rough goat signifies the kings of Greece; the great horn was Alexander; the four horns that rose in his room were the four kingdoms into which his conquests were cantonned, of which before, v. 8. They are said to stand up out of the nations, but not in his power; none of them ever made the figure that Alexander did. Josephus relates, that when Alexander had taken Tyre, and subdued Palestine, and was upon his march to Jerusalem, Jaddus, who was then High Priest, (Nehemiah mentions one of this name, ch. xii. 11.) fearing his rage, had recourse to God by prayer and sacrifice for the common safety, and was by him warned in a dream, that upon Alexander's death, one of his generals should rise in the city, and that he and the rest of the priests should go forth to meet him in their habits, and all the people in white. Alexander, seeing this company at a distance, went himself alone to the High Priest, and having prostrated himself before that God whose name was engraven in the golden plate of his mitre, he first saluted him; and, being asked by one of his officers what this signified, (they were by this time relations,) he told them that while he was yet in Macedon, rousing on the conquest of Asia, there appeared to him a man like unto this, and thus attired, who invited him into Asia, and assured him of success in the conquest of it. The priests led him to the temple, where he offered sacrifice to the God of Israel as they had directed him; and there they showed him this book of Daniel, informing him that a Grecian should come, and destroy the Persians, which animated him very much in the expedition he was now meditating against Daricus. Hereupon, he took the Jews and their religion under his protection, promised to be kind to those of their religion in Babylon and Media, whither he was now marching; and, in honour of him, all the priests that had sons born that year, called them Alexander. Joseph, ii. 11.

2. Concerning Antiochus, and his oppression of the Jews. This is said to be in the latter time of the kingdom of the Greeks, when the transgressors are come to the fall; (v. 23.) when the degenerate Jews have filled up the measure of their iniquity, and are ripe for this destruction, says this sacred historian. In the meantime, the Jews are under great calamities; and shall stand up this king, to be a flagellum Del-they will be scourged by the chastising of the Jews. Now observe here,

(1.) His character; He shall be a king of fierce countenance, insolent and furious, neither fearing God nor regarding man: understanding dark sentences, or, the deep parts of wickedness, or, the deep parts of dishonesty; he was master of all the arts of dissimulation and deceit, and knew the depths of Satan as well as any man. He was wise to do evil.

(2.) His success; he shall make dreadful havoc of the nations about him: His power shall be mighty, he shall slay all before him, but not by his own power, (v. 24.) but partly by the assistance of his allies.
Eumenes and Attalus, partly by the baseness and treachery of many of the Jews, even of the priests that came into his interests, and especially by the divine permission; it was not by his own power, but by a power given him from above, that he destroyed wonderfully, and thought he made himself a great man by being a great destroyer. He destroys wonder-fully, and he destroys holy people, and they cannot resist him by their power. The princes of Egypt cannot stand before him with all their forces, but he practises against them and prospers. Note, The mighty ones of the earth commonly meet with those at length that are too hard for them, that are more mighty than they. Let not the strong man then glory in his strength, but let him glory in the Lord, for he can do as he wills. [2.] He exercised over the holy people, or the people of the holy ones; and their sacred character does neither deter him from destroying them, nor defend them from being destroyed. All things come alike to all, and there is one event to the mighty and to the holy in this world. (3.) The methods by which he will gain this success, not by true courage, wisdom, or justice, but by false policy and craft, and serpentine subtlety; He shall cause craft to prosper; so cunningly shall he carry on his projects, that he shall gain his point by the art of wheeling. By peace he shall destroy many, as others do by war; under the pretence of treaties, leagues, and alliances with them, he shall encroach on their rights, and trick them into a subjection to him. Thus sometimes what a nation truly brave has gained by a righteous war, a nation truly base has regained in a treacherous peace, and craft has been caused to prosper.

(4.) The mischief that he shall do to religion; He shall magnify himself in his heart, and think himself fit to prescribe and give law to every body, so that he shall stand up against the Prince of princes, against God himself; he will profane his temple and altar, prohibit his worship, and persecute his worshippers. See what a height of impassion some men's impiety brings them to; they openly bid defiance to God himself, though he is the King of kings.

(3.) The ruin that he shall bring him to at last; He shall be broken without hand, without the hand of man; he shall not be slain in war, nor shall he be assassinated, as tyrants commonly are, but shall fall by the hand of the living God, and die by an immediate stroke of his vengeance. He, hearing that the Jews had cast the image of Jupiter Olympius out of the temple, where he had placed it, was so enraged at the Jews, that he vowed he would make Jerusalem a common burying-place, and determined to march thither immediately: but no sooner had he spoken these proud words, than he was struck with an incurable plague in his bowels, worms bred so fast in his body, that whole flakes of flesh sometimes dropped from him, his torments were violent, and the stench of his disease so strong that none could endure to come near him. He continued in this misery very long; at first, he persisted in his menaces against the Jews, but at length, despairing of his recovery, he called his friends together, and acknowledged all those miseries to have fallen upon him for three crimes he had done to the Jews and his profaning the temple at Jerusalem; then he wrote courteous letters to the Jews, and vowed that if he recovered, he would let them have the free exercise of their religion. But, finding his disease grow upon him, when he could no longer endure his own smell, he said, It is meet to submit to God, and for man which is mortal not to resist himself in competition with God: and thus miserably in a strange land, on the mountains of Panata near Babylon: so Usher's Annals, A. M. 3840, about 160 years before the birth of Christ.

3. As to the time fixed for the continuance of the cessation of the daily sacrifice, it is not explained here, but only confirmed; (v. 26.) That vision of the evening and morning is true, in the proper sense of the words, and needs no explanation. How unlikely it was that God should suffer his own sanctuary to be thus profaned, yet it is true, it is too true, so it shall be.

Lastly, Here is the conclusion of this vision and here.

1. The charge given to Daniel to keep it private for the present; Shut thou up the vision; let it not be publicly known among the Chaldeans, lest the Persians, who were now shortly to possess the kingdom, should be incensed against the Jews because the downfall of their kingdom was foretold by it, which would be unsavourable now that the edict for their release was expected from the King of Persia. Shut it up, for it shall be for many days; it was about 300 years from the time of this vision to the time of the accomplishment of it, therefore he must shut it up for the present, even from the people, and not let the Chaldeans, nor the Persians know it, but let it be kept safe for the generations to come, that should live about the time of the accomplishment of it, for to them it would be both most intelligible and most serviceable. Note, What we know of the things of God should be carefully laid up, that hereafter, when there is occasion, it may be faithfully laid out; and what we have not now any use for, yet we may have another time; divine things shall be sealed up among our treasures, that we may find them again after many days. 2. The care he took to keep it private, having received such a charge; (v. 27.) He fainted, and was sick, with the multitude of his thoughts within him occasioned by this vision, which oppressed and overwhelmed him the more, because he was forbidden to publish what he had seen, so that his body was as one which has no rest, he was ready to burst like new bottles, Job xxxii. 19. However, he kept it to himself, stifled and smothered the concern he was in; so that these he conversed with could not perceive it, but he did the king's business according to the duty of his place, whatever it was. Note, As long as we live in this world we must have some thing to do in it; and even those whom God has most dignified with his favours must not think themselves free from the charge of duty.

Note, Must the pleasure of communion with God take us off from the duties of our particular callings, but still we must in them abide with God. Those especially that are intrusted with public business, must see to it that they conscientiously discharge their trust.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter we have, 1. Daniel's prayer for the restoration of the Jews who were in captivity; in which, he confesses sin, and acknowledges the justice of God in their calamities; 2. He reads God's will in the vision, as he had yet in store for them, v. 1. - 15. 1. An immediate answer sent him by an angel to his prayer; in which, 1. He is assured of the discharge of the Jews out of their captivity, v. 20. - 22. And, 2. He is informed concerning the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ, of which that was a type, what should be the nature of it, and when it should be accomplished, v. 24. - 27. And it is the clearest, brightest prophecy of the Messiah, in all the Old Testament.

11 In the first year of Darius, the son of Ahasuerus, of the seed of the Medes, which was made king over the realm of the Chaldeans; 2. In the first year of his reign, I Daniel understood by books the number of the years, whereof the word of the Lord came to Jeremiah the prophet, that he would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. 3. And I set my face unto the Lord God, to seek by prayer and supplications, with fasting, and sackcloth, and ashes.

We left Daniel, in the close of the foregoing chapter, employed in the king's business; but here we have him employed in better business than any the king had for him, speaking to God, and hearing from him, not for himself only, but for the church, whose mouth he was to God, and for whose use the oracles of God were committed to him, relating to the days of the Mede. (Obad. 1.) When it was that Daniel had this communion with God; (v. 1.) in the first year of Darius the Mede, who was newly made king of the Chaldeans, Babylon being conquered by him and his nephew, or grandson, Cyrus. In this year, the seventy years of the Jews' captivity ended, but the decree for their release was not yet issued out; so that this address of Daniel's to God seems to have been made in the vanity of his heart, to seek the welfare of his nation, and the lions' den. And one powerful inducement, perhaps, it was to him then to keep so close to the duty of prayer, though it cost him his life, that he had so lately experienced the benefit and comfort of it.

2. What occasioned his address to God by prayer; (v. 2.) He understood by books, that seventy years was the time fixed for the continuance of the desolations of Jerusalem. The book by which he understood this was, the book of the prophecies of Jeremiah, in which he found it expressly foretold, (Jer. xxix. 10.) After seventy years be accomplished in Babylon, (and therefore they must be reckoned from the first captivity, in the third year of Jehoiakim, which Daniel had reason to remember by a good token, for it was in that captivity that he was carried away himself; ch. i. 1.) I will visit you, and perform my good word toward you. It was likewise said, (Jer. xxv. 11.) This whole land shall be seventy years a desolation, (Chorobath,) the same word that Daniel here uses for the desolations of Jerusalem, which shows that he had that prophecy before him when he wrote this. Though Daniel was himself a great prophet, and one that was well acquainted with the visions of God, yet he was a diligent student in the scripture, and thought it no disparagement to him to consult Jeremiah's prophecies. He was a great politician, and prime minister of state to one of the greatest monarchs upon earth, and yet could find both heart and time to converse with the word of God. The greatest and best men in the world must not think themselves above their Bibles.

3. How serious and solemn his address to God was, when he understood that the seventy years were just upon expiring; (for it appears, by Ezekiel's dating of his prophecies, that they exactly computed the years of their captivity;) then he set his face to seek God by prayer. Note, God's promises are intended, not to supersede, but to excite and encourage, our prayers; and when we see the day of the performance of them approaching, we should the more earnestly plead them with God, and put them in suit. So Daniel did here; he prayed three times a day, and, no doubt, in every prayer made mention of the desolations of Jerusalem; yet he did not think that enough, but even in the midst of his business set time apart for an extraordinary application to Jerusalem's behalf. God had said to Ezekiel, that through Daniel, and among others, stood before him, his intercession should not prevail to prevent the judgment; (Ezek. xiv. 14.) yet he hopes, now that the warfare is accomplished, (Isa. xl. 2.) his prayer may be heard for the removing of the judgment. When the day of deliverance dawns, it is time for God's praying people to bestir themselves; something extraordinary is then expected and required from them, beside their daily sacrifice. Now Daniel sought by prayer and supplications, for fear lest the sins of the people should provoke him to defer their deliverance longer than was intended; or rather, that the people might be prepared by the grace of God for the deliverance, now that the providence of God was about to work it out for them. Now observe, (1.) The intensity of his mind in this prayer; I set my face unto the Lord God to seek him; which denotes the fixness of his thoughts, the firmness of his faith, and the fervency of his devout affections, in the duty. We must, in prayer, set God before us, and ourselves in his presence; to him we must direct our prayer, and must look up. Probabli, in token of his setting his face toward God, he did, as usual, set his face toward Jerusalem, to affect his own heart the more with the desolations of it. (2.) The mortification of his body in this prayer; in token of his deep humiliation before God for his own sins, and the sins of the people; which, with the consciousness of his unworthiness, when he prayed he fasted, put on sackcloth, and lay in ashes, the more to affect himself with the desolations of Jerusalem, which he was praying for the repair of, and to make himself sensible that he was now about an extraordinary work.

4. And I prayed unto the Lord my God, and made my confession, and said, O Lord, the great and dreadful God, keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and to them that keep his commandments; 5. We have sinned, and have committed iniquity, and have done wickedly, and have rebelled, even by departing from thy precepts, and from thy judgments: 6. Neither have we hearkened unto thy servants the prophets, which spake in thy name to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, and to all the people of the land. 7. O Lord, righteousness belongeth unto thee; but unto us confusion of faces, as at this day; to the men of Judah, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and unto all Israel, that are near, and that are far off, through all the countries whither thou hast driven them, because of their trespass that they have trespassed against thee. 8. O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, to our kings, to our princes, and to our fathers, because we have sinned against thee. 9. To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses, though we have rebelled against him: 10. Neither have we obeyed the voice of the Lord our God, to walk in his laws, which he set before us by his servants the prophets. 11. Yea, all Israel have transgressed thy law, even by departing, that they might not obey thy voice; therefore the curse is poured upon us, and the oath that is written in the law of Moses the servant of God, because we have sinned against him.
And he hath confirmed his words, which he spake against us, and against our judges that judged us, by bringing upon us a great evil: for under the whole heaven hath not been done as hath been done upon Jerusalem. 13. As it is written in the law of Moses, all this evil is come upon us: yet made we not our prayer before the Lord our God, that we might turn from our iniquities, and understand thy truth. 14. Therefore hath the Lord watched upon the evil, and brought it upon us: for the Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doeth: for we obeyed not his voice. 15. And now, O Lord our God, that hast brought thy people forth out of the land of Egypt with a mighty hand, and hast gotten thee renown, as at this day; we have sinned, we have done wickedly. 16. O Lord, according to all thy righteousness, I beseech thee, let thine anger and thy fury be turned away from thy city Jerusalem, thy holy mountain: because for our sins, and for the iniquities of our fathers, Jerusalem and thy people are become a reproach to all that are about us. 17. Now, therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplications; and cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, for the Lord’s sake. 18. O my God, incline thine ear, and hear; open thine eyes, and behold thy desolations: and the city which is called by thy name: for we do not present our supplications before thee for our righteousness, but for thy great mercies. 19. O Lord, hear: O Lord, forgive; O Lord, hearken, and do; defer not, for thine own sake, O my God: for thy city and thy people are called by thy name.

We have here Daniel’s prayer to God as his God, and the confession which he joined with that prayer; I prayed, and made my confession. Note, In every prayer we must make confession, not only of the sins we have been guilty of, (which we commonly call confession,) but of our faith in God, and dependence upon him, our sorrow for sin, and our resolutions against it. It must be our confession, the language of our own convictions, and that which we ourselves do heartily subscribe to.

Let us go over the several parts of this prayer, which we have reason to think that he offered up much larger than is here recorded; and that these are only the best.

1. Here is his humble, serious, reverent address to God; in which he gives glory to God, 1. As a God to be feared, and whom it is our duty always to stand in awe of; “O Lord, the great and dreadful God, that art able to deal with the greatest and most terrible of the church’s enemies.” 2. As a God to be trusted, and whom it is our duty to depend upon, and put a confidence in; keeping the covenant and mercy to them that love him, and, as a proof of their love to him, keep his commandments. If we do our part of the bargain, he will not fail to do his. He will be to his people as good as his word, for he keeps covenant with them, and not one iota of his promise shall fall to the ground; nay, he will be better than his word, for he keeps mercy to them, something more than was in the covenant. It was proper for Daniel to have his eye upon God’s mercy, now that he was to lay before him the miseries of his people; and upon God’s covenant now, he was to try the performance of his promises. Note, We should, in prayer, seek both at God’s greatness and his goodness, his majesty and mercy in conjunction.

II. Here is a penitent confession of sin, the procuring cause of all the calamities which his people had for so many years been growing under, v. 5, 6. When we seek to God for national mercies, we ought to humble ourselves before him for national sins; these are the sins Daniel here laments; and we may here observe the variety of words he makes use of to set forth the greatness of their provocations; (for it becomes penitents to lay load upon themselves;) We have sinned in many particular instances, nay, we have committed iniquity, we have driven a trade of sin, we have done wickedly with a hard heart and a stiff neck, and herein we have rebelled against thee. We have taken up arms against the King of kings, his crown and dignity. Two things aggravated their sins:

1. That they had violated the express laws God had given them by Moses; “We have departed from thy precepts and from thy judgments, and have not conformed to them.” And (v. 10,) we have not obeyed the voice of the Lord our God. That which speaks of nature, that it is the transgression of the law, does sufficiently speak the malignity of it; if sin be made to appear sin, it cannot be made to appear worse; its sinfulness is its greatest hatefulness, Rom. vii. 13. God has set his laws before us plainly and fully, as the copy we should write after, yet we have not walked in them, but turned aside, or turned back.

2. That they had slighted the fair warnings God had given them by the prophets, which in every age he had sent to them, rising up betimes, and sending them; (v. 6,) “We have not hearkened to thy servants the prophets, who have put us in mind of thy laws, and of the sanctions of them; though they speak in thy name, we have not regarded them; though they delivered their message faithfully, who have delivered it to the ears of men, from degrees of men, to our kings and princes, whom they had the courage and confidence to speak to, to our fathers, and to all the people of the land, whom they had the condensation and compassion to speak to, yet we have not hearkened to them, not heard them, or not heeded them, or not complied with them.” Mocking God’s messengers, and despising his words, was Jerusalem’s measure-filling sin. 2 Chron. xxxvi. 16. This confession of sin is repeated here, and much insisted on; penitents should again and again accuse and repudiate themselves till they find their hearts thoroughly broken. All Israel have transgressed thy law, v. 11. It is Israel, God’s professing people, who have known better, and from whom better is expected; Israel, God’s peculiar people; whom he loved, whose name is written in the book of life, whom he has favoured; not here and there one, but it is all Israel, the generality of them, the body of the people, that has transgressed by departing and getting out of the way, that they might not hear, and so might not obey, thy voice. This disobedience is that which all true penitents do most sensibly charge upon themselves; (v. 14.) We obeyed not his voice, and (v. 15,) we have sinned, we have done wickedly. Those that would find mercy, must thus confess their sins.

III. Here is a self-abasing acknowledgment of the righteousness of God in all the judgments that were brought upon them: and it is evermore the
1. He acknowledges that it was sin that plunged them in all these troubles. Israel is dispersed through all the countries about, and so weakened, impoverished, and exposed. God’s hand has driven them hither and thither, some near, where they are known, others afar off, where they are not known, and therefore the more abandoned, and it is because of their treachery that they have trespassed. (v. 7.) They mingled themselves with the nations, that they might be defiled by them, and now God mingleth them with the nations, that they might be struck by them.

2. He owns the righteousness of God in it; that he had done them no wrong in all he had brought upon them, but had dealt with them as they deserved. (v. 7.) “O Lord, righteousness belongs to thee, we have no fault to find with thy providence, no exceptions to make against thy judgments; for, (v. 14.) the Lord our God is righteous in all his works which he doth, even in the sore calamities we are now under.” If we obey not the words of his mouth, and therefore justly feel the weight of his hand. This seems to be borrowed from Lam. i. 18.

3. He takes notice of the fulfilling of the scripture in what was brought upon them; In very faithfulness he afflicted them; for it was according to the word which he had spoken. The curse is poured upon us, and the oath, the curse that was ratified by an oath. Therefore has he confirmed his words which he spake against us, because we broke his laws, and against our judges that judged us, because they did not according to the duty of their place punish the breach of God’s laws; he told them many a time, that if they did not execute justice, as tyrants to evil-workers, he must and would take the work into his own hands; and now he has confirmed what he has confirmed us as a great enemy, over which the princes and judges themselves deeply shared. Note, It contributes very much to our prosperity by the judgments of God’s hand, to observe how exactly they agree with the judgments of his mouth.

4. He aggravates the calamities they were in, lest they should seem, having been long used to them, to make light of them, and so to lose the benefit of the chastening of the Lord by despising it; “It is not some of the common troubles of life that we are complaining of, but that which has in it some special marks of divine displeasure; for under the whole heaven has not been done, as has been done upon Jerusalem,” v. 12. It is Jeremiah’s lamentation, in the name of the church, Was ever sorrow like unto my sorrow? This must stop the other like question, Was ever sin like unto my sin? He puts shame upon the whole nation, from the highest to the lowest; and if they will say Amen to his prayer, as it was fit they should if they would come in for a share in the benefit of it, they must all put their hand upon their mouth, and their mouth in the dust; (v. 7.) we lie under the shame of the punishment at this day, and we ought to accommodate ourselves to it, and to accept of the punishment of our iniquity, for shame is our due.” If Israel had retained their character, and had continued a holy people, they had been high above all nations in praise, and name, and honour: (Dan. xxxvi. 19.) but now that they have sinned and done wickedly, confusion and disgrace belong to them, to the men of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, the inhabitants both of the country and of the city, for they have been all alike guilty before God; it belongs to all Israel, both to the two tribes, that are near, by the rivers of Babylon, and to the ten tribes, that are afar off, in the land of Judah, and others make no mention of the Gentiles, but God belongs not only to the common people of our land but to our kings, our princes, and our fathers, (v. 8.) who should have set a better example, and have used their authority and influence for the checking of the threatening torrent of vice and profligacy.

5. He imputes the continuance of the judgment to the unrighteousness under it; (v. 13, 14.) “All this evil is from before thy people Israel, which have not returned to him that smote us; (We have not entreated the face of the Lord our God, nor the counsel of our fathers.” (v. 4.) We have taken no care to make our peace with God, and reconcile ourselves to him: Daniel gives us an example of praying continually, but he was sorry to see how few there were that followed his example; in their affliction, it was expected, they would seek God early, but they sought him not, that they might turn from their iniquities, and understand his truth. The errand upon which afflictions are sent, is, to bring men to turn from their iniquities, and to understand God’s truth; Ez. xv. 19. Daniel xxxvi. 10. God by them opens men’s ears to discipline, and commands that they return from iniquity. And if men were brought rightly to understand God’s truth, and to submit to the power and authority of it, they would turn from the error of their ways. Now the first step toward this is, to make our prayer before the Lord our God, that the affliction may be sanctified and removed, and that the grace of God may go along with the providence of God, to make it answer the end. Those who in their affliction make not their prayer to God, who cry not when he binds them, are not likely to turn from iniquity, or to understand his truth; (v. 3.) Therefore because we have not improved our affliction, the Lord has watched upon the evil, as the judge takes care that the evil shall be according to the sentence; because we have not been melted, he has kept us still in the furnace, and watched over it, to make the heat yet more intense;” for when God judges he will overcome, and will be justified in all his proceedings.

IV. Here is a believing appeal to the mercy of God, and to the ancient tokens of favour to Israel, and the concern of his own glory.

1. It is some comfort to them, and not a little, that God has been always ready to pardon sin; (v. 9.) To the Lord our God belong mercies and forgivenesses; this refers to that proclamation of his name, (Exod. xxxiv. 6, 7.) The Lord God, gracious and merciful, forgiving iniquity. Note, It is very encouraging to poor sufferers, to recollect that mercies belong to God, as it is as glorious and humbling to them, to recollect that righteousness belongs to him; and they who give him the glory of his righteousness, may take to themselves the comfort of his medicines, Ps. lxix. 12. There are abundant medicines in God, and not only forgiveness but forgivenesses; he is a God of pardons; (Neh. ix. 17. Mark.) he multiplied them, as God, Is. lv. 7. Though we have rebelled against him, and have been angry with him, there is mercy, pardoning mercy, even for the rebellions.

2. It is likewise a support to them, to think that God had formerly glorified himself by delivering them out of Egypt; so far he looks back for the en enlargement of his faith: (v. 15). “Thou hast formerly brought thy people out of Egypt with a mighty hand; and wilt thou not now with the same mighty hand bring them out of Babylon? Were they then formed into a people; and shall they not now be reformed and new-formed? Are they now sinful and unworthy; and were they not so then? Are their oppressors now mighty and haughty; and were they not so before? I have said that their deliverance out of Babylon shall outshine that of Egypt.” Jer. xvi. 14, 15. The force of this plea lies in that, “Thou hast gotten the renown, hast made ther a name,” (so the word is,) “as at this day, even to this day, by bringing us out of Egypt; and wilt thou lose the credit of that by letting us perish in Babylon? Didst thou get a renown but that desire be which we have so often commentator; wilt thou not now be reknown by this which we have so often prayed for, and so long waited for?”

V. Here is a pathetic complaint of the reproach that God’s people lay under, and the ruins that God’s sanctuary lay in, both which redounded very much to the dishonour of God, and the diminution of that name and renown which God had gained by his wonderful deliverance of his people.

1. God’s holy people were despised; by their sins and the iniquities of their fathers they had profaned their crown, and made themselves despicable, and then though they are, in name and profession, God’s people, and, upon that account, truly great and honourable, yet they are become a reproach to all that are round about them. Their neighbours lay them open to insult, and triumph in their degradation.

Note, Sin is a reproach to any people, but especially to God’s people, that have more eyes upon them, and have more honour to lose, than other people.

2. God’s holy place was desolate. Jerusalem, the holy city, was a reproach; (v. 16.) when it lay in ruins, it was an astonishment and a hissing to all that passed by. The sanctuary, the holy house, was desolate; (v. 17.) the altars demolished, and all the buildings laid in ashes. Note, The desolations of the sanctuary are the grief of all the saints, who reckon all their comforts in this world buried in the ruins of the sanctuary.

VI. Here is an importunate request to God for the restoring of the poor captive Jews to their former enjoyments again. His petition is very pressing; for God gives us leave in prayer to wrestle with him; “O Lord, I beseech thee, v. 16. If ever thou wilt do any thing for me, do this; it is my heart’s desire and prayer, now therefore, O our God, hear the prayer of thy servant, and his supplication, (v. 17.) and grant an answer of peace to it.” Now what are his petitions? What are his requests?

1. That God would turn away his wrath from them; that is it which all the saints dread and deprecate more than any thing; O let thine anger be turned away from thy Jerusalem, thy holy mountain, v. 16. He does not pray for the turning again of their captivity, (let the Lord do with them as seems good in his eyes;) but they pray first for the turning away of God’s wrath. Take away the cause, and the effect will cease.

2. That God would lift up the light of his countenance upon them; (v. 17.) Cause thy face to shine upon thy sanctuary that is desolate, return in mercy to us, and show that thou art reconciled to us, and then all shall be well. Note, The shining of God’s face upon the desolations of the sanctuary, is all in all towards the repair of it; and upon that foundation, all else is built. If therefore its friends would begin their work at the right end, they must first be earnest with God in prayer for his favour, and recommend his desolate sanctuary to his smiles; Cause thy face to shine, and then we shall be saved, Ps. lxxx. 3.

3. That he would forgive their sins, and then hasten their deliverence; (v. 12.) O Lord, hear; O Lord, forgive. That the mercy prayed for may be granted in mercy, let the sin that threatens to come between us and it, be removed; “O Lord, hearken and do. Not hearken and speak only, but hearken and do; that for which we ask, and which else can, and that an appointed day approaching, he could in faith pray that God would make haste to them, and not defer. David often prays, Make haste, O God, to help me.

VII. Here are several pleas and arguments to enforce the petitions. God gives us leave not only to pray, but to plead with him; which is now more necessary, (he is himself what he will do,) than to move ourselves, to excite our fervency, and encourage our faith.

1. They disclaim a dependence upon any righteousness of their own; they pretend not to merit any thing at God’s hand but wrath and the curse; (v. 18.) “We do not present our supplications before thee, with hope to speed for our righteousnesses, as if we were more worthy of the pardon, or of the favours, we ask, than others, or of the favours, we ask, or of the favours, we ask.” Note, Here and there may be a very good reason to ask for mercy, and to expect mercy, yet not on account of any righteousness of our own. God’s righteousness is sufficient for us.

2. They take their encouragement in prayer from God only; as knowing that his reasons of mercy are fetched from within himself, and therefore from him we must borrow all our pleas for mercy, and so give honour to him when we are singing for grace and mercy from him.

(1.) “Do it for thine own sake, (v. 19.) for the accomplishment of thine own counsel, the performance of thine own promise, and the manifestation of thine own glory.” Note, God will do his own work, not only in his own way and time, but for his own sake, and so we must take it.

(2.) “Do it for the Lord’s sake, for the Lord Christ’s sake; for the sake of the Messiah promised, who is the Lord; so the most and best of our Christian interpreters understand it. For the sake of Adonai, so David called the Messiah, (Ps. cx. 1.) and mercy is prayed for, for the church, for the sake of the Son of man, (Ps. lxxx. 17.) and for thy Word’s sake, 2 Sam. vii. 21. Note, Christ is the Lord, he is Lord of all. It is for his sake that God causes his face to shine upon sinners, when they repent, and turn to him; because of the satisfaction he has made. In all our prayers, that therefore must be our plea, we must make mention of his righteousness, even of his own, Ps. lxxx. 16. Look upon the face of the Avointed. He has himself directed us ask in earnest in the name of the Lord.”

(3.) “Do it according to all thy righteousness;” (v. 16.) plead for us against our persecutors and oppressors, according to thy righteousness. Though we are ourselves unrighteous before God, yet with reference to them we have a righteous cause, which we leave it with the righteous God to appear in the defence of. Or, rather, it is the righteousness of God, (he is himself what he will do,) that is meant in his faithfulness to his promises. God had, according to his righteousness, executed the threatening; (v. 11.) “Now, Lord, wilt thou not do according to all thy righteousness? Wilt thou not be as true to thy promise as thou hast been to thy threatenings, and accomplish them also?" (4.) "Do it for thy great mercies, (v. 18.) to make it to appear that thou art a merciful God." The good things we ask of God we call mercies, because we expect them purely from God's mercy. And because misery is the proper object of mercy, the prophet here spreads the deplorable condition of the church before God, as it were to move his compassion; "Often thin eyes, and behold our desolations, especially the desolations of the sanctuary. O look with pity upon a pitiable case." Note, The desolations of the church must in prayer be laid before God with solemnity and supplication. (5.) "Do it for the sake of the relation we stand in to thee. The sanctuary that is desolate, is thy sanctuary, (v. 17.) dedicated to thine honour, employed in thy service, and the place of thy residence; Jerusalem is thy city and thy holy mountain, (v. 16.) it is the city which is called by thy name," v. 18. (It was the city which God had chosen out of all the tribes of Israel, to put his name there.) "The people that are become a reproach, are thy people, and thy name suffers in the reproach cast upon them; (v. 16.) they are called by thy name, v. 19. Lord, thou hast a property in them, and therefore art interested in their interests; wilt thou not provide for thine own, for those of thine own house? They are thine, save them," Ps. cxxix. 94.

20. And while I was speaking, and praying, and confessing my sin and the sin of my people Israel, and presenting my supplication before the Lord my God for the holy mountain of my God; 21. Yea, while I was speaking in prayer, even the man Gabriel, whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning, being caused to fly swiftly, touched me about the time of the evening oblation. 22. And he informed me, and talked with me, and said, O Daniel, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding. 23. At the beginning of thy supplications the commandment came forth, and I am come to shew thee; for thou art greatly beloved: therefore understand the matter, and consider the vision. 24. Seventy weeks are determined upon thy people and upon thy holy city, to finish the transgression, and to make an end of sins, and to make reconciliation for iniquity, and to bring in everlasting righteousness, and to seal up the vision and prophecy, and to anoint the Most Holy. 25. Know, therefore, and understand, that from the going forth of the commandment to restore and to build Jerusalem, unto the Messiah the Prince, shall be seven weeks, and threescore and two weeks: the street shall be built again, and the wall, even in troublous times. 26. And after threescore and two weeks shall Messiah he cut off, but not for himself: and the people of the prince that shall come shall destroy the city and the sanctuary; and the end thereof shall be with a flood, and unto the end of the war desolations are determined. 27. And he shall confirm the covenant with many for one week: and in the midst of the week he shall cause the sanctuary and the oblation to cease, and for the overspreading of abominations he shall make it desolate, even until the consummation, and that determined, shall be poured upon the desolate.

We have here the answer that was immediately sent to Daniel's prayer, and it is a very memorable one, as it contains the most illustrious prediction of Christ and gospel-grace, that is extant in all the Old Testament. If John Baptist was the morning star, this was the day-break to the Sun of righteousness; the day-spring from on high.

Here is,

1. The time when this answer was given.

1. It was while Daniel was at prayer. This he observed, and laid a strong emphasis upon; While I was speaking, (v. 20.) yea, while I was speaking in prayer, (v. 21.) before he rose from his knees, and while his prayer was yet in his mouth, he was to say. He mentions the two heads he chiefly insisted upon in prayer, and which perhaps he designed yet further to enlarge upon. (1.) He was confessing sin, and lamenting that; both my sin and the sin of my people Israel. Daniel was a very great and good man, and yet he finds sin of his own to confess before God, and is ready to confess it. For there is not a just man upon earth, that doeth good, and sinneth not; nor that sins, and repenteth not; St. John puts himself into the number of those who deceive themselves, if they say that they have no sin, and who therefore confess their sins, 1 John i. 8. Good men find it an ease to their consciences, to pour out their complaints before the Lord against themselves; and that is confessing sin. He also confessed the sin of his people, and bewailed that. Those who are heartfeltly concerned for the glory of God, the welfare of the church, and the souls of men, will mourn for the sins of others as well as for their own. (2.) He was making supplication before the Lord his God, and presenting it to him as an intercessor for Israel; and in this prayer his concern was for the holy mountain of my God, my Messiah, my Messiah, the desolation of the sanctuary lay nearer his heart than those of the city and the land; and the repair of that, and the setting up of the public worship of the God of Israel again, were what he had in view, in the deliverance he was preparing for, more than the reestablishment of their civil interests. Now while Daniel was thus employed, [1.] He had a grant made of the mercy he prayed for. Note, God is very ready to hear prayer, and to give an answer of peace. Now was fulfilled what God had spoken, (Isa. lxv. 24.) While they are yet speaking, I will hear. Daniel grew very fervent in prayer, and his affections were very strong, v. 18, 19. And while he was speaking with such fervour and ardency, the angel came to him with a gracious answer. God is most pleased with lively devotions. We cannot now expect that God should send us answers to our prayer by anges', but if we pray with fervency for that which God has promised, we may by faith take the promise as an immediate answer to the prayer; for he is faithful that has promised. [2.] He had a discovery made him of a far greater and more glorious redemption, which God would work out for his church in the latter day. Note. Those that would be brought acquainted with Christ and his grace, must be much in prayer.

2. It was about the time of the evening oblation, v. 21. The altar was in ruins, and there was no oblation offered upon it, but, it should seem, the Jews in their captivity were daily thoughtful of the time when it should have been offered, and at that hour were ready to weep at the remembrance of it, and desired and hoped that their prayer should be set forth before God as incense, and the little that they could, to make their prayers, and their hearts with their hands, should be acceptable in his sight as the evening sacrifice, Ps. exli. 2. The evening oblation was a type of the great sacrifice which Christ was to offer in the evening of the world, and it was in the virtue of that sacrifice, that Daniel's prayer was accepted, when he prayed for the Lord's sake, and for the sake of that, this glorious discovery of revelation to man; and the Lamb opened the seals in the virtue of his own blood.

11. The messenger by whom this answer was sent. It was not given him in a dream, or by a voice from heaven, but, for the greater certainty and solemnity of it, an angel was sent on purpose, appearing in a human shape, to give this answer to Daniel. Observe,

1. Who this angel, or messenger, was; it was the man Gabriel. If Michael the archangel be, as many suppose, no other than Jesus Christ, this Gabriel is the only created angel that is named in scripture. Gabriel signifies, the mighty one of God; for the angels are great in power and might, 2 Pct. ii. 11. It was he whom I had seen in the vision at the beginning. Daniel heard him called by his name, and thence learned it; (Dan. vii. 16,) and then the Lord told the prophet, see how he observed him so carefully, that now he knew him again, knew him to be the same that he had seen at the beginning, and, being somewhat better acquainted with him, was now not so terrified at the sight of him as he had been at first. When this angel said to Zacharias, I am Gabriel, (Luke i. 19,) he intended thereby to put him in mind of this notice which he had given to Daniel of the Messiah's coming, when it was at a distance, for the confirming of his faith in the notice he was then about to give of it as at the door.

2. The instructions which this messenger received from the Father of lights to whom Daniel prayed; (v. 23.) At the beginning of thy supplications, the word, the commandment, came forth from God. Note, the word of God is the Father's messenger, the counsel of God, which they were desirous to look into; and orders given to Gabriel to go immediately, and bring the notice of it to Daniel. By this it appears that it was not anything which Daniel said that moved God, for the answer was given as he began to pray; but God was well pleased with his serious, solemn address to the duty, and, in token of that, sent him this gracious message. Or, perhaps it was at the beginning of Daniel's supplications, that Cyrus's word, or commandment, went forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, that going forth spoken of, v. 25. The thing is done this very day; the proclamation of liberty to the Jews is signed this morning, just then when thou wast praying for it; and now, at the close of this fast-day, Daniel has notice of it; as, at the charge of the commandment, the public-trumpet sounded to proclaim liberty.

3. The haste he made to deliver his message; He was caused to fly swiftly, v. 21. Angels are winged messengers, quick in their motions, and delays not to execute the orders they receive; they run and return like a flash of lightning, Ezek. l. 14. But, it should seem, sometimes they are more expeditious than this; for God was, and make a quicker despatch; as here, the angel was caused to fly swiftly, he was ordered, and he was enabled, to fly swiftly; angels do their work in obedience to divine command, and in dependence upon divine strength. Though they excel in wisdom, they fly swifter or slower as God directs; and though they excel in power, they fly but as God causes them to fly. Angels themselves are to us what he makes them to be; they are his ministers, and do his pleasure. Ps. cxi. 21.

4. The prefaces, or introductions, to his message. (1. He touched him, (v. 21.) as before, (ch. xii. 18,) not in his usual form, though it is now in the 14th, but to give him a hint to break off his prayer, and to attend to that which he has to say in answer to it. Note, In order to the keeping up of our communion with God, we must not only be forward to speak to God, but as forward to hear what he has to say to us; when we have prayed, we must look up, must look after our prayers, must set ourselves upon our watch-towers, and keep our eyes open, and our ears awake.

(2.) He talked familiarly with him, as one friend talks with another, that his terror might not make him afraid. He informed him on what errand he came, that he was sent from heaven on purpose with a kind message to him; I am come to show thee, (v. 23,) to tell thee that which thou didst not know before. He had showed him the troubles of the church under Antichrist, and the period of those troubles, (ch. viii. 19,) but now he has greater things to show him; for he that is faithful in a little, shall be intrusted with more; Nay, I am now come forth to give thee skill and understanding, (v. 22,) not only to show thee these things, but to make thee understand them.

(3.) He assures him that he was a favourite of God, that he had a high character, and that he had this intelligence sent him, and he must take it for a favour; I am come to show thee, for thou art greatly beloved. Thou art a man of great desires; acceptable to God, and whom he has a favour for. Note, Though God loves all his children, yet there are some that are more than the rest greatly beloved. Christ had one disciple that lay in his bosom; and that beloved disciple was he that was intrusted with the prophecies of the New Testament, as Daniel was with those of the Old. For what greater token can there be of God's favour to any man than for the secrets of the Lord to be with him? Abraham is the friend of God; and therefore, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do? Gen. xxviii. 17. Note, Those that reckon themselves greatly beloved of God, to whom, and in whom, he reveals his Son. The more blessed the observer of these great secrets, the more blessed the observer of the Virgin Mary, was much the same with this which he here gives to Daniel, as if he designed to put her in mind of it; Thou art highly favoured, as Daniel, greatly beloved.

(4.) He demands his serious attention to the dis covery he was now about to make him: Therefor understand the matter, and consider the vision, v. 23. It intimates that it was a thing well worthy of his regard, above any of the visions he had been before favoured with. Note, Those who would understand the things of God, must consider them, must apply their minds to them, ponder upon them, and compare spiritual things with spiritual. The reason why we are so much in the dark concerning the revealed will of God, and mistake concerning it, is want of consideration. This vision both requires and deserves consideration.

III. The message itself; it was delivered with great solemnity, received, no doubt, with great attention, and recorded with great exactness; but in it, as is usual in prophecies, there are things dark, and hard to be understood. Daniel, who understood by the book of the prophet Jeremiah the expiration of the seventy years of the captivity, is now enabled by this prophecy to shew the church another more glorious release, which that was but a shadow of, at the end of another seventy, or years, but weeks of years. He prayed over that prophecy, and received this in answer to that prayer. He had prayed for his people, and the holy city, that they might be released, that it might be rebuilt; but God answers him above what he was able to ask or think. God not only grants, but ouudes, the desires of them that fear him, Ps. xxi. 4.

1. The times here determined are somewhat hard to understand. In general, it is seventy weeks, seventy times seven years, which makes just 490 years; the great affairs that are yet to come concern the people of Israel, and the city of Jerusalem, will lie within the compass of these years. These years are thus described by weeks, (1.) In conformity to the prophetic style, which is, for the most part, obscure, and out of the common road of speaking, that the thing foretold might not be too obvious. (2.) To put an honour upon the division of time into weeks, which is made purely by the sabbath-day, and to signify that that should be perpetual. (5.) With reference to the seventy years of the captivity; as they had been so long kept out of the possession of their own land, so being now restored to it, they should seven times as long be kept in the possession of it. So much more does God delight in showing mercy than in punishing. The land had enjoyed its sabbaths, in a melancholy sense, seventy years, Lev. xxvii. 34. But now the people of the Lord shall, in a comfortable sense, enjoy their sabbaths seven times seventy years, and in them seventy sabbatical years, which make ten jubilees. Such proportions are there in the decree, because it was the wisdom of him who has determined the times before appointed.

The difficulties that arise about these seventy weeks, are,

[1.] Concerning the time when they commence, and whence they are to be reckoned. They are here determined by God himself, viz. by the commandment to restore and build Jerusalem, v. 25. I should most incline to understand this of the edict of Cyrus, mentioned, Ezra i. 1. for by it the people were restored; and though express mention be not made there of the building of Jerusalem, yet that is supposed in the building of the temple, and was foretold to be done by Cyrus; (Isa. xlv. 28.) He shall say to Jerusalem, Thou shalt be built. That was, both in prophecy and in history, the most famous decree for the building of Jerusalem; nay, it should seem, this going forth of the commandment, (which may as well be meant of God's command concerning it as of Cyrus's,) is the same with that going forth of the commandment mentioned, v. 23. which was at the beginning of Daniel's supplications. Now it looks very graceful, that the seventy weeks should begin immediately upon the expiration of the seventy years. And there is nothing to be objected against this, but that by this reckoning the Persian monarchy, from the taking of Babylon by Cyrus to Alexander's conquest of Darius, lasted about 130 years; whereas by the particular account given of the reigns of the Persian emperors, it is certain that they were divided into two periods, and by others, Xenophon, and others reckon. Those who fix it to that first edict, set aside these computations of the heathen historians as uncertain and not to be relied upon. But others, willing to reconcile them, begin the 490 years, not at the edict of Cyrus, (Ezra i. 1.) but at the second edict for the building of Jerusalem, issued out by Darius Nabor above 30 years after the first, mentioned, Ezra vi. Others fix it on the seventh year of Artaxerxes Mencen, who sent Ezza with a commission, Ezra vii. 8. - 12. The learned Mr. Poole, in his Latin Synopsis, has a vast and most elaborate collection of what has been said, pro and con, concerning the different beginnings of these weeks, with which the learned may entertain themselves.

[2.] Concerning the period of them; and here likewise interpreters are not agreed. Some make them to end at the death of Christ, and think the express words of this famous prophecy will warrant us to conclude that from this very hour when Gabriel spake to Daniel, at the time of the evening oblation, to the hour when Christ died, which was towards evening too, it was exactly 490 years; and I am willing enough to be of that opinion. But others think, because it is said that in the midst of the week, the last of the seventy weeks, he shall cause the sacrifice and the oblation to cease, they end three years and a half after the death of Christ, when, the Jews having rejected the gospel, the apostles turned to the Gentiles. But they who make them to end precisely at the death of Christ, read it thus: He shall make strong the testament to the many; the last seven, or the last week, yea, half that seven, or half that week, (namely, the latter half, the three years and a half, which Christ spent in his public ministry,) shall bring to an end sacrifice and oblation. Others make these 490 years to end with the destruction of Jerusalem, about thirty-seven years after the death of Christ; because these seventy weeks are said to be determined upon the people of the Jews, and the holy city; and much is said concerning the destruction of the city, and the sanctuary.

[3.] Concerning the division of them into seven weeks, and sixty-two weeks, and one week; and the reason of this is as hard to account for as any thing else. In the visible state of affairs, the temple and city were built; and in the last single week, Christ preached his gospel, by which the Jewish economy was taken down, and the foundations laid of the gospel city and temple, which were to be built upon the ruins of the former.

But, whatever uncertainty we may labour under concerning the exact fixing of these times, there is enough of certainty to show us the ends of determining them. First, It did serve then to raise and support the expectations of believers. There were general promises of the coming of the Messiah made to the patriarchs; the preceding prophets had often spoken of him, as one that should come, but never was the time fixed for his coming until now. And though there might be so much doubt concerning the date, and yet we are not reckoning that they could not ascertain the time just to a year, yet by the light of this prophecy they were directed about what time to expect him. And we find, accordingly, that when Christ came, he was generally looked for, as the Consonation of Israel, and redemption in Jerusalem by him, Luke ii. 25, 38. It was commonly held, there would not be a kingdom of God should immediately appear; (Luke xix. 11.) and some think this was it that brought a more than ordinary concourse of people to Jerusalem, Acts ii. 5. Secondly, It does serve still to refute and silence the expectations of unbelievers, who will not own that Jesus is he who should come, but still look for another; this prediction silenced them, and answered them in the time. For the seventy weeks from which of the commandments to build Jerusalem we please, it is certain that they are expired above 1500 years ago; so that the Jews are for ever without excuse, who will not own that the Messiah is come, when they are gone so far beyond their utmost reckoning for his coming. But by this we are confirmed in our belief of the Messiah's being come, and the time is now. For this came just at the time prefixed, a time worthy to be had in everlasting remembrance.

2. The events here foretold are more plain, and easy to be understood, at least to us now. Observe what is here foretold, (1.) Concerning the return of the Jews now speedily to their own land, and their settlement again there, which was the thing that Daniel now principally prayed for; and yet it is but brieilly touched upon here in the answer to his prayer. Let this be a comfort to the pious Jews, that a commandment shall go forth to restore and to build Jerusalem, and that she shall not be in vain; for though the times will be very troublous, and this good work will meet with great opposition, yet it shall be carried on, and brought to perfection at last; the street shall be built again, as spacious and splendid as ever it was; and the walls even in troublous times. Note, As long as we are here in this world, we must expect both enemies from without, and their own hearts from within likewise. And even in such days, when we have joyful times, we must rejoice with trembling; it is but a gleam, it is but a fluid interval of peace and prosperity; the clouds will return after the rain; when the Jews are restored in triumph to their own land, yet there they must expect troublous times, and prepare for them. But this is our comfort, that God will carry on his own work, will build up his Jerusalem, will beautify it, will fortify it, even in troublous times: may the troublousness of these times may by the grace of God contribute to the advancement of the church. The more it is afflicted, the more it multiplies.

(2.) Concerning the Messiah and his undertaking. The carnal Jews looked for a Messiah that should deliver them from the Roman yoke, and give them temporal power and wealth; whereas they were told, that the Messiah should come, to be another errand, purely spiritual, and upon the account of which he should be the more welcome.

[1.] Christ came to take away sin, and to abolish that. Sin had made a quarrel between God and man, had alienated man from God, and provoked God against man; that was it that put dissonance up in God, and by might misery upon mankind, that was the great mischief-maker. That he would do God a real service, and man a real kindness, must be the destruction of that. Christ undertakes to be so, and for this purpose he is manifested to destroy the works of the devil. He does not say, to finish your transgressions and your sins, but transgression and sin in general, for he is the Propitiation not only for our sins, that are Jews, but for the sins of the whole world. He came, First, To finish transgression; to restrain it; (so some;) to break the power of it, to bruise the head of that serpent that had done so much mischief; to take away the usurped dominion of that tyrant, and to set up a kingdom of holiness and love in the hearts of men, upon the ruins of Satan’s kingdom there; that, where sin and death had reigned, righteousness and life through grace now reigned; And, Second, To make the sin, which, in one sense, the Messiah has now had its death’s wound given it; like Simon’s, Let me die with the Philosophers, Antinomian in vulture fonte—He infects the wound, and dies. Secondly, To make an end of sin, to abolish it, that it may not rise up in judgment against us, to obtain the pardon of it, that it may not be our ruin; to seal up sin, (so the margin reads it,) that they may not appear or break out against us, to accuse and condemn us; and, Thirdly, To make a bottomless pit for it, into which, that he set a seal upon him, Rev. xx. 3. When sin is pardoned, it is sought for, and not found, as that which is sealed up. Thirdly, To make reconciliation for iniquity, as by a sacrifice to justify the justice of God, and so to make peace, and bring God and man together; not only as an undertaking by the Son of God, who only brings the conflicting parties to go on, but that is a duty, as well as a comfort, but as a Surety, or Undertaker, for us. He is not only the Peace-Maker, but the Peace. He is the Atonement.

[2.] He came to bring in an everlasting righteousness. God might justly have made an end of the sin by making an end of the sinner; but Christ found out another way, and so made an end of sin as to save the sinner from it, by providing a righteousness for him. We are all guilty before God, and shall be condemned as guilty, if we have not a righteousness to plead, and Christ has provided us a pleon; the merit of his sacrifice is our righteousness; with this we answer all the demands of the law; Christ has died, yea, rather, is risen again. Thus Christ is the Lord our Righteousness, for he is made of God to be Righteousness, that we might be made the righteousness of God in him. But we shall apply this to ourselves, and plead it with God, and our faith is imputed to us for righteousness, Rom. iv. 3, 5.

This is an everlasting righteousness for Christ, who is our Righteousness, and the Prince of our peace is the everlasting Father. It was from everlasting in the counsels of it, and will be to everlasting in the consequences of it. The application of it was from the beginning, for Christ was the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; and will be to the end, for he is able to save to the uttermost. It is of everlasting virtue, (Heb. x. 12.) it is the rock that follows us to Canaan.

[3.] He came to seal up the vision and prophecy, all the prophetic visions of the Old Testament, which had reference to the Messiah, he sealed them up, he accomplished them, proved it true, answered to them to a tittle; all things that were written in the law, the prophets, and the psalms, concerning the Messiah, were fulfilled in him; thus he confirmed the truth of them as well as his own mission. He sealed them up, he put an end to that method of God’s discovering his mind and will, and took another course by completing the scripture-canons in the New Testament, which is the more complete and prophecy than that by vision, 2 Pet. i. 19. Heb. i. 1.

[4.] He came to anoint the Most Holy, himself the Holy One who was anointed, that is, appointed to his work, and qualified for it by the Holy Ghost, that oil of gladness which he received without measure above his fellows; or, to anoint the church, his spiritual temple, or holy place, to sanctify and cleanse it, and appropriate it to himself; (Eph. v. 26.) or, to consecrate for us a new and living way into the holiest, by his own blood, (Heb. x. 26.) as the sanctuary was anointed, Exod. xxx. 25, &c. He is called Messiah, (v. 25, 26.) which signifies Christ; Anointed, (John i. 41.) because he received the uction, both for himself and for all that are his.

[5.] In order to all this, the Messiah must be cut off, must die a violent death, and so be cut off from the land of the living, as was foretold, Isa. lii. 8. Hence, when Paul preaches the death of Christ, he says that he preached nothing but what the prophets said should come, Acts xxvi. 22, 23. And thus it behoved Christ to suffer. He must be cut off, but not for himself; not for any of his own only, but as Caiphas prophesied, he must die for the people and for the sins of the whole nation; for my advantage of his own; the glory he purchased for himself was no more than the glory he had before, John xvii. 4, 5. No, it was to atone for our sins, and to purchase life for us, that he was cut off.

[6.] He must confirm the covenant with many. He shall introduce a new covenant between God and man, a covenant of grace; since the Decalogue was confirmed by a covenant of innocence. This covenant he shall confirm by his doctrine and miracles, by his death and resurrection, by the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord’s Supper, which are the seals of the New Testament, assuring us that God is willing to accept of us upon gospel-terms. His death made his testament of force, and enabled us to claim what is bequeathed by it. He confirmed it to the many, the common people; the poor were evangelized, as the rulers and rich were confounded. Or, he confirmed it with many, with the Gentile world. The New Testament was not (like the Old) confined to the Jewish church, but was committed to all nations; Christ gave his life a ransom for many.

[7.] He must cause the sacrifice and oblation to cease; by offering himself a Sacrifice once for all. He ceases all the peace-offerings to cease, when he has made peace by the blood of his cross, and by it confirmed the covenant of peace and reconciliation. By the preaching of his gospel to the world, with which the apostles were intrusted, he took men off from expecting remission by the blood of bulls and goats, and so caused the sacrifice and oblation to cease.

The apostle to the Hebrews shows what a better priesthood, altar, and sacrifice, we have now than they had under the law, as a reason why we should hold fast our profession.

(3.) Concerning the final destruction of Jerusalem, and of the Jewish church and nation; and this follows immediately upon the cutting off of the Messiah, and of those who were intrusted with his salvation. If God design to destroy all the children of God among the Jews, he will destroy even the Jews themselves; and thou hast observed the event. The Jews would not be persuaded to quit it, still they kept it up with more zeal than ever, they would hear no talk of parting with it; they stoned Stephen (the first Christian martyr) for saying that Jesus should change the customs which Moses delivered them; (Acts vi. 14,) so that there was no way to abolish the Mosaic economy but by destroying the temple, and the holy city, and the Levitical priest, and that whole nation which so incorruptibly dotted on them; this was effectually done in less than forty years after the death of Christ, and it was a desolation that could never be repaired to this day. And this is it which is here largely foretold, that the Jews who returned out of captivity might not be overmuch lifted up with the rebuilding of their city and temple, because in process of time they would be brought into captivity again, and for seventeen years only, but might rather rejoice in hope of the coming of the Messiah, and the setting up of his spiritual kingdom in the world, which should never be destroyed. Now, [1.] It is here foretold that the people of the prince that shall come, shall be the instruments of this destruction, that is, the Roman armies, belonging to a monarchy yet to come. Christ is the prince that shall come, and they are employed by him in this service; they are his armies; (Matt. xxii. 7,) or, the Gentiles, who, though now strangers, shall become the people of the Messiah, shall destroy the Jews. [2.] That the destruction shall be by war, and the end of that war should be this desolation determined. The wars of the Jews with the Romans were by their own obstinacy made very bloody and destructive; and they issued in utter extermination of that people. [3.] That the city and sanctuary should in a particular manner be destroyed, and fall quite waste. Thus, the Roman general would fain have saved the temple, but his soldiers were so enraged against the Jews, that he could not restrain them from burning it to the ground, that the prophecy might be fulfilled. [4.] That all the resistance that was made to this desolation should be in vain; The end of it shall be with a flood. It shall be a deluge of destruction, like that which swept away the old world, and which there will be no making head against. [5.] That here the sacrifice and oblation should be made to cease. And it must needs cease, when the family of the priests was so extirpated, and the genealogies of it were so confounded, that (they say) there is no man in the world that can prove himself of the seed of Aaron. [6.] That there should be an overspreading of abominations, a general corruption of the Jewish nation; and an abounding of iniquity among them, for which it should be made desolate, 1 Thess. v. 16. Or, it is rather to be understood of the armies of the Romans, which were abominable to the Jews, they could not endure them; which overspread the nation, and by which it was made desolate. For these are the words which Christ refers to, Matth. xxiv. 15. When ye shall see the abomination of desolation, spoken of by Daniel, stand in the holy place, then let them which be in Judea flee, which is by beasts. xxvi. When ye shall see Jerusalem compassed with armies, then flee. [7.] That the desolation should be total and final; He shall make it desolate, even until the consummation; he shall make it completely desolate. It is a desolation determined, and it will be accomplished to the utmost. And when it was made desolate, it should seem, there is something in the power of God to destroy more upon the earth than the desolation; (v. 27,) and what should that be but the spirit of slumber, (Rom. xi. 8, 25,) that blindness which is happened to Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles shall come in? And then all Israel shall be saved.

CHAP. X.

This chapter and the two next (which conclude this book) make up one entire vision and prophecy, which was communicated to Daniel for the use of the church. If we confine the predictions, which are many, to the times of their delivery, and confound our prophecy with signs and figures, as before, (ch. vii. and viii.) but by express words; and this was about two years after the vision in the vision in the following chapter. Daniel prayed daily, but had not a vision only now; and then in this chapter we have some things introductory to the prophecy in the eleventh chapter, the particular predictions, and ch. xii. the conclusion of it. This chapter shows us, 1. Daniel's solemn fasting and humiliation, before he had this vision, v. 1. 3. 11. A glorious appearance of the Son of God to him, and the deep impression it made upon him, v. 4. 9. 11. The encouragement that was given him to expect such a discovery as this, that he would find it satisfactory and useful both to others and to himself; and that he should be enabled both to understand the meaning of this discovery, though difficult, and to hear up under the lustre of it, though dazzling and dreadful, v. 10. 21.

1. In the third year of Cyrus king of Persia, a thing was revealed unto Daniel, whose name was called Belteshazzar; and the thing was true, but the time appointed was long: and he understood the thing, and had understanding of the vision. 2. In those days I Daniel was mourning three full weeks. 3. I ate no pleasant bread, neither came flesh nor wine in my mouth, neither did I anoint myself at all, till three whole weeks were fulfilled. 4. And in the four and twentieth day of the first month, as I was by the side of the great river, which is Hiddekel: 5. Then I lifted up mine eyes, and looked, and, behold, a certain man clothed in linen, whose loins were girted with fine gold of Uphaz: 6. His body also was like the beryl, and his face as the appearance of lightning, and his eyes as lamps of fire, and his arms and his feet like in colour to polished brass, and the voice of his words like the voice of a multitude. 7. And I Daniel alone saw the vision: for the men that were with me saw not the vision; but a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves. 3. Therefore I was left alone, and saw this great vision,
and there remained no strength in me: for my comeliness was turned in me into corrupption, and I retained no strength. 9. Yet heard I the voice of his words: and when I heard the voice of his words, then was I in a deep sleep on my face, and my face toward the ground.

This vision is dated in the third year of Cyrus,
thatis,of his reign, after the conquest of Babylon,
his third year since Daniel became acquainted with him, and is a subject to him.

Here is, 1. A general idea of this prophecy; (v. 1.)
The thing was true; every word of God is so; it was true that Daniel had such a vision, and that such and such things were said, this he solemnly attests upon the word of a prophet; Eter but sus-ratus est verifiable—He was prepared to verify it;
and if it was a word spoken from heaven, no doUBt it is steadfast, and may be depended upon.

But the time appointed was long; as long as to the end of the reign of Antiochus, which was 300 years, a long time indeed, when it is looked upon as to come. Nay, and because it is usual with the proyets to glance at things spiritual and eternal, there is that in this prophecy, which looks in type as far forward as to the end of the world, and the resurrection of the dead; and then he might well say,
The time appointed was long; it was, however,
made as plain to him as if it had been a history rather than a prophecy; he understood the thing; so distinctly was it delivered to him, and received by him, that he could say he had understanding of the vision; it did not so much operate upon his fancy as upon his understanding.

2. An account of Daniel's mortification of himself before he had this vision; not in expectation of it,
no, when he prayed that solemn prayer, ch. ix.
does it appear that he had any expectation of the vision in answer to it; but purely from a principle of devotion, and pure sympathy with the afflicted people of God. He was mortaining full three weeks,
(v. 2.) for his own sins, and the sins of his people, and their sorrows. Some think that the particular occasion of his mortification was, the slothfulness and indifference of many of the Jews, who, though they had liberty to return to their own land, continued
still in the land of their captivity, not knowing how to use the privileges and liberties they had; and it troubled him the more, because they that did so justified themselves by the example of Daniel,
though they had not that reason to stay behind which he had. Others think that it was because he heard of the obstruction given to the building of the temple by the enemies of the Jews, who hired counselors against them, to frustrate their purpose,
(Eze. iv. 4, 5.) all the days of Cyrus, and hindered their point from his son Cambyses, or Artaxerxes, who governed while Cyrus was absent in the Scythian war. Note, Good men cannot but mourn to see how slowly the work of God goes on in the world, and what opposition it meets with; how weak its friends are, and how active its enemies. During the days of Daniel's mortifying, he ate no pleasant bread; he could not live without meat, but he ate little, and very sparingly, and mortified himself in the quality, as well as the quantity, of what he ate,
which may truly be reckoned fasting, and a token of humiliation and sorrow. He did not eat the flesh bread, nor drink the wine, nor appointment himself, for these three weeks' time, v. 3. Though he was now a very old man, and might plead that the decay of his nervous bodily frame, and what was more, that when he was a very great man, and might plead that, being used to dainty meats, he could not be without them,
it would prejudice his health if he were, yet, when it was both to testify and to assist his devotion, he could thus deny himself; be it noted, to the shame
of many young ordinary people who cannot forsake themselves thus to deny themselves.

3. A description of that glorious Person whom Daniel saw in vision; which, it is generally agreed,
could be no other than Christ himself, the eternal Word; He was by the side of the river Hiddekel,
(v. 4.) probably walking there, not for diversion,
but devotion and contemplation, as Isaac walked in the field, to meditate; and, being a person of distinction, he had his servants attending him at some distance in the field; and, he being alone, he was one alone, a certain Man, even the Man Christ Jesus; it must be he, for he appears in the same resemblance wherein he appeared to St. John in the isle of Patmos, Rev. i. 13.—15. His dress was priestly, for he is the High Priest of our profession, clothed in linen, as the High Priest himself was on the day of atonement, that great day; his loins were tied with a girdle, and girded about his loins with a golden girdle, of the finest gold, that of Uphaz, for every thing about Christ is the best in its kind. The girding of the loins denotes his ready and diligent application to his work, as his Father's Servant in the business of our redemption. His shape was amiable, his body like the beryl, a precious stone of a sky-colour; his countenance was beautiful, and enough to strike a terror on the behold-ers, for his face was as the appearance of lightning,
which dazzles the eyes, both frightens and threatens; his eyes were bright and sparkling, as lamps
fire; his arms and feet shone like polished brass,
v. 6. His voice was loud, and strong, and very piercing, like the voice of a multitude. The Vox Dei—Voice of God, can overpower the Vox populi Voice of the people. They that hear him will appear, and it should engage us, (1.) To think highly and honourably of him. Now consider how great this man is, and in all things let him have the pre-eminence. (2.) To admire his condescension for us and our salvation. Over all this splendour he drew a veil, when he took upon him the form of a servant, and emptied himself.

3. That he was determined and persuaded that this appearance had upon Daniel and his attendants, and the terror
that it struck upon him and them.

(1.) His attendants saw not the vision, it was not fit that they should be honoured with the sight of it;
there is a divine revelation vouchsafed to all, from converse with which none are excluded, who do not exclude themselves; but such a vision must be showered down on one peculiarly chosen for his companions were aware of the light, but saw no man, Acts i. 7.—xxii. 9. Note, It is the honour of those who are beloved of God, that what is hid from others is known to them. Christ manifests himself to them, but not to the world, John xiv. 22.
But though they saw not the vision, they were seized with an unaccountable trembling, either from the voice they heard, or from some strange conclusion
of or vibration, of the air they felt, so it was, that a great quaking fell upon them, so that they fled to hide themselves, probably among the willows that grew by the river's side. Note, Many have a spirit of bondage to fear, who never receive a spirit of adoption, to whom Christ has been, and will be never otherwise than, a Terror. Now the fright that Daniel's attendants were in, is a confirmation of the truth of the vision; it could not be Daniel's fancy, or the product of a heated imagination of his own, for it had a real, powerful, and strange effect upon those about him.

(2.) He himself saw it, and saw it alone, but he was not able to bear the sight of it. It not only dazzled his eyes, but also alarmed him, and for the first time he knew the deep and tender strength in him, v. 8. He said, as Moses himself, I exceedingly fear and quake.
His spirits were all so employed, either in an intense speculation of the glory of this vision, or in the fortifying of his heart against the terror of it, that his body was left to a manner lifeless and spiritless;
he had no vigour in him, and was but one remove from a dead carcass; he looked as pale as death,
his colour was gone, and his comeliness in him was turned into corruption, and he retained no strength.
Note, The greatest and best of men cannot bear the immediate discoveries of the divine glory; no man can see it and live, it is next to death to see a glance of it, as Daniel here; but glorified saints, see Christ as he is, and can bear it. Though Daniel was thus dispirited with the vision of Christ, yet he heard the voice of his words, and knew what he said. Note, We must take heed lest our reverence of God's glory by which we should be awakened to hear his voice, both in his word and in his providence, should degenerate into such a dread of him as will disable or indispose us to hear what he says, so that when the vision of Christ terrified Daniel, the voice of his words soon pacified and composed him, silenced his fear, and laid him to sleep in a holy security and serenity of mind; When I heard the voice of his words, I fell into a slumber, a sweet slumber, on my face, and my face toward the ground. When he saw the vision, he threw himself prostrate into a posture of prayer, and as he now lay prostrate, he was not as careless of what he heard and saw, but charmed with it. Note, How dreadful soever Christ may appear to those who are under convictions of sin, and in terror by reason of it, there is enough in his word to quiet their spirits, and make them easy, if they will but attend to it, and apply it.

10. And, behold, a hand touched me, which set me upon my knees and upon the palms of my hands: 11. And he said unto me, O Daniel, a man greatly beloved, understand the words that I speak unto thee, and stand upright: for unto thee am I now sent. And when he had spoken this word unto me, I stood trembling. 12. Then said he unto me, Fear not, Daniel; for from the first day that thou didst set thy heart to understand, and to chasten thyself before thy God, thy words were heard, and I am come to thy words. 13. But the prince of the kingdom of Persia withstood me one and twenty days: but, lo, Michael, one of the chief princes, came to help me; and I remained there with the kings of Persia. 14. Now I am come to make thee understand what shall befall thy people in the latter days: for yet the vision is for many days.
15. And when he had spoken such words unto me, I set my face toward the ground, and I became dumb. 16. And, behold, one like the similitude of the sons of men touched my lips: then I opened my mouth and spake, and said unto him that stood before me, O my lord, by the vision my sorrows are turned upon me, and I have retained no strength. 17. For how can the servant of this my lord talk with this my lord? for as for me, straightway there remained no strength in me, neither is there breath left in me. 18. Then there came came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me, 19. And said, O man greatly beloved,
fear not; peace be unto thee: be strong, yea,
be strong. And when he had spoken unto me, I was strengthened, and said, Let my lord speak; for thou hast strengthened me.
20. Then said he, Knowest thou wherefore
I come unto thee? and now will I return to fight with the prince of Persia: and when I am gone forth, lo, the prince of Grecia shall come. 21. But I will shew thee that which is noted in the scripture of truth: and there is none that holdeth with me in these things, but Michael your prince.

Much ado here is to bring Daniel to be able to bear what Christ has to say to him; still we have him in a fright, hardly and very slowly recovering himself; but is still answered and supported with good words and comforting words. Let us see how Daniel is by degrees brought to himself and gather up the several passages that are to the same purpose.

1. Daniel is in a great consternation, and finds it very difficult to get clear of it. The hand that touched him, set him at first upon his knees, and the palms of his hands, v. 10. Note, Strength and comfort commonly come by degrees to those that have been and do suffer; that the enemy may, first helped up a little, and then more. After two days he will revive us, and then the third day he will raise us up. And we must not despise the day of small things, but be thankful for the beginnings of mercy. Afterward he is helped up, but he stands trembling, (v. 11.) for fear lest he fall again. Note Before God gives strength and power unto his people, he makes them sensible of their own weakness.
I trembled in myself, that I might rest in the day
of trouble, Hab. iii. 16.

But when, afterward, Daniel recovered so much strength in his limbs, that he could stand steady, yet he tells us, (v. 13.) that he set his face toward the ground, and became dumb; he was as a man stunned, he knew not what to say, struck with admiration and fear, and is too bold to enter into discourse with one so far above him; he kept silence,
yea, even from good, till he had recollected himself a little. Well, at length he recovered, not only the use of his feet, but the use of his tongue; and when he opened his mouth, (v. 16.) that which he had ready was, to excuse his having been so long silent, for really he durst not speak, he could not speak; "O my lord," (so, in great humility, this prophet calls the angel, though the angels, in great
Nothing is more likely, nothing more effectual, to revive the drooping spirits of the saints than to be assured of God's love to them. These are greatly beloved indeed, whom God loves; and it is comfort enough to know that the angels are devoted by him to their service.

3. He silenced his fears, and encouraged his hopes with good words and comfortable words. He said unto him, Fear not, Daniel, v. 12. And again, (v. 19.) O man greatly beloved, fear not, peace be unto thee; be strong, yea, be strong. Never did any tender mother quiet her child, when any thing had grieved or frightened it, with more compassion and affection than the angel here spake to Daniel. Those that are beloved of God, have no reason to be afraid of any evil; peace is to them; God himself speaks peace to them; and they ought, upon the warrant of that, to speak peace to themselves; and that peace, that joy of the Lord, will be their strength. Will God plead against us with his great power, will he take the advantage against us of our being overcome by his terror? No, but he will put strength into us, Jer xxiii. 6. So be he did into Daniel here, when, by reason of the lustre of the vision, no strength of his own remained in him; and he acknowledges it, (v. 19.) When he had spoken to me, I was strengthened.

Note, Note, by God's word puts life, and strength, and spirit into his people; for if he says, Be strong, power goes along with the word. And now that Daniel has experienced the efficacy of God's word, he is no more afraid for any thing; "Now, let my lord speak, and I can hear it, and I can bear it, and I am ready to do according to it, for thou hast strengthened me." Note, To these that (like Daniel here) have no might, God increases strength, Isa. xl. 29.

And we cannot keep up our communion with God but by strength derived from him; but when he is pleased to put strength into us, we do make a good use of it; as Daniel did in speaking to God, for the advantage of others. Let God enable us to comply with his will, and then, whatever it is, we will stand complete in it. Da quod jubes, et jube quod vis—Give what thou commandest, and then command what thou wilt. 4. He assures him that his fasting and prayers were come up for a memorial before God, as the angel told Cornelius, (Acts x. 4.) Fear not, Daniel, v. 12. It is natural to think that an angel would be afraid of an extraordinary messenger from heaven, as dreading to hear evil tidings thence; but Daniel needs not fear, for he has by his three weeks' humiliation and supplication sent extraordinary messengers to heaven, which he may expect to return with an olive-branch of peace; "From the first day that thou didst set thine heart to understand the words of God, that is to be the rule of thy prayers, and to come to thyself before thy God, that thou mightest put an edge upon thy prayers, thy words were heard," as before, at the beginning of thy supplication, ch. ix. 23. Note, As the entrance of God's word is enlightening to the upright, so the entrance of their prayers is pleasing to him, Ps. cxix. 130. From the first day that we begin to look toward God in all our business, we may be sure that we are in a way of mercy. Thus ready is God to hear prayer. I said, I will confess, and thou forgavest. 5. He tells him that he was sent to him on purpose to bring him a prediction of the future state of the church, as a token of God's accepting his prayers for the church; Knowest thou wherefore I come unto thee? If thou knowest not what excellently thou hast spoken, thou hast been a great deal mistaken in thy interpretation by it. Note, If we rightly understand the meaning of God's dealings with us, and the methods of his providence and grace concerning us, we should be better reconciled to them. I am come for thy words, (v. 12.) to bring thee a gracious answer to thy prayers; thus, when God's praying people call to him, he says, Here I am; (Isa. lvi. 9.) what would you have?
have with me? See the power of prayer, what glorious things it has, in its time, fetched from heaven, what strange discoveries! On what errand did this angel come to the king? And what answer did he come to make the king understand what shall befall the people in the latter days. Daniel was a curious, inquisitive man, that had all his days been searching into secret things, and it would be a great gratification to him to be let into the knowledge of things to come. Daniel had always been concerned for the church, its interests lay much upon his heart, and yet he would find satisfaction to himself if he knew what its state should be, and he would know the better what to pray for as long as he lived. He was now lamenting the difficulties which his people met with in the present day; but that he might not be offended in those, the angel must tell him what greater difficulties are yet before them; and if they be informed, do they only run with the foolish men, how will they contend with wolves? Note, it would abate our resentment of present troubles, to consider that we know not but much greater are before us, which we are concerned to provide for. Daniel must be made to know what shall befall his people in the latter days of the church, after the cessation of prophecy, and when the time drew near for the church to be in much difficulty; therefore many days; the principal things that this vision was intended to give the church the foresight of, would come to pass in the days of Antiochus, near 300 years after this. Now, that which the angel is intrusted to communicate to Daniel, and which Daniel is encouraged to expect from him, is not any curious speculations, moral prognostications, or rational prospects of his own, though he is an angel, but what he has received from the Lord. It was the revelation of Jesus Christ, that the angel gave to St. John, to be delivered to the churches, Rev. i. 1. So here, (v. 21.) I will show thee what is written in the scriptures of truth, what is fixed in the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God. The decree of God is a thing written; it is a scripture which remains, and cannot be altered; what I have written, I have written. As there are scriptures for the revealed will of God, the letters patent which are published to the world, so there are scriptures for the secret will of God, the close rolls which are sealed among his treasures; the book of his decrees, both are scriptures of truth, nothing shall be added to, or taken from, either of them. The secret things belong not to us, and to our children; and we are concerned to study what is written in these scriptures of truth, for they are things which belong to our everlasting peace.

6. He gives him a general account of the adversities of the church's cause, from whom it might be expected that troubles would arise; and of its patrons, under whose protection it might be assured of safety and victory at last. (1.) The kings of the earth are, and will be, its adversaries; for they set themselves against the Lord and his Anointed, Ps. ii. 2. The angel tells Daniel that he was to come to him with a gracious answer to his prayers, but that the prince of the kingdom of Persia opposed him one and twenty days; just as the seer notes that Daniel had been fasting and praying. Cambyses king of Persia had been very busy to embarrass the affairs of the Jews, and to do the mischief he could; and the angel had been all this time employed to counter-work him; so that he had been constrained to defer his visit to Daniel till now, for angels can be but in one place at a time. Or, as Dr. Lightfoot says, This new king of Persia, by hindering the temple, had hindered those good things which the Jews were to have brought forth. The kings and kingdoms of this world were indeed sometimes helpful to the church, but more often they were injurious to it. "When I am gone forth from the kings of Persia, when their monarchy is brought down for their unkindness to the Jews, then the prince of Persia shall come," v. 20. The Grecian monarchs, though they should have been a greater and a better protection to the church, it yet come to be disadvantageous to them; such is the state of the church militant, when it is got clear of one enemy, it has another to encounter; and such a hydra's head is that of the old serpent; when one storm is blown over, it is not long before another rise.

(2.) The God of heaven is, and will be, its Protector, and, under him, the angels of heaven its patrons and guardsians. [1.] Here is the angel Gabriel busy in the service of the church; making his part good in defense of it twenty-one days, against the prince of Persia, and remaining there with the kings of Persia, as counsel, or liege-ambassador, to take care of the affairs of the Jews in that court, and to do them service, v. 13. A threatening which was done for the church by the kings of Persia, (God permitting it,) it is probable that much more mischief would have been done them, and they would have been quite ruined, (witness Haman's plot,) if God had not prevented its by the ministration of angels. Gabriel resolves, when he has dispatched this errand to Daniel, that he will return to fight with the prince of Persia, will continue to oppose him, and will at length humble and bring down that proud monarchy, (v. 20.) though he knows that another as mischievous, even that of Greece, will rise instead of it.

[2.] Here is Michael our Prince, the great Protector of the church, and the Patron of its just but injured cause. The first of the chief princes, v. 13. Some understand it of a created angel, but an archangel of the highest order, 1 Thess. iv. 16. Jude 9. Others think that Michael the archangel is no other than Christ himself, the Angel of the covenant, and the Lord of the angels, whom Daniel saw in a vision, v. 5. He came to help me; (v. 13.) and there is none but he that holds with me in these things, v. 21. Christ is the church's Prince; angels are not, Heb. ii. 5. He presides in the affairs of the church, and effectively provides for its great good. He is said to hold with the angels, for it is he that makes them serviceable to the heirs of salvation; and if he were not on the church's side, its case were bad. But, says David, and so says the church, The Lord takes my part with them that help me, Ps. cxviii. 7. The Lord is with them that uphold my soul, Ps. liv. 4.

CHAP. XI.

The angel Gabriel, in this chapter, performs his promise made to Daniel in the foregoing chapter, that he would show him what should befall his people in the latter days, according to that which was written in the scriptures of faith; very particularly does he inform Daniel of the destruction of the kings of Persia and Greece, and the affairs of their kingdoms, especially the mischief which Antiochus Epiphanes did in his time to the church, which was foretold before, ch. vii. 12. 13. 14. He is, I. A brief prediction of the setting up of the Gentile monarchies, and the ruins of the Persian monarchy, which was now newly begun, v. 1-4. II. A prediction of the affairs of the two kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, with reference to each other, and the rise of Antiochus Epiphanes, and his actions and successes, v. 21... 29. IV. Of the great mischief that he should do to the Jewish nation and religion, and his contempt of all religion, v. 30... 38. V. Of his fall and ruin at last, when he is in the heat of his pursuit, v. 40... 45.
1. Also I, in the first year of Darius the Mede, even I, stood to confirm and to strengthen him. And now will I shew thee the truth. Behold, there shall stand up yet three kings in Persia; and by his strength through his riches he shall stir up all against the realm of Greece. And a mighty king shall stand up, that shall rule with great dominion, and do according to his will. And when he shall stand up, his kingdom shall be broken, and shall be divided toward the four winds of heaven; and not to his posterity, nor according to his dominion which he ruled: for his kingdom shall be plucked up, even for others besides those.

Here, 1. The angel Gabriel lets Daniel know the good service he had done to the Jewish nation; (v. 1.) "In the first year of Darius the Mede, who destroyed Babylon, and released the Jews out of that house of bondage, I stood a strength and fortress to him, I was instrumental to protect him, and give him success in his wars, and, after he had conquered Babylon, to confirm him in his resolution to release the Jews, which, with the help of God, was likely, which was the main proposition. Thus by the angel, and at the request of the watcher, the golden head was broken, and the axe laid to the root of the tree. Note, We must acknowledge the hand of God in the strengthening of those that are friends to the church for the service they are to do it, and confirming them in their good resolutions; herein he uses the ministry of angels more than he here tells of. 2. To the more instances we have known of God's care of his church formerly, encourage us to depend upon him in future straits and difficulties.

2. He foretells the reign of four Persian kings; (v. 2.) Now I will tell thee the truth, the true meaning of the visions of the great image, and of the four beasts, and expound in plain terms what was before represented by dark types. 1. There shall stand up three kings in Persia, beside Darius, in whose reign this prophecy is dated, ch. ix. 1. Mr. Broughton makes these three to be Cyrus, Artaxerxes, or Artaxerxes, called by the Greeks Cambyses, and Ahasuerus that married Esther, called Darius, son of Hystaspes. To these three the Persians gave these attributes—Cyrus was a father, Cambyses a master, and Darius a borderer up. So Herodotus. 2. There shall be a fourth, far richer than they all, Xerxes, of whose wealth the Greek authors take notice. By his strength, his vast army, consisting of 800,000 men at least, and his riches, with which he maintained and paid that vast army, he stirred up all against the realm of Greece. Xerxes' expedition against Greece is famous in history, and his shameful defeat that he met with. Who, when he went to war against Greece, in his return was the scorn of Greece. Daniel needed not he told what disappointment he would meet with, for he was a hinderer of the building of the temple; but, soon after, about thirty years after the first return from captivity, Darius, a young king, revived the building of the temple, owning the hand of God against his predecessors for hindering it, Ezra vi. 7.

3. He foretells Alexander's conquests, and the partition of his kingdom, v. 3. He is that mighty king that shall stand up against the kings of Persia, and he shall rule with great dominion over many kingdoms, and with a despotic power, for he shall do according to his will, and undo, likewise, which by the law of the Medes and Persians, their kings could not. When Alexander, after he had conquered Asia, would be worshipped as a god, then this was fulfilled, that he shall do according to his will. That is God's permission, but not his tension. But (v. 4,) his kingdom shall soon be broken, and divided into four parts, but not to his posterity; nor shall any of his successors reign according to his dominion; none of them shall have such large territories, nor such an absolute power. His kingdom was plucked up for others besides those of his own family. Aridens, his brother, was made king in Macedonia; Olympeus, Alexander's mother, killed him, and poisoned Alexander's two sons, Hercules and Alexander; thus was his family rooted out by its own hands. See what decaying, perishing things worldly pomp and possessions are; and the powers by which they are got. Never was the vanity of the world and its greatest things showed more evidently than in the story of Alexander; all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

5. And the king of the south shall be strong, and one of his princes; and he shall be strong above him, and have dominion; his dominion shall be a great dominion. And in the end of years they shall join themselves together; for the king's daughter of the south shall come to the king of the north to make an agreement; but she shall not retain the power of the arm; neither shall he stand, nor his arm; but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, and he that begat her, and he that strengthened her in these times. But out of a branch of her roots shall one stand up in his estate, which shall come with an army, and shall enter into the fortress of the king of the north, and shall deal against them, and shall prevail; and shall also carry captives into Egypt their gods, with their princes, and with their precious vessels of silver and of gold; and he shall continue more years than the king of the north. So the king of the south shall come into his kingdom, and shall return into his own land. But his sons shall be stirred up, and shall assemble a multitude of great forces; and one shall certainly come, and overflow, and pass through; then shall he return, and be stirred up, even to his fortress. And the king of the south shall be moved with choler, and shall come forth and fight with him, even with the king of the north: and he shall set forth a great multitude; but the multitude shall be given into his hand. And when he hath taken away the multitude, his heart shall be lifted up; and he shall cast down many ten thousands: but he shall not be strengthened by it. For the king of the north shall return, and shall set forth a multitude greater than the former, and shall certainly come after certain years with a great army and with much riches. And in those times there shall many stand up against the king of the south: also the robbers of thy people shall exalt themselves to establish, the vision; but they shall fall. 15. So the king of the north shall come, and cast up a mount, and take the most fenced cities; and the arms of the south shall not withstand, neither his chosen people, neither shall there be any strength to withstand. 16. But he that cometh against him shall do according to his own will, and none shall stand before him; and he shall stand in the glorious land, which by his hand shall be consumed. 17. He shall also set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, and upright ones with him; thus shall he do: and he shall give him the daughter of women, corrupting her; but she shall not stand on his side, neither be for him. 18. After this shall he turn his face unto the isles, and shall take many; but a prince for his own behove shall cause the reproach offered by him to cease; without his own reproach he shall cause it to turn upon him. 19. Then he shall turn his face toward the fort of his own land; but he shall stumble and fall, and be not found. 20. Then shall stand up in his estate a raiser of taxes in the glory of the kingdom: but within few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger nor in battle.

Here are foretold,

1. The rise and power of two great kingdoms out of the remains of Alexander's conquests, v. 3. 1. The kingdom of Egypt, which was made considerable by Ptolemaus Lagus, one of Alexander's captains, whose successors were from him called the Lagides. He is called the king of the south, Egypt, named here, v. 8, 42, 43. The countries that at first belonged to Ptolemy, are reckoned to be Egypt, Phoenicia, Arabia, Lybia, Ethiopia, &c. Theocr. Idyl. 17. 2. The kingdom of Syria, which was set up by Seleucus, or the conqueror of the Parthians, one of Alexander's princes, and became stronger than the other, and had the greatest dominion of all, was the most powerful of all Alexander's successors; it was said that he had no less than seventy-two kingdoms under him. Both these were strong against Judah; (the affairs of which are particularly eyed in this prediction;) Ptolemy, soon after he gained Egypt, invaded Judea, and took Jerusalem on a sudden, pretending a friendly visit. Seleucus also gave disturbance to Juden. Selenus also gave disturbance to Judea.

11. The fruitless attempt to unite these two kingdoms, as iron and clay in Nebuchadnezzar's image; (v. 6.) At the end of certain years, about seventy after Alexander's death, the Legi and the Seleucids shall associate, but not in sincerity. Ptolemy Philopater, king of Egypt, shall marry his daughter Berenice to Antiochus Theos, king of Syria, who had already a wife called Laodice. Berenice shall come to the king of the north, to make an agreement, but it shall not hold; She shall not retain the power of the arm; neither she nor her posterity shall establish themselves in the kingdom of the north, neither shall Ptolemy her father, nor Antiochus her husband, (betwixt whom there was to be a great alliance,) stand, nor their arm, but she shall be given up, and they that brought her, all that projected that unhappy marriage between her and Antiochus, which occasioned so much mischief, instead of producing a coalition between the northern and southern crowns, as was hoped. Antiochus divorced Berenice, took his former wife Laodice again, who soon after poisoned him, procured Berenice and her son to be murdered, and set up her own son by Antiochus, to be king, who was called Seleucus Callinicus.

IV. A war between the two kingdoms; (v. 7, 8.) A branch from the same root with Berenice shall stand up in his estate. Ptolemaus Evergetes, the son and successor of Ptolemaus Philopater, shall come with an army against Seleucus Callinicus, king of Syria, to avenge his sister's quarrel, and shall prevail. And he shall carry away a rich booty both of persons and goods into Egypt; and shall continue such a war for several years; when Seleucus, king of Syria, shall have reigned forty-six years; and Justin says that if his own affairs had not called him home, he had, in this war, made himself master of the whole kingdom of Syria. But (v. 9.) he shall be forced to come into his kingdom, and return into his own land, to keep peace there, so that he can no longer carry on the war abroad. Note, It is very common for a treacherous peace to end in a bloody war.

1. The king of the south, in this war, shall at first have very great success. Ptolemaus Philopater, moved with indignation at the indignities done by Antiochus the Great, shall (though otherwise a slothful prince) come forth, and fight with him, and shall bring a vast army into the field of 70,000 men, and 5,000 horse, and 75 elephants. And the other king, Antiochus, being upon a surprise; (v. 6.) having 62,000 foot, and 6,000 horse, and 102 elephants) shall be given into his hand. Polybius, who lived with Scipio, has given a particular account of this battle of Raphia. Ptolemaus Philopater, having gained this victory, grew very insolent; his heart was lifted up, then he went into the temple of God at Jerusalem, and, in defiance of the law, entered the most holy place; for which God has a controversy with him, so that, though he shall cast down many myriads, yet he shall not be strengthened by it, so as to secure his interest. For, 2. The king of the north, Antiochus the Great, shall return with a greater army than the former; and, at the end of times, that is, years, he shall come often with a mighty army, and great riches, against the king of the south; that is, Ptolemaus Philopater, who succeeded Ptolemaus Philopater his father, when he was a child, which gave advantage to Antiochus the Great. In this expedition, he had some powerful allies; (v. 14.) Many shall stand up against the king of the south; Philip of Macedon was confederate with Antiochus against the king of Egypt, and Scopas his general, whom he sent into Syra; Antiochus routed him, destroyed a great part of his army; whereupon the Jews willingly yielded to Antiochus, joined with him, helped him to besiege Ptolemaus's garrisons; then the robbers of the people shall exalt themselves to establish the vision, to help forward the accomplishment of this prophecy; but they shall fall, and shall come to nothing, v. 14. Hereupon, (v. 13.) the king of the north, this same Antiochus Magnus, shall carry on his design against the king of the south another way. (1.) He shall surprise his strong holds; all that he has got in Syria and Samaria, and the arms of the north, all the power of the king of the south, shall come against him. See how dubious and variable the turns of the scale of war are; like buying and selling, it is winning and losing; sometimes one side gets the better, and sometimes the other; yet neither by chance; it is not, as they call it, the fortune of war, but according to the will and counsel of God, who brings some low, and raises others up. (2.) He shall make his land, and Judea, a prey, and carry away all before him, and do what he pleases, and he shall stand, and get footing, in the glorious land; so the land of Israel was, and by his hand it was wasted and consumed; for with the spoil of that good land he victualled his vast army. The land of Judea lay between these two potent kingdoms of Egypt and Syria, so that in all the struggles between them, that was sore to suffer; for to it they both bore ill will. Yet some read this, By his hand it shall be perfected; as if it intimates that the land of Judea, being taken under the protection of this Antiochus, shall flourish, and be in better condition than it had been. (3.) He shall still push on his war against the king of Egypt, and set his face to enter with the strength of his whole kingdom, taking advantage of those of Ptolemy Epiphanes, and the upright ones, many of the pious Israelites, siding with him, v. 17. In prosecution of his design, he shall give him his daughter Cleopatra to wife; designing, as Saul in giving his daughter to David, that she should be a snare to him, and do him a mischief; but she shall not stand of her father's side, nor be for him, but for her husband, and so that plot failed him. (4.) His war with the Romans is here foretold; (v. 18.) He shall turn his face to the isles, (v. 18.) the isles of the Gentiles, (Gen. x. 5.) Greece and Italy. He took many of the isles about the Hellespont—Rhodes, Samos, Delos, &c. which by war or treaty he made himself master of; but a prince, or state, (so some;) even the Roman senate, or a leader, even the Roman general, by whom the Roman army is directed, shall brave his refractions, which abused the Romans, upon himself, or shall make his shame rest on himself; and, without his own shame, or any disgrace to himself, shall pay him again. This was fulfilled when the two Scipios were sent with an army against Antiochus; Hannibal was then with him, and advised him to invade Italy, and waste it as he had done; but he did not take his advice; and Scipio joined battle with him, and gave him a total defeat, though Antiochus had 70,000 men, and the Romans but 30,000. Thus he caused the refractions of him to cease. (5.) His fall. When he was totally routed by the Romans, and was forced to abandon to them all he had in Europe. and had a very heavy tribute exacted from him, he turned to his own land, and, not knowing which way to raise money to pay his tribute, he plundered a temple of God in his own land, and, not being able to withstand his own objects against him, that they set upon him, and killed him, so he was overthrown, and fell, and was no more found, v. 19. (6.) His next successor, v. 20. There rose up one in his place, a raiser of taxes, a wielder of the extorter, or extorter. This character was remarkably answered in Seleucus Philopoemer, the elder son of Antiochus the Great; he oppressed them, exacted tribute of all, took from them certain objects, and exacted abundance of money from them; and when he was told he would thereby lose his friends, he said, he knew no better friend than he had money. He likewise attempted to rob the temple at Jerusalem, which this seems especially to refer to. But within a few days he shall be destroyed, neither in anger, nor in battle, but poisoned by Heliodorus, one of his own servants; when he had reigned but twelve years, and done nothing remarkable.

From this let us learn, [1.] That God, in his providence, sets up one, and pulls down another, as he pleases; advances some from low beginnings, and deprecates others that were very high. Some have called great men the foot-balls of fortune; or, rather, they are the tools of Providence. [2.] This world is full of wars and fightings, which come from men's lusts, and make it a theatre of sin and misery. [3.] Peace and war, as the seasons of the states and kingdoms, and every event, even the most minute and contingent, were plainly and perfectly foreseen by the God of heaven, and to him nothing is new. [4.] No word of God shall fall to the ground; but what he has designed, what he has declared, shall infallibly come to pass; and even the sins of men shall be made to serve his purpose, and contribute to the bringing of his counsels to birth in their season; and yet God is not the Author of sin. [5.] That, for the right understanding of some parts of scripture, it is necessary that heathen authors be consulted, which give light to the scripture, and show the accomplishment of what is there foretold; we have therefore reason to bless God for the human learning, with which many have done great service to divine truths.

21. And in his estate shall stand up a vile person, to whom they shall not give the honour of the kingdom: but he shall come in peaceably, and obtain the kingdom by flatteries. 22. And with the arms of a flood shall they be overthrown from before him, and shall be broken; yea, also the prince of the covenant. 23. And after the league made with him shall he work deceitfully: for he shall come up, and shall become strong with a small people. 24. He shall enter peaceably even upon the fattest places of the province; and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his fathers' fathers; he shall scatter among them the prey, and spoil, and riches; yea, and he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, even for a time. 25. And he shall stir up his power and his courage against the king of the south with a great army; and the king of the south shall be stirred up to battle with a very great and mighty army; but he shall not stand: for they shall forecast devices against him. 26. Yea, they that feed of the portion of his meat shall destroy him, and his army shall overflow; and many shall fall down slain. 27. And both these kings' hearts shall be to do mischief, and they shall speak lies at one table; but it shall not prosper: for yet the end shall be at the time appointed. 28. Then shall he return into his land with great riches; and his heart shall be against the holy covenant; and he shall do exploits and return to his own land. 29. At the time appointed he shall return, and come toward the south: but it shall not be as the former, or as the latter. 30. For the ships of Chittim shall come against him; therefore he shall be grieved, and return, and have indignation against the holy covenant; so shall he do; he shall even return, and have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant. 31. And arms shall stand on his part, and they shall pollute the sanctuary of strength, and shall take away the daily sacrifice, and they shall place the abomination that maketh desolate. 32. And such as do wickedly against the covenant shall be corrupt by flatteries: but the people that do know their God shall be strong, and do exploits. 33. And they that understand among the people shall instruct many; yet they shall fall by the sword, and by flame, by captivity, and by spoil, many days. 34. Now when they shall fall, they shall be holpen with a little help: but many shall cleave to them with flatteries. 35. And some of them of understanding shall fall, to try them, and to purge, and to make them white, even to the time of the end: because it is yet for a time appointed. 36. And the king shall do according to his will; and he shall exalt himself, and magnify himself above every god, and shall speak marvellous things against the God of gods, and shall prosper till the indignation be accomplished: for that that is determined shall be done. 37. Neither shall he regard the God of his fathers, nor the desire of women, nor regard any god: for he shall magnify himself above all. 38. But in his estate shall he honour the God of forces; and a god whom his fathers knew not shall he honour with gold, and silver, and with precious stones, and pleasant things. 39. Thus shall he do in the most strong holds with a strange god, whom he shall acknowledge and increase with glory: and he shall cause them to rule over many, and shall divide the land for gain. 40. And at the time of the end shall the king of the south push at him: and the king of the north shall come against him like a whirlwind, with chariots, and with horsemen, and with many ships; and he shall enter into the countries, and shall overflow and pass over. 41. He shall enter also into the glorious land, and many countries shall be overthrown: but these shall escape out of his hand, even Edom, and Moab, and the chief of the children of Ammon. 42. He shall stretch forth his hand also upon the countries; and the land of Egypt shall not escape. 43. But he shall have power over all the precious things of Egypt: and the Libyans and the Ethiopians shall be at his steps. 44. But tidings out of the east and out of the north shall trouble him: therefore he shall go forth with great fury to destroy, and utterly to make away many. 45. And he shall plant the tabernacles of his palace between the seas in the glorious holy mountain: yet he shall come to his end, and none shall help him.

All this is a prophecy of the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, the little horn spoken of before, (ch. viii. 9.) a sworn enemy to the Jewish religion, and a bitter persecutor of those that adhered to it. What troubles the Jews every where with the reign of the Persian kings, were not so particularly foretold to Daniel as these; because then they had living prophets with them, Haggai and Zechariah, to encourage them; but these troubles in the days of Antiochus were foretold, because, before that time, prophecy would cease, and they would find it necessary to have recourse to the written word. Some things in this prediction concerning Antiochus are alluded to in the New Testament predictions of the antichrist, especially v. 36, 37. And as it is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the prosperity of the Jewish church, to make use of such expressions as were applicable to the kingdom of Christ, and insensibly to slide into a prophecy of that, so, when they foretell the troubles of the church, they make use of such expressions as have a further reference to the kingdom of the antichrist, the rise and ruin of that.

Now concerning Antiochus, the angel foretells here,

I. His character; He shall be a vile person. He called himself Epiphanes—the illustrious, but his character was the reverse of his surname. The heathen writers describe him to be an odd-humoured man, rude and boisterous, base and sordid. He would sometimes steal out of the court into the city, and herd himself with any infamous company, inognito—in disguise; he made himself a companion of the common sort, and of the basest strangers that came to town. He had the most unaccountable whims, so that some took him to be silly, others to be mad. He was called Epiphanes—the mad man. He is called a vile person, a madman, because he was a long time a hostage at Rome for the fidelity of his father, when the Romans had subdued him; and it was agreed that when the other hostages were exchanged, he should continue a prisoner at large.

II. His accession to the crown. By a trick he got his elder brother's son, Demetrius, to be sent a hostage to Rome, in exchange for him, contrary to the cartel; and his elder brother being made away with by Heliodorus, (v. 20.) he took the kingdom. The states of Syria did not give it him, (v. 21.) because they knew it belonged to his elder brother's son, nor did he get it by the sword, but came in peaceably, pretending to reign for his brother's son, Demetrius, then a hostage at Rome. But with the help of Eumenes and Attalus, neighbouring princes, he gained an interest in the people, and by flatteries obtained the kingdom, established himself in it, and crushed Heliodorus, who made head against him with the arms of a foe; they that opposed him, were overthrown and broken before him: even the prince of the covenant, his nephew, the rightful heir, whom he pretended to covet and with. But he was master to all. Whenever he should return, v. 22. But (v. 23.) after the league made with him, he shall work deceitfully, as one whose arrowed maxim it is, that princes ought not to be bound by their word any longer than it is for their interest. And with a small people, that at first clause to him, he shall become strong, and (v. 24.) he shall enter peaceably upon the fastest places of the kingdom of Syria, and, very unlike his predescessors, shall scatter among them the spoil, and riches, to insinuate himself into their affections; but at the same time, he shall forecast his devices against the strong holds, to make himself master of them, so that his generosity shall last but for a time; when he has got the garrisons into his hands, he will scatter his spoil no more, but rule by force, as those commonly do, that come in by fraud. In this interpretation. Some understand these verses of his first expedition into Egypt, when he came not as an enemy, but as a friend and guardian to the young king Ptolemæus Philometer, and therefore brought with him but few followers, yet those stout men, and faithful to his interest, whom he placed in divers of the strong holds in Egypt, thereby making himself master of them.

Vol. iv.—5 R

III. His war with Egypt; which was his second expedition thither. This is described, v. 25—27. Antiochus shall stir up his power and courage against Ptolemæus Philometer king of Egypt. Ptolemæ, thereupon, shall be stirred up to battle against him, shall come against him with a very great and mighty army; but Ptolemæus, though he has such a vast army, shall not be able to stand before him: for Antiochus shall overcome both his army and power it, and great multitudes of the Egyptian army shall fall down slain. And no marvel, for the king of Egypt shall be betrayed by his own counsellors; that they fed of the portion of his meat, that cat of his bread, and live upon him, being bribed by An-tiochus, shall forecast devices against him, and even they shall destroy him; and what fence is there against such treachery? After the battle, a time of peace shall be set on foot, and these two kings shall meet at one council-board, to adjust the articles of peace between them; but they shall neither of them be sincere in it, for they shall, in their pretences and promises of amity and friendship, lie to one another, for their hearts shall be at the same time to do one another all the mischief they can. And then no marvel that it shall be said, they put the spoils of war, that shall be great; but the end of it shall be at the time appointed in the Divine Providence, and then the war shall break out again, as a sore that is only skinned over.

IV. Another expedition against Egypt. From the former he returned with great riches, (v. 28.) and therefore took the first occasion to invade Egypt again, at the time appointed by the Divine Providence, two years after, in the eighth year of his reign, v. 29. He shall come toward the south. But this attempt shall not succeed, as the former did, nor shall he gain his point, as he had done before once and again; for, (v. 30.) the ships of Chittim shall come against him, that is, the navy of the Romans, or only ambassadors from the Roman se-ate, who came in ships. Ptolemæus Philometer, king of Egypt, being now in a strict alliance with the Romans, craved their aid against Antiochus, who had besieged him and his mother Cleopatra in the city of Alexandria. The Roman senate, thereupon, sent an embassy to Antiochus, to command him to raise the siege; which, when he desired some time to consider of, and consult with his friends, Popilius, one of the ambassadors, with his chieftains, and a circle about him, and told him, as one having authority, he should give a positive answer before he came out of that circle; whereupon, fearing the Roman power, he was forced immediately to give orders for the raising of the siege, and the retreat of his army out of Egypt. So Livy and others relate the story which this prophecy refers to; He shall be grieved, and return; for it was a great vexation to him to be forced to yield thus.

V. His rage and cruel practices against the Jews.

This is that part of his government, or mis-government that rages in the days of Antiochus. The main subject of this prediction. In his return from his expedition into Egypt, (which is prophesied of, v. 28,) he did exloit against the Jews, in the sixth year of his reign; then he spoiled the city and temple; but the most terrible storm was in his return from Egypt, two years after, prophesied of, v. 30. Then he took Judea in his way home; and because he could not get the form of a battle, he cast his eyes upon the (v. 31.) city, and the temple, accompanied with his army, and razed it to the ground, with the most cruel and blood-curdling decrees. He thereupon, thereupon, not only his own nation which he now brought from Egypt, but a great party of deserters from the Jewish religion that joined with them; and they polluted the sanctuary of strength, not only the holy city, but the temple. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. i. 21, &c. He entered proudly into the sanctuary, took away the golden altar, and the candlestick, &c. And they (v. 23.) there was a great mourning in Israel, the priests and people mourned, &c. And (2 Mac. i. 15, &c.) Antiochus went into the most holy temple, Menelaus, that tutor to the lawns, and to his own country, being his guide. Antiochus, having resolved to bring all about him to be of his religion, took away the daily sacrifice, v. 31. Some observe that the word Tumeth, which signifies no more than daily, is only here, and in the parallel place, used for the daily sacrifice; if that be the case, the deduced liberty left to supply it either with sacrifice, which was suppressed
by Antiochus, or with gospel-worship, which was suppressed by the antichrist. Then he set up the abomination of desolation upon the altar, (1 Mac.
1. 54.) even an idolater, (v. 39.) and called the temple The temple of Jupiter Olympius, 2 Mac. vi. 2.
4. He persecutes all his subjects with vergeny. Though there are many who forsake the eovenant, and do wickedly against it, yet there is a people who do know their God, and retain the knowledge of him, and they shall be strong, and do exploits; (v. 32.) when others yield to the tyrant's demands, and surrender their consciences to his impositions, they bravely keep their ground, resist the temptation, and make the tyrant himself ashamed of his attempt upon them. Good old Eleazar, one of the principal scribes, when he had swine's flesh
thrust into his mouth, bravely spit it out again, though he knew he must be tormented to death for doing; and was so, 2 Mac. vi. 19. The mother and her seven sons were put to death for adhering to their religion, 2 Mac. vii. This might well be called a gross reproach for such a matter, and stronger than sin, is a great exploit. And it was by faith, by being strong in faith, that they did those explioits; that they were tortured, not accepting deliverance, as the apostle speaks, probably with refer-ce to that story, Heb. xi. 35. Or, it may refer to the military courage and achievements of Judas Maccabæus, and others in opposition to them. Note,
The right knowledge of God and will be the strength of the soul, and, in the strength of that, gracious souls do exploits. They that know his name, will put their trust in him, and by that trust will do great things.

Now concerning this people that knew their God,
we are here told, (1.) That they shall instruct many, v. 33. They shall make it their business to show others what they have learned themselves of the difference between truth and falsehood, good and ever. Note, They that have the knowledge of God themselves, should communicate their knowledge to those about them, and this spiritual charity must be extensive; they must instruct many. Some understand this of a society newly erected for the propagation of divine knowledge, called Asidæus, godly men of Piæus, (so the Sept. translate it,) that were the keepers of the faithful in the last and instructing many. Note, In times of persecution and apostasy, which are trying times, those that have knowledge ought to make use of it for the strengthening and establishing of others. They that understand aright themselves, ought to do what they can to bring others to understand; for knowledge is a talent that must be traded with. Or, They shall instruct many, by their perseverance in their duty, and their patient suffering for it. Good examples instruct many, and with many are the most powerful instructions. (2.) They shall fall by the cruelty of Antiochus; shall be put to the torture, and put to death, by his rage. Though they are so excellent and intelligent themselves, and so useful and serviceable to others, that they could easily maintain their own; yet they do not, and they are put to death. So it may be read, Rev. vi. 10. Thou shalt have tribulation ten days. We read much, in the books of the Maccabees, of Antiochus's barbarous usage of the pious Jews, how many he slew in wars, and how many he murdered in cold blood. Women were put to death for having their children circumcised, and their infants were hanged about their necks, 1 Mac. i. 60, 61. But why did God suffer this? How can this be reconciled with the justice and goodness of God? I answer, Very well, if we consider what it was that God aimed at in this; (v. 2.)
Some observe of expiating sufferings; but it shall be for the good of the Gentiles, and for their own spiritual benefit. It shall be to try them, and to purge, and to make them white. They needed these afflictions themselves; the best have their spots, which must be washed off, their dress, which must be purged out; and their troubles, particularly their share in the public troubles, help to do this;
and yet these same persecutions and trials, which are means of mortifying their corruptions, wean them from the world, and awakening them to greater seriousness, and diligence in religion. They try them, as silver in the furnace is refined from its dross; they purge them, as wheat in the barn is winnowed from the chaff; and make them white, as cloth
by the fuller is cleared from its spots. See 1 Pet. i. 7.
Their sufferings for righteousness' sake, and
and purge the nation of the Jews, would convince them of the truth, excellency, and power of that holy religion which these understanding men died for their adherence to. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church; it is precious blood, and net
a drop of it should be shed but upon such a valuable consideration. (3.) The cause of religion, though they might suffer for it, if they should fall, they shall not be utterly cast down, but they shall be hallowed with a little help, v. 34.
Judas Maccabæus, and his brethren, and a few with them, shall make head against the tyrant, and assert the injure cause of their religion; they pulled down the idolatrous altars, circumcised the children that they found uncircumcised, recovered the law out of the hands of the Gentiles, and the work prospered in their hands, 1 Mac. ii. 45. &c. Note, Those that stand by the cause of religion when it is threatened and struck at, though they may not immediately be delivered, and made victorious, shall yet have present help. A little help must not be despised; but when times are very bad, we must be thankful for some reviving. It is likewise foretold that many shall cleave to them with, latters; when they see the Maccabees prosper, some Jews shall join with them, that are no true friends to religion,
but will only pretend friendship, either with design to betray them, or in hope to rise with them; but the fury trial, (v. 35.) will separate between the precious and the vile, and by it they that are perfect will be made manifest, and they that are not. (4.) Though these troubles may continue long, yet they have a limit; they have not been set on foot at a limited time, fixed in the divine counsels; this warfare shall be accomplished; hitherto the power of the enemy shall come, and no further, here shall its proud waves be stayed.

3. He grew very proud, insolent, and profane, and, being puffed up with the conquests, bade deference to Heaven, and triumphed upon every thing that was holy, 3 Mac. v. 1. 8c. He that begins a prophecy of the antichrist, the papal kingdom. It is plain that St. Paul, in his prophecy of the rise and reign of the man of sin, alludes to this here, (2 Thess. i. 4.) which shows that Antiochus was a type and figure of that enemy, as Babylon also was; but this being joined in a continued discourse
in the foregoing prophecies, concerning Antiochus, not to mention (so to speak) that he refers to him, and in him had its primary accomplishment, and has reference to the other only by way of commutation.

(1.) He shall impiously dishonour the God of Israel, the only living and true God, called here the God of gods. He shall, in defiance of him and his authority, do according to his will against his people and his holy religion; he shall exalt himself, as he would, above all that are called gods, and shall talk marvellous
things against him, and against his laws and institutions. This was fulfilled when Antiochus forbade sacrifices to be offered in God's temple, and ordered the sabbaths to be profaned, the sanctuary and the holy people to be polluted, &c. to the end they might forget the law, and change all the ordinances. And this, upon pain of death, 1 Macc. i. 45.

(2.) He shall proudly put contempt upon all other gods; shall magnify himself above every god, even the god of the earth; he shall do all things as his kingdom, that every one should leave the gods he had worshipped, and worship such as he ordered, contrary to the practice of all the conquerors that went before him; (1 Macc. i. 41, 42.) And all the heathen agreed according to the commandment of the king: fond as they were of their gods, they did not think them worth suffering for, but, their gods being idols, it was all alike to them what gods they worshipped. Antiochus did not regard any god, but magnified himself above all, v. 37.

His pride so increased, that he thought himself above the condition of a mortal man, that he could command the waves of the sea, and reach to the stars of heaven, as his insolence and haughtiness are expressed, 2 Macc. ix. 8, 10. Thus he carried all before him, till the indignation of God came upon him. (44.) He had run his length, and filled up the measure of his iniquity; for which is determined shall be done, and nothing more, nothing short.

(3.) He shall, contrary to the way of the heathen, disregard the god of his fathers, v. 37. Though an affection to the religion of their ancestors was, among the heathen, almost as natural to them as the desire of women, (for if you search through the isles of Chittim, you will not find an instance of a nation which has changed its gods, Jer. ii. 10, 11.) yet Antiochus shall not regard the god of his fathers; he made laws to abolish the religion of his country, and to bring in the idols of the Greeks. And though his predecessors had honoured the God of Israel, and given great gifts to the temple at Jerusalem, (2 Macc. iii. 2, 3.) he did the greatest indignities to God and his temple. His not regarding the desire of women, may be spoken either his barbarous cruelty, he shall spare no age or sex, no, not the tender ones: or, his unnatural lusts, or, in general, his contempt of everything which men of honour have a concern for: or, it might be accomplished in something we meet not with in history. Its being joined to his not regarding the god of his fathers, intimates that the idolatries of his country had in them more of the gratifications of the flesh than in the two former. (45.) And he shall write of the Syrian goddesses; and yet that would not prevail to keep him to them.

(4.) He shall set up an unknown god; a new god, v. 38. In his estate, in the room of the god of his fathers, (Apollo and Diana, deities of his pleasure,) he shall honour the god of forces, a supposed deity of power, a god whom his fathers knew not, nor would they have taken him for his god. He shall make strength to excel his fathers, he shall honour this god with gold, and silver and precious stones, thinking nothing too good for the god he had taken in fancy to. This seems to be Jupiter Olympius; known among the Phenicians by the name of Baal-Sennim, the lord of heaven, but never introduced among the Syrians till Antiochus did it. Thus he shall set up his image in the temple of the Mede, which is called the sanctuary of strength, (v. 31.) and here the fortresses of munitions; there he shall set up the image of this strange god. Some read it, He shall commit the munitions of strength, or of the most strong God, the city of Jerusalem, to a strange god; he put it under the protection and government of Jupiter Olympius. This god he shall not only acknowledge, but shall increase with glory, by setting his image upon God’s altar.

And he shall cause them that minister to this idol, to rule over many, shall put them into places of power and trust, and they shall divide the land for gain, shall be maintained richly out of the profits of the country. Some by the Mahazzim, or god of forces, that Antiochus shall worship, understand money, which is said to answer all things, and which is the great idol of worldly people.

Now here is very much that is applicable to the modern state and the state of his followers. He pretends not to regard the desire of women; and honours the god of forces, the god Mahazzim, or strong holds, saints and angels, whom his followers take for their protectors, as the heathen did of old their demons; these he make presidents of several countries; &c. These he honours with vast treasures dedicated to them, and therein the learned Mr. Mede thinks that this prophecy was fulfilled, and that it is referred to, 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2.

VI. Here seems to be another expedition into Egypt, or, at least, a struggle with Egypt. The Romans had tied him up from invading Parthia, but now that king of the south fashions him, (v. 40.) whom you see a king of Egypt, who is strong upon some of his territories; whereupon Antiochus, the king of the north, comes against him like a whirlwind, with incredible swiftness and fury, with chariots, and horses, and many ships, a great force; he shall come through countries, and shall overthrow and pass over; in this flying march many countries shall be overthrown by him; and he shall enter into the glorious land, the land of Israel; it is the same word that is translated the pleasant land, ch. viii. 9. He shall make dreadful work among the nations thereof: yet some shall escape his fury, particularly Ed m and M°b, and the chief of the children of Ammon, v. 41. He did not put these countries under contribution, because they had joined with him against the Jews. But especially the land of Egypt shall not escape, but he will quite beggar that, so bare will he strip it. This some reckon his fourth and last expedition against Egypt, in the tenth or eleventh year of his reign, under pretence of assisting the younger brother of Ptolemaeus Philometer against him. We read not of any great slaughter made in this expedition, but great plunder; for, it should seem, that was it he came for; He shall have power over the treasures of gold and silver, and all the precious things of Egypt; (42.) He shall take but little of the spoil, except horses and gold, and silver and precious stones; (43.) he has written of the Syrian goddesses; and yet that would not prevail to keep him to them.

VII. Here is a prediction of the fall and ruin of Antiochus; as before, (ch. viii. 23.) when he is in the height of his honour, flushed with victory, and king as he is, he shall come up to the head of the north; (out of the north-east,) shall trouble him, v. 44. Or, He shall have intelligence, both from the eastern and northern parts, that the king of Parthia is invading his kingdom. This obliged him to drop the enterprises he had in hand, and to go against the Persians and Parthians that were revolting from him; and this vexed him; for now he thought utterly to have ruined and extinguished the Jewish nation. when that expedition called him off.
in which he perished. This is explained by a passage in Tacitus, (though an impious one,) where he commends Antiochus for his attempt to take away the superstitition of the Jews, and bring in the manners of the Greeks among them, (at tertium Germanorum, "by which a new race of nations") and laments that he was hindered from accomplishing it by the Parthian war. Now here is,

1. The last effort of his rage against the Jews; when he finds himself perplexed and embarrassed in his affairs, he shall go forth with great fury, to destroy and utterly to make away many, v. 44. The story of this we have, 1 Mac. iii. 27. &c. When the Lord will hearken to the prayers of the people, he will come to the aid of Judas Maccabæus, and the orders he gave to Lyssias to destroy Jerusalem! Then he flattered the tabernacles of his palace, or tents of his court, between the seas, between the Great sea and the Dead sea. He set up his royal pavilion at Emmaus, near Jerusalem, in token, that though he could not be present himself, yet he gave full power to his captains to prosecute the war against the Jews with the utmost rigor. He placed his tent there, as if he had taken possession of the glorious holy mountain, and called it his own. Note, When impiety grows very impudent, we may see its ruin near.

2. His exit; II. shall come to his end, and none shall help him. God shall cut him off in the midst of his days, and none shall be left of his house. The Lord is the sovereign God, that was foretold, (ch. viii. 28.) He shall be broken without hand; where we took a view of his miserable end. Note, When God's time is come to bring proud oppressors to their end, none shall be able to help them, nor perhaps inclined to help them; for those that covet to be feared by all, when they are in their grandeur, will be least esteemed and despised by all, that are hated and abhorred; none will lend them so much as a hand, or a prayer, to help them; and if the Lord do not help, who shall?

Of the kings that came after Antiochus, nothing is here prophesied, for that was the most malicious, mischievous enemy to the church, that was a type of the son of perdition, whom the Lord shall consume with the breath of his mouth, and destroy with the brightness of his coming, and none shall help him.

CHAP. XII.

After the prediction of the troubles of the Jews under Antiochus, prefiguring the troubles of the Christian church under the antichristian power, we have here, I. Comforts, and very precious ones, prescribed as cordials for the support of God's people in those times of trouble, and they are as such as indifferently serve both for those former times of trouble under Antiochus, and those latter which were prefigured by them, v. 1...4. II. A conference between Christ and an angel, concerning the time of the continuance of these events, designed for Daniel's satisfaction, v. 5...7. III. Daniel's inquiry for his own satisfaction, v. 8. And the answer he received to that inquiry, v. 9...13.

1. And at that time shall Michael stand up, the great prince which standeth for the children of thy people; and there shall be a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time; and at that time thy people shall be delivered, every one that shall be found written in the book. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. 3. And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness, as the stars for ever and ever. 4. But thou, O Daniel, shut up the words, and seal the book, even to the time of the end: many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased.

It is usual with the prophets, when they foretell the grievances of the church, to furnish it at the same time with proper antidotes; a remedy for every malady. And no relief is so sovereign, of such general application, so easily accommodated to every case, and of such powerful efficacy, as those that are fetched from Christ, and the future state; thence the comforts here are fetched.

1. Jesus Christ shall appear his church's Patron and Protector. At that time, when the persecutor is at the hottest, Michael shall stand up, v. 1. The angel had told Daniel what a fast friend Michael was to the church, ch. x. 21. He all along showed it in the upper world, the angels knew it; but now Michael shall stand up in his providence, and work deliverance for the Jews, when he sees that their power is gone, Deut. xxxiii. 36. Christ is that great Prince, for he is the Prince of the kings of the earth, Rev. i. 5. And if he stand up for his church, who can be against it? But this is not all; At that time, soon after, Michael shall stand up for the working out of our eternal salvation, the Son of Righteousness shall be manifested to destroy the works of the devil. Christ stood up for the children of our people, when he was made Sin and a Curse for them, stood in their stead as a Sacrifice, bore the curse for them, to bear it from them. He stands for them in the intercession he ever lives to make within the vail; stands up for them, and stands their Friend. And after the angel showed the Son of Righteousness shall be a type, Christ shall stand at the latter day upon the earth, shall appear for the complete redemption of all his.

2. When Christ appears, he will recompense tribulation to them that trouble his people. There shall be a time of trouble, threatening to all, but ruining to all the impenitent enemies of God's kingdom among men, such trouble as never was since there was a nation. Which is applicable, (1.) To the destruction of Jerusalem; which Christ calls (perhaps with no eye to this here) such a great tribulation as was not since the beginning of the world to this time, Matt. xxiv. 21. This the angel had spoken much of; (ch. ix. 26, 27.) and it happened about the same time, that Christ set up the gospel-kingdom of God in the world, and shall be the means of the destruction of their nation. (2.) To the judgment of the great day; that day that shall burn as an oven, and consume the proud, and all that do wickedly; that will be such a day of trouble as never was, to all those whom Michael our Prince stands against.

3. He will work salvation for his people; "At that time thy people shall be delivered, delivered from their enemies, and none shall be able to destroy them by Antiochus, even all those that were marked for preservation, that were written among the living," Isa. iv. 3. When Christ comes into the world, he will save his spiritual Israel from sin and hell, and will, at his second coming, complete their salvation, even the salvation of as many as were given him, as many as his Father had given him in the union of the Son with the Father. They were written there before the world, and will be found written there at the end of the world, when the book shall be opened.

4. There shall be a distinguishing resurrection of them that sleep in the dust, v. 2. (1.) When God works deliverance for his people from persecution, it is a kind of resurrection; so the Jews released out of Babylon was represented in vision, (Ezek. xxxvii.) and so the deliverance of the Jews from Antiochus, and other restorations of the church to outward glory; and they were as life unto the dead. Many of them who had long slept in the dust of obscurity and calumny, shall then awake, some to that life and honour and comfort which will be lasting, everlasting, but to others, who, when they return to their prosperity, will return to their iniquity, it will be a resurrection to shame and contempt, for the prosperity of fools will but expose them and their profession. (2.) When then, upon the approach of Michael our Prince, his help is preached, many of them who sleep in the dust, both Jews and Gentiles, shall be awakened by it, to take upon them a profession of religion, and shall rise out of their heathenism or Judaism; but since there will be always a mixture of hypocrites with true saints, it is but some of them who are raised to life, to whom the gospel is a saviour; life unto life, but others will be raised by it to shame and contempt, to whom the gospel of Christ will be a saviour of death unto death; and Christ himself set for their fall. The net of the gospel encloses both good and bad. But, (3.) It must be meant of the general resurrection at the last day; The multitude of them that sleep in the dust, shall awake, that is, all, which shall be a great many. Or, Of them that sleep in the dust, the dead, of both the just and unjust, (John vi.) and upon this the Jews are said by St. Paul to expect a resurrection of the dead both of the just and of the unjust, Acts xxiv. 15. And nothing could come in more seasonably here, for, under Antiochus's persecution, some beseechently betrayed their religion, others bravely adhered to it. Now it would be a trouble to them, that when the storm was over, they could neither reward the one, nor punish the other; this therefore would be a satisfaction to them, that they would both be recompensed according to their works in the resurrection. And the apostle, speaking of the pious Jews that suffered martyrdom under Antiochus, tells us, that though they were tortured, yet they accepted not deliverance, because they hoped to obtain this better resurrection, Heb. xi. 35. 5. There shall be a glorious reward conferred on those who, in the day of trouble and distress, being themselves wise, did instruct many. Such were taken care of, even under disease of persecution, (ch. xli. 33.) that they should do eminent service, and yet should fall by the sword and by flame; now if there were not another life after this, they would be of all men most miserable; and therefore we are here assured that they shall be recompensed in the resurrection of the just; (v. 3.) They that are wise, (that are teachers, so some read it,) for particular notice is given to them of the prophecy, that they (if they have wisdom themselves, should communicate it to others,) they shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, shall shine in glory, heavenly glory, the glory of the upper world; and they that by the wisdom they have, and the instructions they give, are instrumental to turn any, especially to turn many, to righteousness, shall shine as the stars for ever and ever, to the admiration of the world. (Jam. vi. 20.) will share in the glory of those they have helped to heaven, which will be a great addition to their own crown, and especially to those, who have obtained mercy of him to be faithful and successful, and so are made burning and shining lights in this world, and shall shine very bright in the other world, shall shine as the stars. Christ is the Sun, the Fountain of the lights, both of grace and glory; ministers, as stars, shine in both, with a light derived from him, and a diminutive light in comparison to that of the sun; whereas in the Resurrection vessels it will be a glory infinitely transcending their deserts. They shall shine as the stars of different magnitudes, some in lesser, others in greater, lustre; but whereas the day is coming when the stars shall fall from heaven as leaves in autumn, these stars shall shine for ever and ever, shall never set, never be eclipsed. 6. That this prophecy of these times, though scaled up now, would be of great use to them that should live then, v. 4. Daniel must now shut up the words, and seal the book; because the time would be long ere these things would be accomplished; and it was some comfort that the Jewish nation, though, in the infancy of their return from Babylon, while they were few and weak, they met with obstructions in their work, yet they should see, after the religion till a long time after, when they were grown to some strength and maturity. He must seal the book, because it would not be understood, and therefore would not be regarded, till the things contained in it were accomplished; but he must keep it safe, as a treasure of great value, laid up for the ages to come, to whom it would be of great service; for many shall then run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased. Then this hid treasure shall be opened, and many shall search into it, and dig for the knowledge of it, as for silver. They shall run to and fro, to inquire out copies of it, shall collate them, and see that they are true and authentic; they shall read it over and over, shall meditate upon it, and run it over in their minds; discerne, they shall discourse of it, and talk it over among themselves, and compare notes about it, if by any means they may sift out the meaning of it, and thus knowledge shall be increased; by consulting this prophecy on this occasion they shall be led to search other scriptures, which shall contribute much to their advancement in useful knowledge; for then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord; Hos. vi. 3. (2.) We shall know, if we will, that things increased, must take pains, must not sit still in slothfulness and bare wishes, but run to and fro; must make use of all the means of knowledge, and improve all opportunities of getting their mistakes rectified, their doubts resolved, and their acquaintance with the things of God improved; to know more, and to know better, what they do know. And amongst the things of God, which are now dark and obscure, will hereafter be made clear, and easy to be understood. Truth is the daughter of Time. Scripture-prophecies will be expanded by the accomplish-ment of them; therefore they are given, and for that explanation they are reserved. Therefore they are told us before, that when they do come to pass, we may believe, and the words shall be fulfilled. (1.) Those that would have God amongst them, despised and neglected, and thrown by us as less, shall be brought into reputation, shall be found to be of great service, and be brought into request; for divine revelation, however slighted for a time, shall be magnified and made honourable, and, above all, in the judgment of the great day, when the books shall be opened, and that book among the rest. 5. Then I Daniel looked, and, behold there stood other two, the one on this side Daniel had been made to foresee the amazing revolutions of states and kingdoms, as far as the Israel
of God was concerned in them; in them he foresaw troublous times to the church, suffering, trying times, the prospect of which much affected him,
and filled him with concern: now there were two questions proper to be asked upon this head: When shall the end be? And, What shall the end be?
These questions are answered and asked here,
in the close of the book; and though the comforts prescribed in the foregoing verses, one would think,
were satisfactory enough, yet, for more abundant satisfaction, this is added,
I. The question, When the end shall be? is asked by an angel, v. 5, 6. Concerning this we may observ,
1. Who it was that asked the question. Daniel had had a vision of Christ in his glory, the Man clothed in linen, ch. x. 5. But his discourse had been with the angel Gabriel, and now he looks, and behold, other two (v. 5.) two angels that he had not seen before; one upon the bank of the river on one side, and the other on the other side, that, the river being between them, they might not whisper
to one another, but what they said might be heard.
Christ stood on the waters of the river, (v. 6.)
between the banks of Ula; it was therefore proper that the angels his attendants should stand on either bank, that they might be ready to go one way and the other the other way, as he should order them. These angels appeared, (1.) To adorn the vision, and make it the more illustrious; and to add to the glory of the Son of man, Heb. i. 6. Daniel had not seen them before, though it is probable that they were there; but now when they began to speak, he looked up, and saw them. Note, The further we look into the things of God, and the more we converse with them, the more we shall see of those things, and still new discoveries will be made to us; they that know much, if they improve it, shall know more. (2.) To confirm the discovery, that out of the mouth of two or three wise men
the Lord might be established. These angels appeared to Abraham. (3.) To inform themselves, to hear and ask questions; for the mysteries of God's kingdom are things which the angels desire to look into,
(1 Pet. i. 12.) and they are known to the church,
Eph. iii. 10. Now one of these two angels said,
When shall the end be? Perhaps they both asked, first one, and then the other, but Daniel heard only one.
2. To the end of this question; When shall the end be? an angel clothed in linen, of whom we read before; (ch. x.
5.) to Christ our great High Priest, who was upon the waters of the river, and whose spokesman, or interpreter, the angel Gabriel had all this while been. This river was Hiddekel, (ch. x. 4.) the same with Tigris, the place whereabout many of the events prophesied of would happen; there therefore is the scene laid. Hiddekel was mentioned as one of the rivers that watered the garden of Eden; (Gen. ii. 14.) fitly therefore does Christ stand upon that river, for by him the trees in the paradise of God are watered. Waters signify people, and so his standing upon the waters denotes his domination over all; he sits upon the flood, (Ps. xxvii.
8.) he stands upon the waves, (Isa. xxiii. 10.) as Angel Christ, to show that this was he, in the days of the flesh, walked upon the waters, Matth. xiv.
23. He was above the waters of the river; (some read it) he appeared in the air over the river.
3. What the question was; How long shall it be to the end of these wonders? Daniel would not ask the question, because he would not try to what it should be reduced, nor when it should happen;
times and seasons, which the Father has put in his own power, Acts i. 7. But that he might have the satisfaction of the answer, the angel put the question in his hearing. Our Lord Jesus sometimes answered the questions which his disciples were afraid or ashamed to ask, John xvi. 19. The angel asked as one concerned, How long shall it be?
with the view of preparing the church for the end of the wonders, these suffering, trying times, that are to pass over the people of God?
Note, (1.) The troubles of the church are the wonder of angels. They are astounded that God will suffer his church to be thus afflicted, and are anxious to know what good he will do his church by its afflictions. (2.) Good angels know no more times of things to come than God is pleased to disclose them, much less do evil angels. (3.) The holy angels in heaven are concerned for the church on earth, and lay to heart its afflictions; how much more then should we, who are more immediately related to it, and have so much of our peace in its peace?
4. What answer was returned to it, by him who is indeed the Numberer of secrets, and knows
the things that are, and the things that shall be.
(1.) Here is a more general account given of the continuance of these troubles, to the angel that made the inquiry; (v. 7.) that they shall continue for a time, times, and a half; a year, two years, and a half year, as was before intimated, (ch. vii. 23.) but the one half of a prophetic week; some understand it indefinitely, a certain time for an uncertain time; it shall be for a time, a consumable time.
times, a longer time yet, double to what it was thought at first that it would be; and yet indeed it shall be but half a time, or a part of a time; when it is over, it shall seem not half so much as was feared.
But it is rather to be taken for a certain time; we meet with it in the Revelation, under the title sometimes of three days and a half, put for three years and a half; sometimes forty-two months, or sometimes 1260 days. Now this determination of the time is being, [1.] Confirmed by an oath. The man clothed in linen lifted up both his hands to heaven, and swore by him that lives for ever and ever, that it shall be so. Thus the mighty angel whom St. John saw, is brought in, with a plain reference to this vision here, standing with his right foot on the sea, and his left foot on the earth, and with his hand lifted up to heaven, swearing. Daniel 12:13, 14, Revelation 10:5. The Mighty One that Daniel saw, stood with both feet on the water, and swore with both hands lifted up. Note, An oath is of use for confirmation; God only is to be sworn by, for he is the proper Judge to whom we are to appeal; and lifting up the hand is a very proper and significant sign to be used in a solemn oath. [2.] It is illustrated with a reason; God will suffer him to prevail till he shall have accomplished to scatter the power of the holy people. God will suffer him to do his worst, and run his utmost length, and then all these things shall be finished. Note, God's time to succour and relieve his people, is when their affairs are brought to the last extremity; in the mouth of the Lord it shall be seen that Isaac is saved just then when he lies ready to be sacrificed. Now the end of these troubles and events was reached, and expressly, in his book of the wars of the Jews, that Antiochus, surnamed Epiphanes, surprised Jerusalem by force, and held it three years and six months, and is then cast out of the the country by the Apostles, when he had 360 days, that is, years, at the end of which he shall begin to fall; but thirty years after, he shall be quite fallen, at the end of 1290 days; and whoever lives forty years longer, to 1335 days, will see glorious times indeed. Whether it looks so far forward or no, I cannot tell; but this, however, we may learn, First, That there is a time fixed for the period of the church's troubles, and the bringing about of her deliverance, and that this time will be punctually observed to a day. Secondly, That this time must be waited for with faith and patience. Thirdly, That, when it comes, it will abundantly recompense us for our long expectations of it. Blessed is he who, having waited long, comes to it at last, for he will then have reason to say, Lo, this is our God, and we have waited for him. 11. The question, What the end shall be Is asked by Daniel, and an answer given to it. Observe, 1. Why Daniel asked this question? It was because, though he heard what was said to the angel, yet he did not understand it, v. 8. Daniel was a very intelligent man, and had been conversant in visions and prophecies, and yet here he was fuzziest of all; he did not understand the meaning of the time, times, and the part of a time, at least, not so clearly and with so much certainty as he wished. Note, The best men are often much at a loss in their inquiries concerning divine things, and meet with that which they do not understand. But the better they are, the more sensible they are of their own weakness and ignorance, and the more ready to acknowledge it. 2. What the question was; O my Lord, What shall be the end of these things? He directs his inquiry, not to the angel that talked with him, but immediately to Christ, for to whom else should we go with our inquiries? What shall be the final issue of these events? What do they tend to? What will they end in? Note, When we take a view of the affairs of the church, and the events of God's kingdom, we cannot but think, What will be the end of these things? We see things more as if they would end in the utter ruin of God's kingdom among men; when we observe the prevalence of vice and impiety, the decay of religion, the sufferings of the righteous, and the triumphs of the ungodly over them, we may well ask, O, my Lord, what will be the end of these things? But this must satisfy us in general, that all will end well at last. Great is the truth, and will prevail at long run. All opposing rule, principality, and power, will be put down, and holiness and love will triumph, and be in honour, to eternity. The end, this end, will come. 3. What answer is returned to this question. Besides what refers to the time, (v. 11, 12.) of which we have here some general church answers. This answer sticks us in Daniel, with which he is dismissed from further attendance. (1.) He must content himself with the discoveries that had been made to him, and not inquire any further; "Go thy way, Daniel; let it suffice thee that thou hast been admitted thus far to the fore sight of things to come, but stop here. [27.] Go thy way, and record what thou hast seen and heard, for the benefit of posterity, and covet not to see and hear more at present." Note. Communion with God is not our continual feast; this world we sometimes are to be witnesses of Christ's glory, and we say, "It is good to be here; but we must go down from the mount, and have there no continuing city. These that know much, know but in part, and still see there is a great deal that they are kept in the dark about, and are likely to be so till the vast is rent: hitherto their knowledge shall go, but no further: Go thy way, Daniel, satisfied with what thou hast been told.

[2.] He must not expect that what had been said to him would be fully understood till it was accomplished: The words are closed up and sealed, are involved in perplexities, and are likely to be so, till the time of the end, till the end of all things: Daniel was ordered to seal the book to the end of the time. The Jews used to say, "When Elias cometh he will tell us all things." They are closed up and sealed; the discovery designed to be made by him is now fully settled and completed; nothing is to be added to it, or taken from it, for it is closed up and sealed, ask not therefore after more." Nescire velle quae Magister maximi num invenire non velit, eruditissima est regina. He has learned much, who is willing to be ignorant of that which the great Teacher does not choose to impart.

[3.] He must count upon no other than that, as long as the world stands, there will be still in it such a mixture as now we see there is of good and bad, v. 10. We long to see all wheat, and no tares, in God's field; all corn, and no chaff, in God's floor; but it will not be till the time of gathering, till the winnowing-day comes; both must grow together until the harvest. As it has been so, it is, and will be, "The wicked shall do wickedly, but the wise shall understand." In this, as in other things, St. John's Revelation closes as Daniel's did; (Rev. xxii. 11.) He who is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he who is holy, let him be holy still. [1.] There is no remedy, but that wicked people will do wickedly; and such people there are, and will be, in the world, to the end of time. So said the proverb of the ancients, Wickedness proceeds from the wicked; (1 Sam. xxiv. 13.) and the observation of the moderns says the same. Bad men will do bad things; and a corrupt tree will never bring forth good fruit: do men gather grapes of thorns, or bring forth good things from an evil tree? No, the natural products of wicked principles and dispositions. Marvel not at the matter then, Eccl. v. 8. We are told before, that the wicked will do wickedly, we can expect no better from them; but, which is worse, none of the wicked shall understand. This is either, First, A part of their sin: they will not understand, they shut their eyes against the light, and none so blind as they that will not see. They do wickedly, because they will not understand. If they did but rightly know the truths of God, they would readily obey the laws of God, Ps. lxxxvii. 5. Willful sin is the effect of willing ignorance; therefore they will not understand, because they are wicked; therefore they hate the light, and come not to the light, because their deeds are evil, John iii. 19. Or, Secondly, It was not put into their hearts to do wickedly, but therefore God has given them up to the mind of evil. If we consider all this, we shall not understand, nor be converted and healed, Matth. xiii. 14, 15. God will not give them eyes to see, because they will do wickedly, Deut. xxix. 4.

[2.] Yet, bad as the world is, God will secure to himself a remnant of good people in it: still there shall be some, there shall be many, to whom the providences and ordinances of God shall be a favour
AN EXPOSITION, WITH PRACTICAL OBSERVATIONS, OF THE BOOK OF THE PROPHET HOSEA.

We have now before us,
I. The twelve minor prophets; which some of the ancients, in reckoning up the books of the Old Testament, put all together, and reckon but as one book. They are called the lesser prophets, not because their writings are of any less authority or usefulness than those of the greater prophets, or as if these prophets were less in God's account, or might be so in ours, than the other, but only because they are shorter, and less in bulk, than the other.

We have reason to think that these prophets preached as much as the others, but that they did not write so much, nor is so much of their preaching kept upon record. Many excellent prophets wrote nothing, and others but little, who yet were very useful in their day. And so in the Christian church there have been many burning and shining lights, who are not known to posterity by their writings, and yet were in no way inferior in gifts, and graces, and serviceableness, to their own generation, than those who are; and some who have left but little behind them, and make no great figure among authors, were yet as valuable men as the more voluminous writers. These twelve small prophets, Josephus says, were put into one volume by the men of the great synagogue in Ezra's time, of which learned and pious body of men the three last of these twelve prophets are supposed to have been themselves members. These are what remained of the scattered pieces of inspired writing. Antiquaries value the fragmenta veterum—the fragments of antiquity; these are the fragments of prophecy, which are carefully gathered up by the Divine Providence and the care of the church, that nothing might be lost; as St. Paul's short epistles after his long ones. The son of Sirach speaks of these twelve prophets with honour, as men that strengthened Jacob, Ecclus. xlix. 10. Nine of these prophets prophesied before the captivity, and the three last after the return of the Jews to their own land. Some difference there is in the order of these books. We place them as the ancient Hebrew did; and all agree to put Hosea first; but the ancient Septuagint places the six first in this order—Hosea, Amos, Micah, Joel, Obadiah, and Jonah; the thing is not material. And if we covet to place them according to their seniority, as to some of them we shall find no certainty.

II. We have before us the prophecy of Hosea, who was first of all the writing prophets, somewhat before Isaiah. The ancients say, He was of Beth-shemesh, and of the tribe of Issachar. He continued very long a prophet; the Jews reckon that he prophesied near fourscore and ten years; so that, as Jerom observes, he prophesied of the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes, when it was at a great distance, and lived himself to see and lament it, and to improve it when it was over, for warning to its sister kingdom. The scope of his prophecy is to discover sin, and to denounce the judgments of God against a people that would not be reformed. The style is very concise and sententious, above any of the prophets; and in some places it seems to be like the book of Proverbs, without connexion, and rather to be called Hosea's sayings than Hosea's sermons. And a weighty adage may sometimes do more service than a laboured discourse. Huetius observes that many passages in the prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel seem to refer to, and to be borrowed from, the prophet Hosea, who wrote a good while before them. As Jer. vii. 34.—xvi. 9.—xxv. 10. and Ezek. xxvi. 13. speak the same with Hos. ii. 11. so Ezek. xvi. 16, &c. is taken from Hos. ii. 8. And that promise of serving the Lord their God, and David their king, Jer. xxx. 8, 9. Ezek. xxxiv, 23. Hosea had before, ch. iii. 5. And Ezek. xix. 12. is taken from Hos. xiii. 15. Thus one prophet confirms and corroborates another; and all these worketh that one and the self-same Spirit.
The mind of God is revealed to his prophet, and by him to the people, in the three first chapters, by signs and types; but, afterward, only by discourse. In this chapter, we have, I. The general title of the whole book, v. 1. II. Some particular instructions which he was ordered to give to the people of God. I. He must convince them of their sin, in going a whoring from the Lord, v. 2. 3. II. He must foretell the ruin coming upon them, in the names of their sons, which signified God’s disowning and abandoning of them, v. 4. I. He must speak to the kingdom of Judah, which still retained the pure worship of God, and assure them of the salvation of the Lord, v. 5. 4. He must give an intimation of the great mercy which was prepared for them, both for the kingdom of Judah and the latter days; (v. 10, 11.) for in this prophecy many precious promises of mercy are mixed with the threatenings of wrath.

1. The word of the Lord that came unto Hosea, the son of Beeri, in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel.

Here is, 1. The prophet’s name and surname, which he himself, as other prophets, prefixes to his prophecy, for the sake of his honor, in order to attest what he writes to be of God; he sets his hand to it, as that which he will stand by. His name Hosea, or Hoshea, (for it is the very same with Joshua’s original name,) signifies a saviour; for prophets were instruments of salvation to the people of God, so are faithful ministers, they help to save many a soul from death, by saving it from sin. 2. His surname was Ben-Beeri; as with us now, so with them then, some had their surname from their place, as Micah the Morashite, Nahum the Elkoshite; others from their parents, as Joel the son of Bethuel, and here Hosea the son of Beeri. And perhaps they made use of that distinction when the eminence of their parents was such as would derive honour upon them; but it is a groundless conceit of the Jews, that where a prophet’s father’s name is named, he also was a prophet. Beeri signifies a well, which may put us in mind of the Fountain of life and living waters from which prophets are drawn, and must be continually drawing.

2. Here is his authority and commission: The word of the Lord came to him. It was to him; it came to him as an actual mission, as a commission to do and say a certain service; and to him as to one who was his special instrument and agent. It was to him; it came over him; thus God’s word is said to fall upon a man, as in plenary or particular sense, so as to make an impression upon his understanding and conscience. It was revealed to him, a real thing, not a fancy or imagination of his own; in some such way as God then discovered himself to his servants the prophets. What he said and wrote was by divine inspiration; it was by the word of the Lord, as St. Paul speaks concerning that which he had purely by revelation, 1 Thess. ii. 13. Therefore this book was always received among the canonical books of the Old Testament, which is confirmed by what is quoted out of it in the New Testament, Matt. ii. 15.—ix. 13.—xii. 7. Rom. ix. 25, 26. 1 Pet. ii. 10. For the word of the Lord endures for ever.

3. Here is a particular account of the times in which he prophesied; in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah; and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel. We have only this general date of his prophecy, and not the date of any particular part of it, as before, in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel; and afterward, in Haggai, and Zechariah. Here is only one king of Israel named, the time of which we may more within this time; because, having mentioned the kings of Judah, there was no necessity of naming the other; and, they being all wicked, he took no pleasure in naming them, nor would do them the honour. Now by this account here given of the several reigns in which Hosea prophesied, (and it should seem the word of the Lord still came to him, more or less, at times, throughout all these reigns,) it appears,

1. That he prophesied a long time; that he began when he was very young, which gave him the advantage of strength and sprightliness; and that he continued at his work till he was very old, which gave him the advantage of experience and authority.

2. He was a great honour to him to be thus long employed in such good work, and a great mercy to the people to have a minister so long among them, that so well knew their state, and naturally cared for it; one they had been long used to, and therefore was the more likely to be useful to them. And yet, for aught that appears, he did but little good among them; the longer they enjoyed him, the less they regarded him; they despised his youth first, and afterward his age.

3. That he began to prophesy at a time when the judgments of God were abroad, when God was himself contending in a more immediate way with that sinful people, who fell into the hands of the Lord, before they were turned over into the hands of many; for in the days of Uzziah, and of Jeroboam, his contemporary, the dreadful earthquake was, mentioned, Zech. xiv. 5. and Amos i. 1. And thus was the plague of locusts, Joel i. 2. 4. Amos vii. 1. Hos. iv. 5(299,789),(551,819). The rod of God is sent to enforce the word, and the word of God is sent to explain the rod, yet neither prevails till God by his Spirit opens the ear to instruction and discipline.

4. That he began to prophesy in Israel at a time when their kingdom was in a flourishing, prosperous condition, for so it was in the reign of Jeroboam the second, as we find, 2 Kings xiv. 25. He restored the coast of Israel, and God saved them by his hand; yet then Hosea boldly tells them of their sins, and foretells their destruction. Men are not to be flattered by these sinful ways because they are so in the world, but even then must be faithfully reproved, and plainly told that their prosperity will not be their security, nor will it last long if they go on still in their trespasses.

2. The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea. And the Lord said to Hosea, Go, take unto thee a wife of whoredoms, and children of whoredoms: for the land hath committed great whoredom, departing from the Lord. So he went and took Gomer, the daughter of Diblaim; which conceived, and bare him a son. And the Lord said unto him, Call his name Jezreel; for yet a little while, and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jelus, and will cause to cease the kingdom of the house of Israel. And it shall come to pass at that day, that I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezreel. And she conceived again, and bare a daughter. And God said unto him, Call... her name Lo-ruhamah: for I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel; but I will utterly take them away. 7. But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah, and will save them by the Lord their God, and will not save them by bow, nor by sword, nor by battle, by horses, nor by horsemen.

These words, The beginning of the word of the Lord by Hosea, may refer, either, 1. To that glorious set of prophets which was raised up about this time. At this time there lived and prophesied Joel, Amos, Micah, Jonah, Obadiah, and Isaiah;* but Hosea was the first of them that foretold the destruction of Israel; the beginning of the word of the Lord was this. 2. Or we might consider the history of this Jeroboam here named, (2 Kings xiv. 27.) that the Lord had not yet said, he would blot out the name of Israel, but soon after he said he would, and Hosea was the man that began to say it; which made it so much the harder task to him, to be the first that should carry an unpleasing message, and some time before any were raised up to second him. Our Lord's own parables were the first such messages. He was the first message God sent him upon to this people, to tell them that they were an evil and an adulterous generation. He might have desired to be excused from dealing so roughly with them, till he had gained authority and reputation, and some interest in their affections. No, he must begin with this, that they might know what to expect from a prophet of the Lord. We are not to read in this message to Hosea what lies beyond this to them, but he must write it, and publish it, and leave it upon record as a witness against them. Now here,

I. The prophet must, as it were, in a looking-glass, show them their sin, and show it to be exceeding sinful, exceeding hateful. The prophet is ordered to take unto him a wife of whomrodems, and children of whomrodems, v. 2. And he did so, v. 3. He married a woman of ill fame, Gomer the daughter of Diosib; not one that had been married, and had committed adultery, for then she must have been put to death, but one that had lived scandallously in the single state. To marry such a one was not malum in se—evil in itself, but only malum per accidens—incidentally an evil; not prudent, decent, or expedient, and therefore forbidden to the priests, and they were really evil. He would be guilty of this to them, but he must write it, and publish it, and leave it upon record as a witness against them.

Now here,

I. The prophet must, as it were, through a perspectival glass, show them their ruin; and this he does in the names given to the children born of this adulteress; for as lust, when it has conceived, bringeth forth sin, so sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. 1. He foretells the fall of the royal family in the name he is appointed to give to his first child, which was a son; Call his name Jezreel; v. 4. We find these prophetic names given to his children (Isa. vii. 3.—viii. 3.) so this prophet here. Jezreel signifies the seed of God; so they should have been: but it signifies also the scattered of God; they shall be as sheep on the mountains, that have no shepherd. Call them not Israel, which signifies dominion, they have lost all the honour of that name; but call them Jezreel, which signifies dispersed, for they shall be dispersed from the Lord, the Lord will scatter them, to be scattered amongst a great multitude. They have been scattered as chaff; let them now be scattered as a chaff. Jezreel was the name of one of the royal seats of the kings of Israel: it was a beautiful city, seated in a pleasant valley, and it is with allusion to that city, that this child is called Jezreel, for yet a little while and I will avenge the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and the house of Joram. (1 Kings xxi.) We find that God has a controversy with; it is the house of Jehu, from whom the present king, Jeroboam, was lineally descended. The house of Jehu smarled for the sins of Jehu, for God often lays up men's iniquity for their children, and visits it upon them. It is the kingdom of the house of Israel, which may be either of the present royal family, that of Jehu, which God did quickly cause to cease, for the son of this Jeroboam, Zechariah, with. Giving that glory to any creature which is due to God alone, is such an injury and affront to God as if we should say, here is another agrith, reigned but six months, and he was the last of Jehu's race; or of the whole kingdom in general, which continued corrupt and wicked, and which was preserved in the kingdom of Israel, about seventy years after; and with God that is but a little while. Note, Neither the pomp of kings, nor the power of kingdoms, can secure them from God's destroying judgments, if they continue to rebel against him.

(2.) What is the ground of this controversy? I am prepared to show, that the blood of Jezeel shed upon the house of Jehu, the blood which Jehu shed at Jezerel, when, by command, he utterly destroyed the house of Ahab, and all that were in alliance with it, with all the worshippers of Baal. God approved of what he did; (2 Kings x. 30.) Thou hast done well in executing that which was right in mine eyes; and yet here will God avenge that blood upon the house of Jehu, when the time is expired during which it was promised that his family should reign, even to the fourth generation. But how comes the same action to be both rewarded and punished? Very justly; the matter of it was good; it was the execution of a righteous sentence passed upon the house of Ahab, and, as such, it was rewarded; but Jehu did it not in the name of God, or in God's interest, but in his own, not at the glory of God, and mingled his own resentments with the execution of God's justice. He did it with a malice against the sinners, but not with any antipathy to the sin; for he kept up the worship of the golden calves, and took no heed to walk in the law of God, 2 Kings x. 31. And therefore when the measure of the iniquity of his house was full, and God came to reckon with them, the first article in the account is, (and, being first, it is put for all the rest,) for the blood of the house of Ahab, here called the blood of Jezeel. Thus when the house of Baasha was rooted out, it was because he did like the house of Jeroboam, and because he killed him, 1 Kings xvi. 7. Note, Those that are intrusted with the administration of justice, are concerned to see to it, that they do it from a right principle, and with a right intention, and that they do not themselves live in those sins which they punish in others, lest even their just executions should be reckoned for, another day, as little less than murders.

(3.) How far the controversy shall proceed; it shall be not a correction, but a destruction. Some may think we have been hasty in ascribing the murder of Jezerel upon the house of Jehu. To signify, not as we read it, the revenging of that bloodshed, but the repeating of that bloodshed; "I will punish the house of Jehu, as I punished the house of Ahab, because Jehu did not take warning by the punishment of his predecessors, but trod in the steps of their idolatry. And after the house of Jehu is destroyed, I will cause to desolate the kingdom of the house of Israel; I will begin to bring it down, though now it flourish." After the death of Zacharias, the last of the house of Jehu, the kingdom of the ten tribes went to decay, and dwindled sensibly. And, in order to the ruin of it, it is threatened. (v. 5.) I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezerel; the strength of the warriors of Israel; so the Chaldees cause to desolate the kingdom of the house of Israel; I will begin to bring it down, though now it flourish. After the death of Zacharias, the last of the house of Jehu, the kingdom of the ten tribes went to decay, and dwindled sensibly. And, in order to the ruin of it, it is threatened. (v. 5.) I will break the bow of Israel in the valley of Jezerel; the strength of the warriors of Israel; so the Chaldees cause to desolate the kingdom of the house of Israel; I will begin to bring it down, though now it flourish.

Note, There is no fence against God's controversy; when he comes forth against a people, their strong bows are soon broken, and their strong holds broken down. In the valley of Jezerel they shed that blood which the righteous God would in that very place avenge upon them; and this is the more strange, considering it was by means which the Jews so often reprehended, and where the villany they suffer for was perpetuated; that the punishment may answer the sin.

2. He foretells God's abandoning the whole nation in the name he gives to the second child. This was a daughter, as the former was a son, to intimate that both sons and daughters had corrupted themselves with sin; but, whereas some make this name a woman's name, as if God would enfranchise, and was thereby enfranchised and made weak. Call the name of this daughter, Lo-ruhamah—not beloved; so it is translated, (Rom. ix. 25.) or not having obtained mercy, so it is translated, 1 Pet. ii. 10. It comes all to the same. This reads the doom of the house of Israel; I will no more have mercy upon them. This intimates that God had showed them great mercy, but they had abused his favours, and forfeited them, and now he would show them favour no more. Note, Those that forsake their own mercies for lying vanities, have reason to expect that their own mercies should forsake them, and that they should be left to their lying vanities, Jonah ii. 8. Sin turns away the mercy of God, even from the house of Israel, his own professing house, with all its advantages. But God says that he will no more have mercy upon them. And then it follows, I will utterly take them away; will utterly remove them, (so some,) will utterly pluck them up, so others. Note, When the streams of mercy are stopped, we can expect no other than that the vials of wrath should be opened. Those whom God will no more have mercy upon, shall be utterly taken away, as dust and dung. The word for taking away, or uprooting, signifies to forgive sin; and some take it in that sense here. I will no more have mercy upon them, though in pardoning I have pardoned them heretofore. Though God has borne long he will not bear always, with a people that hate to be reformed. Or, I will no more have mercy upon them, that should in any wise pardon them; or (as our margin reads it) that I should at all together pardon them. If pardoning mercy is denied, no other mercy can be expected, for that opens the door to all the rest. Some make this to speak comfort; I will no more have mercy upon them till in pardoning I shall pardon them, till the Redeemer comes to Zion to turn away ungodliness from Jacob. The Chaldees reads it, But if they return in pardoning I will pardon them, and destroy the greatest sinners, to the utmost of their heads, and pethink themselves, and return, and will find that there is forgiveness with God.

III. He must show them what mercy God had in store for the house of Judah, at the same time that he was thus contending with the house of Israel; (v. 7.) But I will have mercy upon the house of Judah. Note, Though the Jews were guilty of their disobedience, yet God will show us to himself a remnant that shall be the vessels and monuments of mercy. When divine justice is glorified in some, yet there are others in whom free grace is glorified. And though some through unbelief are broken off, yet God will have a church in this world till the end of time. It aggravates the rejection of them, that God will not permit mercy to Judah, and not on them, and magnifies God's mercy to Judah, that though they have also done wickedly, yet God did not reject them, as he rejected Israel; I will have mercy upon them, and will save them. Note, Our salvation is owing purely to God's mercy, and not to any merit of our own. Now, 1. This, without doubt, refers to the temporal salvations which God wrought for Judah in a distinguishing way, the favours shown to them, and not to Israel. When the Assyrian armies had destroyed Samaria, and carried the ten tribes away into captivity, they proceeded to besiege Jerusalem; but God had mercy on the house of Judah, and saved them by the vast slaughter, and many of the children of Israel, slain in the battle of the Assyrians; then they were saved by the Lord their God immediately, and not by sword or bow; when the ten tribes were continued in their captivity, and their land was possessed by others, when, being utterly taken away, God had mercy on the house of Judah, and saved them, and, after seventy years, brought them back, not by might or power, but by the Spirit of the Lord over it. (v. 6.) I will save them by the Lord their God, by myself. God will be exalted in his own strength, will take the work into his hands. That salvation is sure, which he undertakes to be the Author of; for if he will work, none shall hinder. And that salvation is most acceptable, which he does by himself. So the Lord alone did lead him. The less there is of man in any salvation and the more of God, the brighter it shines, and the sweeter it tastes. I will save them in the word of the Lord, (so the Chaldee,) for the sake of Christ, the eternal Word, and by his power; I will save them not by bow nor by sword. That is, (1.) They shall be saved when they are reduced to so low an ebb, that they have neither bow nor sword, to defend themselves with, (Judg. v. 8. 1 Sam. xiii. 22. ) (2.) They shall be saved from trusting to their own strength and their weapons of war, Ps. xlv. 6. (3.) They shall be saved easily, without the trouble of sword and bow, (Isa. ix. 5.) I will save them by the Lord their God. In calling him their God, he upbraids the ten tribes who had cast him off from being theirs, for which reason he had cast them off, and intimates what was the true reason why he had mercy, distinguishing mercy, for the house of Judah, and saved them; it was in pursuance of his covenant with them as the Lord their God, and in recompense for their faithful adherence to him and to his word and worship. But, 2. This may refer also to the salvation of Judah from idolatry, which qualified and prepared them for their other salvations. And this is indeed a salvation by the Lord their God; it is wrought only by the power of his grace, and can never be wrought by sword or bow. Just at the time that the kingdom of Israel was utterly taken away under Hoshea, the kingdom of Judah was gloriously reformed under Hezekiah, and was therefore preserved; and in Babylon God saved them from their idolatry first, and then from their captivity. 3. Some make this promise to look forward to the great salvation which, in the fulness of time, was to be wrought out by the Lord our God, Jesus Christ, who came into the world to save his people from their sins.

3. Now when she had weaned Lo-ruhamah, she conceived, and bare a son. 9. Then said God, Call his name Lo-ammi—for ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. 10. Yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered: and it shall come to pass, that in the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there it shall be said unto them, Ye are the sons of the living God. 11. Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together, and appoint themselves one head, and they shall come up out of the land: for great shall be the day of Jezreel.

We have here a prediction,

I. Of the rejection of Israel for a time, which is signified by the name of another child that Hosea should have by his second wife; that is, if you will not observe that these children whose names carried these direful omens in them to Israel, were all children of whoredoms, (v. 2.) all born of the harlot that Hosea married, to intimate that the ruin of Israel was the natural product of the sin of Israel. If they had not first revolted from God, they had never been rejected by him; God never leaves and forlorn them but till they first leave him. Here is, 1. The birth of this child; when she had weaned her daughter, she conceived and bare a son. Notice is taken of the delay of the birth of this child, which was to carry in its name a certain presage of their utter rejection, to intimate God's patience with them, and his loathness to proceed to extremity. Some think that her bearing another son signifies that people's persisting in their wickedness; lastly conceived and brought forth, they added to do evil; so the Chaldee paraphrase expounds it; they were old in adulteries, and obstinate.

2. The name given him. Call him Lo-ammi—not my people. When they were told that God would no more have mercy on them, they regarded it not, but buoyed up themselves with this comfort, that it was not of their own merit, but of God's grace; they could not but have mercy on. And therefore he plucks that staff from under them, and disowns all relation to them; Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God. I will not be yours; (so the word is;) I will be in no relation to you, will have nothing to do with you; I will not be your King, your Father, your Patron and Protector. We supply it very well with that which includes all, and I will not be your God; I will not be to you what I have been, nor what you vainly expect I should be, nor what I would have been if you had kept close to me.” Observe, “You are not my people; you do not act as becomes my people, you are not observant of me, and obedient to me, as my people should be; you are not my people, but the people of this and the other dungey deal; and therefore I will not own you, or regard you, nor put you in any claim to you, nor demand you, nor deliver you out of the hands of those that have seized you; let them take you, you are none of mine; you will not have me to be your God, but pay your homage to the pretenders, and therefore I will not be your God; you shall have no interest in me, shall expect no benefit from me.” Note, Our being taken into covenant with God is owing purely to him, as his grace, for then it begins on his side; I will be to them a God, and then they shall be to me a people; we love him because he first loved us; but our being cast out of covenant is owing purely to ourselves and our own folly. The breach is on man's side; You are not my people, and therefore I will not be your God; if God hate any, it is because they first spurned him, and their sin was not only not removed, but were utterly taken away into the land of Assyria, and their place knew them no more. They were no God's people, for they lost their knowledge and worship of him; no prophets were sent them, no promises made them, as were to the two tribes in their captivity; nay, they were no longer a people, but, for aught that appears, were mingled with the nations into which they were carried, and lost amongst them.

II. Of the reduction and restoration of Israel in the fulness of time. Here, as before, mercy is remembered in the midst of wrath; the rejection, as it shall not be total, so it shall not be final, (v. 10, 11.) yet the number of the children of Israel shall be as the sand of the sea. See how the same hand that wounded is stretched forth to heal, and how tenderly he that has torn, binds up; though God cause grief by his threatenings, yet is all his love, and the sweetness of his everlasting kindness. They are very precious promises which are here made concerning the Israel of God, and which may be of use to us now.

1. Some think that these promises had their accomplishment in the return of the Jews out of their captivity in Babylon, when many of the ten tribes joined themselves to Judah, under the guidance of Isaiah, and the Chaldean Captivity was no longer a problem; and took up the residence of the Jews, which Cyrus proclaimed; came up in great numbers out of the several countries into which they were dispersed, to their own land, appointed Zerubbabel their head, and coalesced into one people, whereas before they had been two distinct nations. And in their own land, where God had by his prophets disowned and rejected them as none of his, he would by his prophets own them and appear for them as his children; and from all parts of the country they shall come up to the temple to worship. And we have reason to think that though this promise has a further reference, yet it was graciously intended and piously used for the support and comfort of the captives in Babylon, as giving them a general assurance of mercy which God had for all the children of his name, who should not be destroyed so long as this blessing was in, it was in reserve for it.

2. Some think that these promises will not have their accomplishment, at least not in full, till the general conversion of the Jews in the latter days, which is expected yet to come; when the vast, incredible numbers of Jews, that are now dispersed as the sand of the sea, shall be brought to embrace the faith of Christ, and be incorporated in the gospel-church. Then, and not till then, God will own them as his people, his children, even there where they had lain under the dismal tokens of their rejection. The Jewish doctors look upon this promise as not having had its accomplishment yet. But,

3. It is certain that this promise had its accomplishment in the setting up of the kingdom of Christ, by the preaching of the gospel, and the bringing in both of Jews and Gentiles to it, for to this these words are applied by St. Paul, Rom. ix. 25, 26, and by St. Peter when he writes to the Jews of the dispersion, 1 Pet. ii. 10. Israel here is the gospel-church, the spiritual Israel, (Gal. vi. 16.) all believers who follow the steps, and inherit the blessing of God's people, are all the children of that one that believe, whether Jews or Gentiles, Rom. iv. 11, 12. Now let us see what is promised concerning this Israel.

(1.) That it shall greatly multiply, and the numbers of it be increased; it shall be as the sand of the sea, which cannot be measured nor numbered. Though Israel according to the flesh be diminished and numbered, and the people of the kingdom be few, the spiritual Israel shall be huge and vast, the high father of a multitude, had its full accomplishment, (Gen. xvii. 5.) and that, Gen. xxii. 17. Some observe, that they are here compared to the sand of the sea, not only for their numbers, but as the sand of the sea serves for a boundary to the waters, that they shall not overflow the earth, so the Israelites indeed are a wall of defence to the places where they live, to keep off judgments. God can do nothing against Sodom while Lot is there.

(2.) That God will renew his covenant with the gospel-Israel, and will incorporate it a church to himself, bringing in all the Gentiles which the Old Testament church was incorporated; may, and its privileges shall be much greater. "In the place where it was said unto them, Ye are not my people, there shall ye be again admitted into covenant, and owned as my people." The abandoned Gentiles in their respective places, and the rejected Jews in theirs, shall be favoured and blessed. And as in the days in which God was angry with their unbelief, the children, upon their believing, shall be taken in. This is a blessed resurrection, the making of these the people of God, that were not a people. Nay, but the privilege is enlarged; now it is not only, Ye are my people, as formerly, but, Ye are the sons of the living God, whether by birth ye were Jews or Gentiles. Israel under the law was God's son, his first-born, but then they were as children under age; now, under the gospel, they are grown up both to greater understanding and greater liberty, Gal. iv. 1, 2. Note, [1.] It is the unspeakable privilege of all believers, that they have the living God for their Father, the ever-living God, and may look upon themselves as his children by grace and adoption. [2.] The sonship of all believers is never lost. Wherever they are, there shall be said to them, for their comfort and satisfaction, and it shall be said for their honour in the hearing of the world, Ye are the sons of the living God. Let not the saints despise themselves, let not others despise them; for, sooner or later, there shall be a manifestation of the children of God, and all the world shall be made to know their excellency, and the value God has for them. [3.] It will add much to their comfort, very much to their honour, when they are dignified with the tokens of God's favour in that very place where they had lain long under the tokens of his displeasure. This speaks comfort to the believing Gentiles, that they need not go up to Jerusalem, to be received and owned as God's children; no, they may stay where they are, and in that place, though it be in the remotest corner of the earth; "In that place, where you were at a distance, where it was said, You are not God's people, but are separated from them, (Isa. liv. 3, 6.) even there, without leaving your country and kindred, you may by faith receive the Spirit of adoption, witnessing with your spirits, that you are the children of God." [4.] The children who had been at variance, should be haply brought together; (v. 11.) Then shall the children of Judah and the children of Israel be gathered together. This uniting of Judah and Israel, those two kingdoms that were now so much at variance, biting and devouring one another, is mentioned as a specimen, or one instance, of the happy effect of the setting up of Christ's kingdom in the world, the bringing of those that had been the greatest enemies or against another, to a good understanding one of another, and a good affection one to another. This was literally fulfilled, when the Galileans, who inhabited that part of the country which belonged to the ten tribes, and, probably, for the most part, were descended from them, so heartily joined with those that were probably called Jews, that was the case with the Galileans and the inhabitants of Jerusalem, embracing his gospel; and his first disciples were partly Jews, and partly Galileans. The first that were blessed with the light of the gospel, were of the land of Zebulun and Naphtali; (Matth. iv. 15.) and though there was no good will at all between the Jews and the Galileans, yet, upon their believing in Christ, they were happily consolidated, and there were no remains of the former dissatisfaction: they had to one another; nay, when the Samaritans believed, though between them and the Jews there
HOSEA, II.

The scene of this chapter seems to be much the same with that of the foregoing chapter, and to point at the same events, and the causes of them. As there, so here, God threateneth Israel with their own decay, and chargeth on them, the sin of their idolatry, their spiritual whoredom, their serving idols, and forgetting God, and their oblations to him, v. 1, 2, 5, 8. He threat- eneth to take away from them all the good things, with which they had served their idols, and to abandon them to rain without remedy, v. 3, 4, 6, 7, 9, 13. III. Yet he promises at last to return in ways of mercy to them for his own sake, (v. 14,) to restore them to their former plenty, (v. 15,) to cure them of their inclination to idolatry, (v. 16, 17,) to renew his covenant with them, (v. 18, 20,) and to bless them with all good things, v. 21, 25.

1. SAY ye unto your brethren, Anni, and to your sisters, Ruhamah. 2. Plead with your mother, plead; for she is not my wife, neither am I her husband: let her, therefore, put away her whoredoms out of her sight, and her adulteries from between her breasts; 3. Lest I strip her naked, and set her as in the day that she was born, and make her as a wilderness, and set her like a dry land, and shay her with thirst. 4. And I will not have mercy upon her children, for they be the children of whoredoms. 5. For their mother hath played the harlot; she that conceived them hath done shamefully: for she said, I will go after my lovers, that give me my bread and my water, my wool and my flax, mine oil and my drink.

The first words of this chapter some make the close of the foregoing chapter, and add it to the promises which we have here of the great things God would do for them; when they shall have appointed Christ their Head, and Head of all good Gentiles without distinction, shall call one another brethren and sisters, shall own another for the people of God, and beloved of him, and, for that reason, shall embrace one another, and stir up one another both to give thanks for, and to walk worthy of this common salvation which they partake of. Or, rather, because the following words seem to have a coherence with these, these alone are designed for description and ex- hibition. The mother, (v. 2,) seems to be the same with the brethren and sisters, (v. 1,) the church of the ten tribes, the body of the people, which were brethren, and in a special manner with the heads and leaders, which were as the mother by whom the rest were brought up and nursed. But who are the children that must plead with their mother thus? Either, 1. The godly that were among them, that pleaded against the iniquities of the times, let them boldly go on to bear their testimony against the idolatries and gross corruptions that prevail with them. Let them that had bowed the knee to Baal, reason the case with those that had, and endeavour to convince them with such arguments as are here put in their mouths. Note. Private persons may, and ought, in their places, to appear against the public professions of God's name and worship. Children may humbly and modestly argue with their parents, when they do amiss, Plead with your mother, plead; as Jonathan with Saul concerning David. Or, 2. The sufferers among them, that shared in the calamities of the times, let them not complain of God, let them not quarrel with him, but lay the blame on him, as if he had dealt barely with them, and not like a tender father; no, let them plead with their mother, and lay the fault on her, where it ought to be laid; compare Isa. 1. 1. "For her transgressions in your mother put away: she may thank herself, and you may thank her, for all your miseries." Let us see now how they must plead with her.

I. They must put her in mind of the relation wherein she had stood to God, the kindness he had had for her, the many favours he had bestowed upon her, and the further favours he had designed her. Let them tell them their brethren and sisters, that they had been Ammi and Rahamah, that they had been God's people, and vessels of his mercy, and might have been so still, if it had not been their own fault, v. 1. Note, Our relation to God and dependence upon his grace, are the great aggravation of our revolts from him and rebellions against him.

II. They must, in God's name, charge her with the violation of the marriage-covenant between her and God: let them tell her that God does not look upon her as his wife, nor upon himself as her Husband, any longer. Tell her (v. 2.) that she is not my wife, neither am I her husband; that by her spiritual whoredom she has forfeited all the honour and comfort of her relation to God, and provoked him to give her a bill of divorce. Note, No consideration can be more powerful to awaken us to repentance than the provocation we have by sin given to God to disown and cast us off. It is time to look about us, and to think what course we must take, whether we are in a province of grace or in that of apostacy, whether we be not our Husband. They must charge this home upon her, (v. 5.) Their mother has played the harlot; their congregation has run a whoring after false prophets, (so the Chaldee,) or, rather, after idols, wherein they were encouraged by their false prophets; she that conceived them has done shamefully, in making and worshipping idols. An idol is called a shanah, (ch. ix. 10.) and idolatry is a shameful thing. It is not only an affront to God, but a reproach to men, to fall down to the stock of a tree, as the prophet speaks; or it denotes that the sinner was shameless, impudent in sin, and could not blush; Jer. vi. 15. Or, She has made ashamed, has made all that see her ashamed of her; her own children be ashamed of their relation to her.

III. They must upbraid her with her horrid ingratitude to God her Benefactor, in ascribing to her idols the glory of the gifts he had given her, and then giving that for a reason why she paid them the homage due to him only, v. 5. In this she did shamefully indeed, that she said, I will go after my lovers, that is, my idols, (ch. ix. 10.) and idolatry is a shameful thing. It is not only an affront to God, but a reproach to men, to fall down to the stock of a tree, as the prophet speaks; or it denotes that the sinner was shameless, impudent in sin, and could not blush; Jer. vi. 15. Or, She has made ashamed, has made all that see her ashamed of her; her own children are ashamed of their relation to her.

IV. They must persuade her to repent and reform; God will disown her if she persist in her whoredoms, let her therefore put away her whoredoms, v. 2. Let her be convinced that it is possible for her to reform; the idols, dear as they are, may yet be parted with, and it will certainly be well with her, if she do so. God and his congregation must be to drive them to repentance, not to drive them to despair. Let her put away her whoredoms, and her adulteries; the doubling of words to the same purport, and both plural, denotes the abundance of idolatries they were guilty of, all which must be abandoned, ere God would be reconciled to them. Let her put them out of her sight, as detestable things which she cannot endure to look upon; let her say unto them, Get ye hence, Isa. xxx. 22. Let her put them from her face, and from between her breasts. Let her not do as harlots use to do, that both discover their own wicked disposition, and allure others to wickedness, by painting their faces, and exposing their naked breasts, and adorning them; let her not thus, by annexing all possible allurements and attractions, and worshiping herself, allure herself, and allure others, to it. Let her put away all these. Every sinful course, persisted in, is an adulterous departure from God. And here we may see what it is truly to repent of, and turn from it. 1. True penitents will forsake both open sins and secret sins; will put away not only the whoredoms that lie in sight, but those that lie in secret between their breasts; the sin that is repented under the tongue as a sweet morsel. 2. They will both avoid the outward occasions of sin, and mortify the inward disposition to it. Idolaters walked after their own cresses, which went a whoring after their idols; (Ezek. vi. 9. Deut. iv. 19.) and therefore they must put them away out of their sight, lest they should be tempted to worship them; Look not upon the naked woman, when it is red. But when the root must be laid to the root, the corrupt bent and inclination of the heart must be changed, and it must be put away from between the breasts, that Christ alone may have the innermost and uppermost place there, Cant. i. 13.

V. They must show her the utter ruin that will certainly be the fatal consequence of such sin; it do not repent and reform, (v. 3.) Let me strip her naked. This comes in here not by way of sentence passed upon her, but by way of warning given to her, that she may prevent it; Let her put away her whereatons, that I may not strip her naked; so it may be; and intimating that God will show mercy to sinners, if they would but qually themselves for that mercy. It is here said, that God would deal with her as the just and jealous husband at length does with an adulterous wife, that has filled his house with a surfeite brood, and will not be reclaimed; he turns her and her children out of doors and sends them a begging; I will not have mercy upon her children; (v. 4.) the particular persons that share in the calamity of the nation, and the former generation, shall be reproved by it, for they and their children, of whoredoms, and keep up no conversation received by tradition from their fathers. Now it is here threatened that they shall be both stripped and starved; they thought their idols gave them their bread and their water, their wool and their flax; but God, by taking them away, will let them know it was he that gave them.

1. They shall be stripped; Let I strip her of all her ornaments which she is proud of, and with which she courts her lovers; strip, her, and set her as in the day that she was born, and her as naked out of the world as she came into it; this death does, Job i. 21. I will strip her, and so expose her to cold, and expose her to shame; and justly is she exposed to shame, that did shamefully, v. 5. The day when God brought them out of Egypt, where they were not, and the day of the long obedience, was the day in which they were born; and God threatens to bring them back to as low and miserable a condition as he then found them in. Whatever they had that either gained them respect, or screened them from contempt, among their neighbours, should be taken from them. See Ezek. xvi. 4, 5.

2. They shall be starved; shall be deprived not only of their honours, but of her comforts and necessary supports. She shall be famished, shall be made as a wilderness and a dry land, and slain with thirst. That boasted so much of her bread and water, her oil, and her drinks, which her lovers had given her, shall not have so much as necessary food. The land shall not afford subsistence for the inhab- itants, for want of the rain of heaven; or, if it do, it shall be taken from them by the enemy, so that the rightful owners shall perish for want of it. Some understand it thus; I will make her as she was in the wilderness, and set her as she was in the desert land, where she was sometimes ready to perish for thirst. So it explains the former part of the verse, I will set her as in the day that she was born; for it was in the vast howling wilderness that Israel was first taken from Egypt. Thus she shall be in a deplorable condition as their fathers were in, whose carcasses fell in the wilderness, and, in this respect, worse, that then the children were reserved to be heirs of the land of promise, but now, I will not have mercy upon her children, for their mother has played the harlot.

6. Therefore, behold, I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and make a wall, that she shall not find her paths. And she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them; and she shall seek them, but shall not find them: then shall she say, I will go and return to my first husband; for then was it better with me than now. For she did not know that I gave her corn, and wine, and oil, and multiplied her silver and gold, which they prepared for Baal. Therefore will I return, and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax given to cover her nakedness. And now will I discover her lewdness in the sight of her lovers, and none shall deliver her out of my hand. I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feast-days, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn feasts. And I will destroy her vines, and her fig-trees, wherewith she hath said, These are my rewards, that my lovers have given me: and I will make them a forest, and the beasts of the field shall eat them. And I will visit upon her the days of Balahim, wherein she burnt incense to them, and she decked herself with her ear-rings and her jewels, and she went after her lovers, and forgot me, saith the Lord.

God here goes on to threaten what he would do with this treacherous, idolatrous people; and therefore he warns, that he may not wond, therefore he threatens, that he may not strike. If he turn not, he will whet his sword; (Ps. vii. 12.) but if he turn, he will sheathe it. They did not turn, and therefore all this came upon them; and its being threatened before, shows that it was the execution of a divine sentence, upon them for their wickedness; and it is written for admonition to us. I. They shall be perplexed and embarrassed in all their counsels, and disappointed in all their expectations. This is threatened, v. 6, 7. But to the threatening is annexed a promise, that this shall be a means to convince them of their folly, and bring them home to their duty; and they shall go no more like to a threatening, but in truth to the mercy God has yet in reserve for them. And this being the happy fruit and effect of the distress, it is hard to say whether the prediction or the distress itself, should be called a threatening or a promise.

1. God will raise up difficulties and troubles in their way, so that their public counsels and affairs shall have no success, nor shall they be able to get forward. Then I will hedge up thy way with thorns, with such crosses as, like thorns and briers, are the product of sin and the curse, and are scratching, and tearing, and vexing, and, when the way we are in is hedged up with them, stop our progress, and force us to turn back. She said, I will go after my lovers; I will pursue my leagues and alliances with foreign powers, and depend upon them. But God says, She shall be frustrated in these projects, and not able to proceed in them. I will hedge up thy way with thorns, and if that do not serve, I will make a wall. If some lesser difficulties be got over, and prevail not to break thy measures, God will raise greater, for he will overcome when he judges. It shall be such a hedge, and such a wall, that she shall not find her paths. The changes of the person that I, I will hedge up thy way, and then, She shall not find it, is usual in scripture, especially in an earnest way of speaking. "Sinner, do thou take notice, I will hedge up thy way, and all you that are by-standers, take notice what will be the effect of this, you may observe that she cannot find her paths." She shall be as a traveller that in a new way not which way to go, of many that are before him, but that finds no way at all to go forward. And then she shall follow after her lovers, but she shall not overtake them; she shall endeavour to make an interest in the Assyrians and Egyptians, and to have them for her protectors, but she shall not gain her point; they shall either not come into confederacy with her, or not do her serve, shall help in vain, and be as the staff of a broken reed. She shall seek them, but shall not find them, shall seek to her idols, but shall not find that satisfaction in them, that she promised herself; the gods whom she trusted and courted, not only can do nothing for her, but have nothing to say to her, to encourage her. Now, (1.) This is such a just judgment as the Solomonites met with, that were struck with blindness, and deserted themselves to find the door, (Gen. xix. 11.) and the Syrians, 2 Kings vi. 18. Note, Those that are most resolute in their sinful pursuits, are commonly most crossed in them. Thorns and snares are in the way of the firebrands; (Prov. xxv. 5.) and thus with them God shows himself firebrand, (Ps. xviii. 26.) and walks contrary to those that walk contrary to him, Lev. xxvi. 25, 28, 24. The planting prevails, if the tenders are so to be accounted; they are God's hedges, to keep us from transgressing, to restrain us from wandering out of the green pastures, to withdraw man from his purpose, (Job xxxiii. 17.) to make the way of sin difficult, that we may not go on in it, and to keep us from it whether we will or not. We have reason to bless God for restraining grace, and for those difficulties that God raises up in their way, shall raise up in their minds thoughts of turning back; "Then shall she say, Since I cannot overtake my lovers, I will even go and return to my first husband, will return to God, and humble myself to him, and desire him to take me in again; for when I kept close to him, it was every way better with me than with others." (2.) Two things are here considered from this degenerate, apostate people. (1.) A just acknowledgment of the folly of their apostasy. They are now brought to own that it was better with them while they kept close to their God than ever it was since they forsook him. Note, Whoever have exchanged the service of God for the service of the world and the flesh, have sooner or later, been made to see the palpable change for the worse that while they continued in good company, and went on in the way of good duties, and made conscience how they spent their time, and what they said or did, it was better with them, they had more true comfort and enjoyment of themselves than ever they had since they went astray. (2.) A good purpose to come back again to their duty; I will go, and return to the Lord; and she knows so much of his goodness and readiness to forgive, that she speaks without any doubt of his receiving her again into favour, and making her condition as good as ever. Note, The disappointments we meet with in our pursuits of satisfaction in the creature, should, if nothing else will do it, drive us at length to the Creator, in whom alone it is to be had. When Moab is a curse of my first husband, he shall go to the sanctuary, Isa. xvi. 12. And when the prodigal son is reduced to husks, short allowance indeed, and remembers that in his father's house there is bread enough, then he says, I will arise, and go to my father's house, Luke xv. 17, 18.

II. The necessary supports and comforts of life so sparingly given them, because they had dishonoured God with all their members, v. 8, 9. Their land was plentiful. Now see here, 1. How graciously their plenty was given to them. God gave them not only corn for necessity, but wine for delight, and oil for ornament. Nay, he multiplified their silver and gold, wherewith to traffic with other nations, and bring home their products, and which they might hold up for posterity. Silver and gold will keep longer than corn, and wine, and oil. He gave them wood and flax too, to cover their nakedness, and to serve for ornament enough to them, Ezek. xvi. 10. Note, God is a bountiful Benefactor even to those who, he forsakes, will be ungrateful and unhumble to him. 2. How basely their plenty was abused by them. (1.) They robbed God of the honour of his gifts; She did not know that I gave her corn and wine; she did not remember it. The law and the prophets had told them, again and again, that all their comforts they received from God's bountiful providence; but they were so often told by their false prophets that they should not depend on God, that their land from such an idol, and their wine from such an idol, &c. that they had quite forgotten their relation to their great Benefactor, and their obligations to him. She did not consider it, she would not acknowledge it; this they were willingly ignorant of, and more bruitly and unhumble to him. 3. 18. How justly their plenty should be taken from them; They prepared them for Baal; they adorned their images with gold and silver, (Jer. x. 4.) and adorned themselves, for therefore shall I take off their images, v. 13. See Ezek. xvi. 17.—19. Where he saith, (so the margin reads it,) the image of Baal. Note, It is a very great dishonour to the God of heaven to make those gifts of his providence the food and fuel of our lusts, which he gave us for our support in his service, and to be oil to the wheels of our obedience. 3. How justly their plenty should be taken from them; "Then shall I return, I will alter my dealings with them, will take another course, and will take away my corn, and other good things that I gave her." I will recover it; a law-term, as a man by due course of law recovers what is unjustly detained from him; or, as when the tenant has committed waste, the landlord recovers locum vastatum—delapidulations. Observe, God calls it my corn and my wine, and not yours and my; they called it theirs, not God's; nor did they think that those things should be given to those who knew that they were not theirs, he only allowed them the use of them as tenants, intrusted them with the management of them as stewards, but still reserved the property in himself; It is my corn and my wine. Note, God will have us to know, not only that we have all our creature-comforts and enjoyments from him, but that he has still an incontestable right and title to them, that they are more his than ours, and therefore are to be used for him, and accounted for to him. He will therefore take it away from them, because they have forfeited it by disowning his right; as a tenant by copy of court- roll, who holds at the will of his lord, forfeits his estate if he makes a sedent of it as though he were a freeholder. He will recover it, will free or deliver it, that it may be no longer abused; as the creature is said to be delivered from the bondage of corruption, under which it groans, Rom. viii. 21. He will take it away in the time thereof, and in the season thereof, then when they expected it, and thought that they were sure of it. It shall suffer shipwreck in the harbour; and the harvest shall be lost. He will take it away by unseasonable weather, or by unreasonable men. Note, Those that abuse the mercies God gives them to his dishonour, cannot expect to enjoy them long. III. They shall lose all their honour, and be exposed to contempt; (v. 10.) "I will discover h.

HOSEA, II.

_10._ The is dependence; will be unless, from this, a _sign_ is to be seen exceeding sinful. And this in the sight of her lovers; in the sight of the neighbouring nations, with whom she courted an alliance, and on whom she had a dependence; they shall despise her, and be ashamed of her because of her weakness, and poverty, and ill conduct; they shall not think her any longer worthy of their friendship._

Jer. vi. 8.

She shall despise her, because they have seen her nakedness. Or, in the sight of the sun, which she worshipped as her lovers, before them shall her tenderness be discovered. Compare this with Jer. viii. 1, 2. They shall bring out the bones of their kings and princes, and scatter them before the sun and moon, whom they have loved and served. Note, Sin will have shame; let those expect it that have done shamefully. What other lot can this impudent adulteress expect but that of a common harlot, to be carted through the town? And when God comes to deal thus with her, none shall deliver her out of his hands; neither the gods nor the men they confide in. Note, Those who will not deliver themselves into the hand of God's mercy, cannot be delivered out of the hand of his judgment.

IV. They shall lose all their pleasure, and shall be left melancholy; (v. 11.) I will cause her mirth to cease. It seems then, though they had gone a whoring from their God, yet they could find in their hearts to rejoice as other people, which is forbidden, ch. ix. 1. Note, Many who lie under guilt and wrath, are yet very joyous and merry, and live jovially; yet whether they shall find their joy to be sad or no, it is certain that the end of their mirth will be heaviness; for God will cause all their mirth to cease. It is as Mr. Burroughs observes here, Sin and mirth can never hold long together; but if men will not take away sin from their mirth, God will take away mirth from their sin.

1. God will take away the occasions of their sacred mirth; their feast-days, their new moons, their sabbaths, and their festivals. The sabbaths were instituted to be observed in a religious manner, and they were to be observed with rejoicing; and, it seems, though they had departed from the pure worship of God, yet they kept up the observation of these; not at God's temple at Jerusalem, for they had long since forsaken that, but, probably, at Dan and Bethel, where the calves were, or in some other places at meeting that they had. They observed them, not for the honour of God, or with any true devotion toward him, but only because they were times of mirth and feasting, music and dancing, and meeting of friends, received by tradition from their fathers. Thus, when they had lost the power of godliness, and denied that, yet, for the pleasing of a vain and carnal mind, they kept up the form of it; and because the feast-days and sabbaths became an iniquity which God could not be without, Isa. i. 13. Now observe, (1.) God calls them their new moons, and their sabbaths, not his, (he disowns them,) but theirs. (2.) He will cause them to cease. Note, When men by their sins have caused the life and substance of ordinances to cease, it is just with God by his judgments to cause the remembrance of them and their use to cease.

2. He will take away the supports of their carnal mirth. They loved the new moons and the sabbaths, only for the sake of good cheer that was in it, and not for the sake of any religious exercise then performed, these they had dropped long ago; and now God will take away their provisions for these solemnities. (v. 12.) I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees. Note, If men destroy God's word and ordinances, by which he should be honoured on their feast-days, it is just with him to destroy their vines and fig-trees, with which they regale themselves. While they took the pleasure of these, they gave their lovers the praise of them; "These are my rewards which my lovers have given me; I may thank my stars for these, and my worship of them; I may thank my neighbours for these, and my alliance with them." And therefore God will destroy them, will wither them with a blast, or bring in a foreign enemy that shall lay their country waste, so that they shall become a forest; the enclosures shall be thrown down, as is usual in war, all shall be laid in common, so that the beasts of the field shall eat their grapes and their figs. Or, they shall be so blasted with the east wind, that fruit-trees shall be of no more use than forest-trees; but, being withered and good for nothing, what fruit there is shall be left to the beasts of the field. Or, it shall be devoured by their enemies, by men as barbarous as wild beasts.

Now, (1.) This shall be the ruin of their mirth; God will cause all her mirth to cease. How will he do it? Taking away the new moons and the sabbaths will not do it, they can very easily part with them, and find no loss; but I will destroy her vines and her fig-trees, will take away her sensual pleasures, and make her to become a forest. Note, The destruction of the vines and the fig-trees causes all the mirth of a carnal heart to cease; it will say, as Micah, You have taken away my gods, and what have I more?

(2.) This shall be the punishment of her idolatry, (v. 13.) I will visit upon her the days of Baalim; I will reckon with her for all the worship of the Baals they had, and then she will think of, from the days of their fathers unto this day. We read of their worshiping Baal as long ago as the time of the Judges, and, for aught I know, this may look as far back as those times, those days of Baalim; for it is in the second commandment, which forbids idolatry, that God threatens to visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children; and justly is that sin so visited, more than any other, because it commonly supports itself by prescription and tradition, from their fathers unto this day. We read of their worshiping Baal as long ago as the time of the Judges, and, for aught I know, this may look as far back as those times, those days of Baalim; for it is in the second commandment, which forbids idolatry, that God threatens to visit the iniquities of the fathers upon the children; and justly is that sin so visited, more than any other, because it commonly supports itself by prescription and tradition, from their fathers unto this day. For, if the measure of the iniquity of Israel was full, all their former sins came into the account, and shall be required of this generation. Or, the days of Baalim are the solemn festival-days which they kept in honour of their idols. Days of sinful mirth must be visited in days of mourning. These were the days wherein she burnt incense to idols, and, to grace the solemnity, decked herself with her ear-rings and her jewels; that, appearing honourable, the honour she did to Baal might be thought the greater. Or, she was as a wife that decks herself with the ear-rings and jewels that her husband gave her, to make herself amiable to her lovers, whom she follows after, and is ever mindful of. But she forgot me, saith the Lord. Note, Our treacherous departures from God are owing to our forgetfulness of him, of his nature and attributes, his relation to us, and our obligations to him. Many who plead that they have weak memories, and forget the things of God, can remember other things well enough; nay, it is because they are so mindful of lying vanities that they are so forgetful of their own mercies.

14. Therefore, behold, I will allure her, and bring her into the wilderness, and speak comfortably unto her. 15. And I will give her her vineyards from thence, and the valley of Achor for a door of hope; and she shall sing there, as in the days of her youth, and as in the day when she came up out of the land of Egypt. 16. And it shall be at that day, saith the Lord, that thou shalt call me Ishi, and shalt call me no more Baal. 17. For I will take away the names of Baalim out of her mouth, and they shall no more be remembered by their name. 18. And in that day will I make a covenant for them with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground: and I will break the bow, and the sword, and the battle out of the earth, and will make them to lie down safely. 19. And I will betroth thee unto me for ever; yea, I will betroth thee unto me in righteousness, and in judgment, and in loving-kindness, and in mercies: 20. I will even betroth thee unto me in faithfulness; and thou shalt know the Lord. 21. And it shall come to pass in that day, I will hear; saith the Lord, I will hear the heavens; and they shall hear the earth; 22. And the earth shall hear the corn, and the wine, and the oil; and they shall hear Jer- reel. 23. And I will sow her unto me in the earth; and I will have mercy upon her that had not obtained mercy; and I will say to them which were not my people, Thou art my people; and they shall say, Thou art my God.

The state of Israel, ruined by their own sin, did not look so black and dismal in the former part of the chapter, but that the state of Israel, restrained by the divine grace, looks as bright and pleasant here in the latter part of the chapter; and the more surprisingly so, as the promises follow thus close upon the threatenings: nay, which is very strange, they are by a note of connexion joined to, and inferred from, that declaration of their sinfulness, upon which the threatenings of their ruin are grounded: She went after her lovers, and forgot me, saith the Lord; therefore I will allure her. Fifty three during the wilderness, which is the note of connexion, immediately followed with a note of admiration, Behold, I will allure her! When it was said, She forgot me, one would think it should have followed, “Therefore I will abandon her, I will forget her, I will never look after her more;” no, Therefore, I will allure her. Note, God’s thoughts and ways of mercy are infinitely above ours; his reasons are superintending, which are not known to us. 24. Therefore, because she will not be restrained by the denunciations of wrath, God will try whether she will be wrought upon by the offers of mercy. Some think it may be translated, comforting, or ADONAI Loew, and the design is plainly to magnify free grace to those on whom God will have mercy purely for mercy’s sake.

Now that which is here promised to Israel is, 1. That, though now they were disconsolate, and ready to despair, they should again receive with comforts and hopes, v. 14, 15. This is expressed here with an allusion to God’s dealings with that people when he brought them out of Egypt, through the wilderness to Canaan; as their forlorn and de-

The gracious methods God will take with them. (1.) He will bring them into the wilderness, as he did at first when he brought them out of Egypt, where he instructed them, and took them into covenant with himself. The land of their captivity shall be to them now as that wilderness was then, the furnace of affliction, in which God will choose them. See Ezek. xx. 35, 36. I will bring you into the wilderness of the people, and there will I plead with you. God had said that he would make them as a wilderness, (v. 3.) which was a threatening; now when it is here made part of a promise that he would bring them into the wilderness, the meaning may be, that he would by his grace bring them into their own wilderness, and show them how to live humble lives under humblest providences; being poor, they shall be poor in spirit, shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity, and then they are prepared to have comfort spoken to them. When God delivered Israel out of Egypt, he led them into the wilderness, to humble them and prove them, that he might do them good, (Deut. viii. 2, 3, 16.) and so he will do again. Note, Those whom God has mercy in store for he first brings into a wilderness, into solitude and retirement, that they may the more freely converse with him out of the noise of this world; into distress of mind, through sense of guilt and dread of wrath, which brings a soul to be quite at a loss in itself and bewildered, and by those convictions he prepares for consolation; and sometimes into outward distress and trouble, by that to open the ear to discipline. (2.) He will then allure them, and speak comfortably to them; will persuade them, and speak to their hearts; he will by his word and spirit incline their hearts to return to him, and encourage them to do so. He will allure them with the promises of his favour, as before he had terrified them with the threatenings of his wrath. His word and spirit are the instruments of his grace; such as God has prepared them for; so he will lay his prophesy and by his providences, as before he had spoken roughly; (Isa. xl. 1, 2.) By the hand of my servants the prophets I will speak comfort to her heart; so the Chaldee. This refers to the gospel of Christ, and the offers of divine grace in the gospel, by which we are allured to forsake our sins, and to turn to God, and which speaks to the heart in a way to convince the sinner of sin, and to call him to his case; speaks abundant consolation to those that sorrow for sin, and lament after the Lord. And when by the Spirit it is indeed spoken to the heart effectually, and so as to reach the conscience, (which it is God’s prerogative to do,) O what a blessed change is wrought by it! Note, The best means of regaining that hearts with which God is not pleased is to use the strongest means. By the promise of rest in Christ we are invited to take his yoke upon us; and the work of conversion may be forwarded by comforts as well as by convictions. (3.) He will give her her vineyards from thence; from that time, and from that place where he has afflicted her, and brought her to see her folly, and to humble herself, from thence forward he will do her good; not only speak comfort foritably to her, but do well for her, andundo what he had done against her. He had destroyed her
HOSEA, II.

1. The idols of Baal shall not be mentioned, nor any of the Baals that in the days of Baalim had made so great a noise with O Baal, hear us; O Baal, hear us. The very names of Baalim shall be taken out of their mouths; they shall be so disdained, that they shall be quite forgotten, as if their names had not been; and in the mouth of a people and a nation so detested, that people will not bear to mention them themselves, or to hear others mention them; so that posterity shall scarcely know that ever there were such things. They shall be so ashamed of their former love to Baal, that they shall do all they can to blot out the remembrance of it. They shall style themselves up to the strictest literal meaning of the word law against their former idolatry. There shall be no mention of the names of other gods, neither let it be heard out of thy mouth, as David, Ps. xvi. 4. Thus the apostle expresses the abhorrence we ought to have of all fleshly lusts; Let them not be once named among you, Eph. v. 3. But how can such a change of the Ethiopian's skin be wrought? It is answered, The power of God can do it, and will. I will take away the names of Baalim, Zech. xiii. 2. I will cut off the names of the idole. Note, God's grace in the heart will change the language by making that iniquity to be loathed which was beloved, Zeph. iii. 9. I will turn to the people a pure language. One of the rabbins says, This promise relates to the Gentiles as well as Israel; and we know it had its accomplishment in the turning of the Gentiles, by the preaching of the Gospel from the idolatries which they had been wedded to, 1 Thess. i. 9.

2. The very word Baal shall be hid aside, even its innocent significations. God says, Thou shalt call me Ithi, and call me no more Baal; both signifying my husband, and both had been made use of concerning God, Isa. liv. 5. Thy Maker is thy Husband, thy Baal, so the word is, thy Owner, Patron, and Protector. It is probable that many such people had, accordingly, made use of the word Baal, in worshipping the God of Israel; when their wicked neighbours bowed the knee to Baal, they gloried in this, that God was their Baal; "But," says God, "you shall call me so no more, because I will have the very names of Baalim taken away." Note, That which is very innocent in itself, should, when it has been abused to idolatry, be abolished, and the word itself be taken away out of the minds and mouths of people, to keep idols in remembrance, much less to keep them in reputation. When calling God Ithi will do as well, and signify as much, as Baal, let that word be chosen rather, lest by calling him Baal, others should be put in mind of their quondam Baals. Some think there that is another reason intimated why God would be called Ithi, and not Baal; they both signify my husband, but Ithi is a compellation of love and sweetness and familiarity, Baal of reverence and subjection. Ithi is vir meus—my husband, Baal is dominus meus—my lord. In gospel-times God has so revealed himself to us as to encourage us to come boldly to the throne of his grace, and to use a holy, humble freedom there; we ought to call God our Master, for so he is; but we are more taught to call him our Father. Ithi is man of the Lords, (Gen. iv. 1) and intimates that in gospel-times the church's Husband shall be the Man Christ Jesus; made like unto his brethren, and therefore they shall call him Ithi, not Baal.

III. That though they had been much addicted to the worship of Baal, they should now be perfectly weaned from it, should relinquish and abandon all appearances of idolatry, and approaches towards it, and cleave to God only, and worship him as he appoints, v. 16, 17. Note, The surest pledge and token of God's favour to any people is, his effectual joining between them and their beloved sins. The worship of Baal was the sin that did most easily beset the people of Israel, it was their own iniquity, the sin that had dominion over them; but now that idolatrie shall be quite abolished, and there shall be not the least remnant of it among them.

Transquillus Deus tranquillat omnia—

When God is at peace with us, he makes every creature to be so too. The inferior creatures shall do them no harm, as they had done, when the beasts of the field ate up their vineyards, (v. 12.) and when noisome beasts were one of God's sorer judgments, Ezek. xiv. 13. The foul and the creeping things are taken into this covenant, for they also, when God makes use of them as the instruments of his righteousness, and for their own comfort, and if the inferior creatures are thus laid under an engagement to serve us, it is our part of the covenant not to abuse them, but to serve God with them. Some think that this had its accomplishment in the miraculous power Christ gave his disciples to take up serpents, Mark xvi. 17, 18. It agrees with the promises made particularly to Israel, that they should multiply and possess the land, (Ezek. xlii. 14.) xliii. 9.) that he will cause the evil beasts to come out of the land; and the more general ones to all the saints; (Job v. 22, 23.) The beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee; and, (Ps. xci. 13.) Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder. But this is not all; men are more in danger from one another than from the brute beasts, and therefore it is further promised, that God will not only keep them safe, but make them to lie down safely, as those that know themselves to be under the protection of Heaven, and therefore are not afraid of the powers of hell.

IV. That, though God had given them a bill of divorce for their whoredoms, yet, upon their repentance, he would again take them into covenant with him. The parable of the vineyard, (v. 5.) God's making a covenant for them with the inferior creatures was a great favour; but it was nothing to this, that he took them into covenant with himself, and engaged himself to do them good. Observe, 1. The nature of this covenant; it is a marriage-covenant, founded in choice and love, and founding the nearest relation; I will betroth thee unto me; and again, a third time, I will betroth thee to me. Note, That which are sincerely devoted to God, are betrothed to him; God gives them the most sacred and inviolable security imaginable, that he will love them, protect them, and provide for them; that he will do the part of a husband to them; and that he will incline their hearts to join themselves to him, and will graciously accept of them in so doing. Believing souls are the bride of Christ. 2. This church is the bride, the Lamb's wife; and they would never come into that relation to him, if he did not by the power of his grace betroth them to himself. The separation begins on our side, we alienate ourselves from God; the coalition begins on his side, he betrothes us to himself. 2. The duration of this agreement; I will betroth thee for ever. The covenant itself shall be inviolable; God will not break it on his part, and you shall not on yours; and the blessings of it shall be everlasting. One of the Jewish rabbins says, This is a promise that she shall attain to the life of the world to come, which is absolute eternity or perpetuity. 3. The manner how this covenant shall be made; (1.) In righteousness and judgment; God will deal sincerely and uprightly in covenanting with them; they have broken covenant, and God is righteous; "But," says God, "I will renew the covenant in righteousness." The matter shall be so ordered, that God may receive even these backsliding children into his family again, without any reflection upon his justice; nay, that he may be satisfied with the pleasure he has, very much to the honour of it. But what reason can there be why God should take a people into covenant with him, that had so often dealt treacherously? Will it not reflect upon his wisdom? "No," says God, "I will do it in judgment; not rashly, but upon due consideration; let me alone to give a reason for the thing, and to justify my own conduct. (2.) In loving-kindness and in mercy, God will deal tenderly and graciously in covenanting with them; and will be not only as good as his word, but better; and as he will be just in keeping covenant with them, so he will be merciful in keeping them in the covenant. They are subject to many infirmities, and, if he be extreme to mark what they do amiss, they will soon lose the benefit of the covenant. He therefore spoke these words, that he might show grace, made in a compassionate consideration of their infirmities, so that every transgression in the covenant shall not throw them out of covenant; he will gather with everlasting loving-kindness. (3.) In faithfulness; every article of the covenant shall be punctually performed; faithful is he that has called them, and so will he do, he cannot deny himself. "The more they have trespassed, the more they shall be kept right and faithful to the covenant on their part. Thou shalt know the Lord. This is not only a promise that God will reveal himself to them more fully and clearly than ever, but that he will give them a heart to know him; they shall know more of him, and shall know him in another manner than ever yet. The ground of their apostasy was, not knowing God to be his Benefactor; (v. 8.) therefore, to prevent the like, they shall all be taught of God to know him. Note, God keeps up his interest in men's souls by giving them a good understanding and a right knowledge of things, Heb. viii. 11. 4. That, though the heavens had been to them as brass, and the earth as iron, now the heavens shall yield back to them. The earth yieldeth not its fruits, v. 21, 22. God having united them, the gospel-church, and in it all believers, to himself, now shall he not with himself and with his Son freely give them all things, all things pertaining both to life and godliness, all things they need or can desire! All is theirs, for they are Christ's, betrothed to him; and with the righteousness of the kingdom of God, which they seek, all other things shall be added unto them. And yet this promise of corn and wine is to be taken also in a spiritual sense; (so the learned Dr. Pocock thinks; it is an effusion of those blessings and graces which relate to the soul, that is here promised under the metaphor of temporal blessings; the dew of heaven, as well as the fatness of the earth, and that put first, as in the blessing of God, which they seek, v. 24.) God ren- unded (v. 9.) that he would take away the corn and the wine; but now he promises to restore them again, and that in the common course and order of nature. While they lay under the judgment of famine, they call to the earth for corn and wine for the support of themselves and their families; very gladly would the earth have supplied them, but she cannot give unless she receive, cannot produce corn and wine unless she be enriched with the river of God; (Ps. lxxv. 9.) and therefore she calls to the heavens for rain, the former and latter rain in their season, gapes for it, and by her melancholy aspect when rain is denied, pleads for it; "But," say the heavens, "we have no rain to give, unless he who has the key of the clouds, unlock them, and open these bottles; so that if the Lord do not help you, we cannot." But when God takes them into covenant with himself, then the wheel of nature shall be set going again in favour of them, and the streams of mercy shall flow in the usual channel; Then I will hear the heathen, and answer the earth, and pour down seasonable rain upon it; and then the earth shall bear the corn and views, and supply them with moisture, and they shall be inhabited; and be replenished with and refreshment for them that inhabit Jezreel. See here the coherence of second causes with one another, as links in a chain, and the necessary dependence they all have upon God the first Cause. Note, We must expect all our comforts from God in the usual method and by the appointed means; and when we are at any time disappointed in them, we must look up to God, to God, and to God; and take heart, and be comforted, and be sufficient for them that inhabit Jezreel. See here how the creatures are to serve the people of God, how desirous of the honour; the corn cries to the earth, the earth to the heavens, the heavens to God, and all that they may supply them. And see how ready God is to give relief; I will hear, saith the Lord, yea, I will hear. And if God will hear the cry of the heavens for his people, how much more he will hear the petition of his for them, who is made higher than the heavens. See what a peculiar delight those that are in covenant with God may take in their creature-comforts, as seeing them all come to them from the hand of God; they can run up all the streams to the fountain, and taste covenant-love in common mercies, which makes them doubly sweet.

VI. That, where there were now dispersed, not only as Simon and Levi, divided in Jacob and scattered in Israel, but divided and scattered all the world over, God will turn this curse, as he did that, into a blessing; "I will not only water the earth for her, but will sow her unto me in the earth; her dispersion shall be not like that of the chaff in the floor, which the wind drives away, but like that of the seed in the field, in order to its greater increase; whereas they are scattered, and shall take root downward, and bear fruit upward. The good seed are the children of the kingdom. I will sow her unto me." This alludes to the name Jeroboam, which signifies, son of God, or for God; as she was scattered of him, (which is one signification of the words,) so she shall be sown of him; and to what he sows he will give the increase. When in all parts of the world Christianity got footing, and everywhere there were professors of it, then this promise was fulfilled, I will sow her unto me in the earth. Note, The greatest blessing of this earth is, that God has a church in it, and from that arises all the tributes of glory which he has out of it; it is what he has sown to himself, and what he will therefore secure to himself. When God's people had been Lo-ammi and Lo-ruhamah—not a people, and not finding mercy with God, now they shall be restored to his favour, and taken again into covenant with him; (v. 23.) They had not obtained mercy, but seemed to be abandoned; they were not my people, not distinguished, not dealt with, as my people, but left to lie in common with the nations; this was the case of the most part of the church of old, and of the most part of the church of our days. The most favourable was that of the Gentile world, (to whom the apostle applies this, Rom. ix. 24, 25.) that had no hope, and were without God in the world; but when great multitudes both of Jews and Gentiles were, upon their believing in Christ, incorporated into a Christian church, then, 1. God had mercy on those who had not obtained mercy. Those found favour with God, and became the children of his love, who had been long out of favour, and the children of his wrath, and if infinite mercy had not interposed, would have been for ever so. Note, God's mercy must not be despised. It is not the condition of those on whom his mercy is bestowed; he is gracious to the ungracious, to the undeserving, to the most undeserving, and grants it to the unworthy. 2. He took those into a covenant-relationship to himself, who had been strangers and foreigners; He says to them, "Thou art my people, whom I will own and bless, protect and provide for;" and they shall say, "Thou art my God, whom I will serve and worship, and to whose honour I will be entirely and for ever devoted." Note, (1.) The sum total of the happiness of believers is the mutual relation that is between them and God, that he is theirs and they are his; this is the crown of all the promises. (2.) This relation is founded in free grace; we have not chosen him, but he has chosen us. He first says, they are my people, and makes them willing to be so in the day of his power, and then they avouch him to be theirs. (3.) As we need desire no more than what is made use of, so God will use no more to our comfort than we need; so we need desire no more to make us easy and cheerful, than to have him to assure us that we are so; to say unto us, by his Spirit witnessing with ours, Thou art my people. (4.) Those that have accepted of the Lord for their God, must avouch him to be so, must go to him in prayer, and tell him so, Thou art my God, and must be ready to make profession before men. (5.) It adds to the covenant with our God; that in it there is a common of saints, who, though they are many, yet here they are one. It is not, I will say to them, Ye are my people; but, Thou art; for he looks upon them as all one in Christ, and, as such in him; he speaks to them, and covenants with them; and they also do not say, Thou art our God, for they look upon themselves as one body, and therefore, Thou art my God, and to any triumph therein, as Moses and all Israel did; (Exod. xv. 2.) He is my God, and my father's God.

CHAP. III.

God is still by the prophet inculcating the same thing upon this careless people, and much in the same manner as before, by a type or sign, that of the dealings of a husband with an adulterous wife. In this chapter, we have,

1. He had chartered with the people of Israel how they were to be treated of and by the Athenians, (Acts xvii. 16.) wholly given to idolatry, v. 1. II. The low condition which they should be reduced to by their captivity, and the other instances of God's own dealings with them, v. 2. 4. III. The blessed reformation that should at length be wrought upon them in the latter days, v. 5.

1. THEN said the Lord unto me, Go yet, love a woman beloved of her friend, yet an adulteress, according to the love of the Lord toward the children of Israel, who look to other gods, and love flags of wine. 2. So I bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and for a homer of barley, and a half homer of barley. 3. And I said unto her, Thou shalt abide for of Israel; it is love to the loveless, to the unloved,
that have a thousand times forloved it.
N. S. In God's good will to poor sinners, his thoughts and ways are infinitely above ours, and his love is more condescending and compassionate than ours;
or can be; in this, as much as any thing, he is God and not man, Hos. xi. 9.

11. The method found for the bringing of a God so very good, and a people so very bad, together again; this is the thing aimed at, and what God does at his own behest. Teraphim we find there, and we find a breach thus wide as the sea, effectually healed; miracles cease not so long as divine mercy does not cease. Observe here,

1. The course God takes to humble them, and make them know themselves; (v. 2.) I have bought her to me for fifteen pieces of silver, and a homer and a half of barley; I courted her to be reconciled, to leave her all courses, and return to her first husband, as ch. ii. 14. I allured her, and spake comfortably to her; as the Levite who went after his coabundance that had played the harlot from him, and was run away with another man, spake friendly to her, Judg. xix. 3. But here the present which the prophet brought her for the purchasing of her favor, which is observed, and is brought, is a small one; but it was all that was intended for her sake and motive, and in it she is reduced to a short allowance, and, to punish her for her pride, is made to look very mean. When Samson went to be reconciled to his wife that had disobliged him, he visited her with a kid, (Judg. xv. 1.) which was a genteel entertainment. But the prophet here visited his wife with fifteen pieces of silver, a small sum, that he might be content to live upon a great while, so long as till her husband thought fit to restore her to her first estate. She shall also have a homer and a half of barley, for bread-corn, and that is all she must expect till she be sufficiently humbled, and, by a competent time of trial, satisfactory proof given that she is indeed reformed. Let her be made sensible that it is not for her own merit that her husband makes court to her, it is but at a lame price that he values her; the price of a servant was thirty shekels, Exod. xxi. 32. This was but half so much; yet let her know that it is more than she is worth. God had given Egypt for Israel's ransom once, so precious were they then in his sight, and so honourable, Isa. xlIII. 3, 4. But now that they have gone a whoring after their idols, he will give but fifteen pieces of silver for them; so much have they lost in their value by their iniquity. Note, Those whom God designs honour and comfort for, he first makes sensible of their own worthlessness, and brings them to acknowledge, with the prophet, I am no more worthy to be called thy son. Time was when Israel was fed with the finest of the wheat, but they grew wanton, and loved flagons of wine; and therefore, in order to the humbling and reducing of them, they must be brought in the land of their captivity to eat barley-bread, and be thankful they can get it, and to eat that too by weight and measure, whereas they did not use to be stinted. Note, Poverty and disgrace sometimes prove a happy means of making great sinners true penitents.

2. The tears upon which God is willing to come with them; (v. 5.) Thou shalt abide for me many days, and shalt not be for another, so will I be for thee. He might justly have given them a bill of divorce, and have resolved to have no more to do with them; but he is willing to show them kindness, and that the matter should be compromised; he will not take them in the notes, he will not reap the rigour of the law, but according to the multitude of his mercies; and it represents God's gracious dealings with the apostate race of mankind, that had gone a whoring from him; he bought them

indeed with an inestimable price, not for their honour, but for the honour of his own justice; and now this is the proposal he makes to them, the covenant of grace he is willing to enter into with them—they must be to him a people, and he will be to them a God; the same with the proposal here made to Israel.

(1.) They must take to themselves the shame of their apostasy from him, must submit to, and accept of, the punishment of their iniquity; Thou shalt abide for me many days in solitude and silence, as a widow that is desolate and in sorrow; they must lay aside their ornaments, and wait with patience and submission to know what God will do with them, and whether he will please to admit such unworthy remnant of Israel as remained to him, according to Hosea ii. 4, 5. Their father, their husband, has spilt in their face, (as God said concerning Miriam,) has put them under the marks of his displeasure, and therefore, like her, they must be ashamed seven days, and be shut out of the camp; (Numb. xii. 14.) till their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, Lev. xxvi. 41. Let them sit alone and keep silence, waiting for the salvation of the Lord, and in the mean time to go about the yoke, (Isa. iii. 26—28.) Let them not expect that God should speedily return in mercy to them, as sometimes he has done, that comfort should come over-cheap and easy to them; no, let them want it, let them wait for it many days during all the days of their captivity, and reckon it a miracle of mercy, and well worth waiting for, if it come at last. Note, Those whom God designs mercy for, will first bring to abuse themselves, and to put a high value upon his favours.

(2.) They must never return to folly again; that is the condition upon which God will speak peace to his people, and to his saints, (Ps. lxxxv. 8.) and no other. "Thou shalt not play the harlot, shalt not worship idols in the land of thy captivity, while thou art there set apart for thine uncleanness." Note, It is not enough to take shame to ourselves for the sins we have committed, and to justify God in convicting us for them, but we must resolve, in the strength of God's grace, that we will not offend any more, that we will not again go a whoring from God, after the world and the flesh. Blessed be God, though it is the law of the covenant, it is not the condition of it, that we shall never in any thing do contrary to it. Note, Those whom God does not expect shall not serve other gods, shall not be for another man." In the land of their captivity, they would be courted to worship the idols of the country; that would be a trial for them, a long trial, many days; "But if thou keep thy ground, and hold fast thine integrity, if, when all this is come upon thee, thou dost not stretch out thy hand to a strange god, thou wilt be qualified for the return of a thankful heart."

Note, It is a certain sign that our afflictions are means of much good to us, and earnest of more, when we are kept by the grace of God from being overcome by the temptations of an afflicted state.

(3.) Upon these terms, their Maker will again be their Husband; so will I also be for thee. This is the covenant between God and returning sinners, that he will not for the reprobate of him, I will be for them to save them. Let them renounce and abjure all rivals with God for the throne in the heart, and devote themselves entirely to him, and him only, and he will be to them a God all-sufficient. If we be faithful and constant to God in a way of duty, and will never leave nor forsake him, he will be so to us in a way of mercy, and shall not forsake us. And a faithful people could not but be more.

Now in the two last verses we have the interpretation of the parable, and the application of it to Israel.

[1.] They must long sit like a widow, stripped of all their joy and honours; (Lam. iv. 1, 2.) They shall abide many days without a king, and without a prince; and a nation in this condition may well be called a widow. They want the blessing, First, Of civil government; They shall abide without a king, and without a prince, of their own. There were kings and princes over them to oppress them and for the time being to protect them; God is willing to protect them, to fight their battles for them, to administer justice to them, and to take care of their common safety and welfare. Note, Magnificence is a very great blessing to a people, and it is a sad and sore judgment to want it. Secondly, Of public worship; They shall abide without a sacrifice, and without an altar, (or a statute, or pillar;) it must be used in the land of their captivity; (xxvi. 18—xxxi. 45—xxxi. 20.) and without an ephod and teraphim. The teraphim being here closely joined to the ephod, some think the Arim and thummim were meant by it in the breastplate of the High Priest. The meaning is, that in their captivity they should not only have no face of a nation upon them, but no face of a church; they should not have (as a learned expositor speaks) "hid by it of public worship, and thus exercise of religion, either true or false, according to their choice. They shall have no sacrifice or altar; (so the LXX.) and therefore no sacrifice, because no altar. They shall have no ephod, or teraphim, no legal priesthood, no means of knowing God's mind, no oracle to consult in doubtful cases; but shall be all in the dark. Note, The case of those is very melancholy, that are deprived of all opportunities to worship God in public. This was the case of the Jews in their captivity; and is so far the case of the scattered Jews at this day, that, though they have their synagogue, they have no temple-service. Desolate in deed is their condition, that are shut out from communion with God, that have no opportunity of directing their addresses to God by sacrifice and altar, and of receiving instructions from him by ephod and teraphim.

[2.] They shall at length be received again as a wife; (v. 5.) Afterward, in process of time, when they have gone through this discipline, they shall return, they shall repent of their idolatries, and forsake them, they shall apply themselves to God, and adhere to him, and herein they shall be accepted by him, and shall be called the sons of God, and shall be restored to the enjoyment of all the privileges of their return, and steps toward their acceptance with God in their return.

First, The inquiries they shall make after God; They shall seek the Lord their God, and David their king. Note, Those that would find God, and find favour with him, must seek him; must ask after him, covet acquaintance with him, desire to be reclaimed to him, set their love on him, and labor after this, that they may be accepted of him. Their seeking him implies that they had lost him, that they were lamenting the loss, and that they were solicitous to retrieve what they had lost. They shall seek him as their God; for should not a people seek unto their God? And they shall seek David their king; who can be no other than the Messiah, our Lord Jesus Christ. The son of David, the Root and Offspring of David, whom David himself called Lord. (Ps. cx. 1.) and to whom God gave the throne of his father David, Luke i. 32. The Chaldee reads it, They shall seek the service of the Lord their God, and shall obey Messiah, the Son of David their King. Compare this with Jer. xxx. 9. Ezek. xxxiv. xxxvii. 25. Notice, those that would seek the Lord so as to find him, must apply themselves to Jesus Christ, and must seek to him as their King, and become his willing people, and take an oath of fealty and allegiance to him. Secondiy, The reverence they shall have of God, They shall fear the Lord and his goodness. Some by his goodness here understand the temple, toward which they shall look, in worshipping God. The Jews say, There were three things which Israel cast off in the days of Rehobam—the kingdom of heaven, the family of David, and the house of the sanctuary; and it will never be well with them, till they return, and seek them all three, which is here promised; They shall seek the kingdom of heaven in the Lord their God, the royal family in David their King, and the temple in the goodness of the Lord. But as the goodness of God differs in different persons, so shall they understand Christ of the same with David their King. But it is rather to be taken for that attribute of God, which he showed as his glory, and by which he proclaimed his name. Note, It is not only the Lord and his greatness that we are to fear, but the Lord and his goodness, not only his majesty, but his mercy. They shall fire for fear to the Lord and his goodness; (so some take it,) shall flee to it as their city of refuge. We must fear God’s goodness, we must admire it, and stand amazed at it, must adore it, and worship as Moses did at the proclaiming of this name, Exod. xxxiv. 6. We must be afraid of offending his goodness, of making any ungrateful returns for it, and so forfeiting it. There is forgiveness with God, that he may be feared; Ps. cxxx. 4. We must rejoice with thankfulness at his goodness; God must not be high-minded, but fear.

Now this promise had its accomplishment, when by the gospel of Christ great multitudes both of Jews and Gentiles were brought home to God, and incorporated in the New Testament church; served God in Christ, with a filial fear of divine grace, and were accepted of God as his Israel. And some think it is yet further accomplished in the conversion of those Jews to the faith of Christ, who shall remain in unbelief; when they shall seek their Messiah as David their king, and by him all Israel shall be saved, when the fulness of the Gentiles is brought in. Time was, when they sought him, to put him to death, saying, We have no king but Caesar; but, the day is coming, when they shall seek him, to anoint him their Head, and to lay their necks under his yoke. He that has here promised that they shall do it, will enable them to do it, and bring about this great work in his own way and time; in the latter days of the last times, the times of the Messiah; but alas, who shall live when God doth this? How far we are to expect a general conversion of that nation, I cannot say; but I am sure we ought to pray that the Jews may be converted.

CHAP. IV

Prophets were sent to reprove, to tell people of their faults, and to warn them of the judgments of God, to which by sin they exposed themselves; so the prophet is employed in this and the following chapters. He is here, as counsel for the King of kings, opening an indictment against the people of Israel, and labouring to convince them of their miseries by a show and sound, as cause of sin, that he might prevail with them to repent and reform. 1. He shows them what were the grounds of God’s controversy with them; a general prevalence of sin, and special sins. 1. (v. 1, 2.) They had known God, and not his goodness, (y. 6, 7.) the worldliness-mindedness of the priests, (v. 8.) drunkenness and uncleanness, (v. 11.) using divination and witchcraft, (v. 12.) offering sacrifice, (v. 13.) worshipping their gods, and being idol worshippers, (V. 14.) whoredoms, and harlotry among magistrates, v. 18. 11. He shows what they would be the consequences of God’s controversy; God would punish them for these things, v. 9. That they were wasting away, laid waste the earth, they spared not the souls of people cut off, (v. 5.) their honour lost, (v. 7.) their creature-comforts unsatisfying, (v. 10.) and themselves made ashamed, v. 19. And, which is several times mentioned here as the sorest judgment of all, they should be left alone in their sins, (v. 17.) they shall not reproved one another, (v. 4.) God will not punish them, (v. 14.)

May, he will let them prosper, v. 16. III. He gives warning to Judah, not to tread in the steps of Israel, because they saw their steps went down to hell, v. 15.

1. HEAR the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel: for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God, in the land. 2. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery; they break out, and blood toucheth blood. 3. Therefore shall the land mourn, and every one that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beasts of the field, and with the birds of heaven; yea, the fishes of the sea also shall be taken away. 4. Yet let no man strive, nor reprove another: for this people are as they that strive with the priest. 5. Therefore shall thou fall in the day, and the prophet also shall fall with thee in the night, and I will destroy thy mother.

Here is, I. The court set, and both attendance and attention demanded; Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel, for to you is the word of this conviction sent, whether you will hear, or whether you will forbear. Whom may God expect to give him this hearing, and take him in his fair warning, but the children of Israel, his own professing people? Yea, they will be ready enough to hear when God speaks comfortably to them; but are they willing to hear when he has a controversy with them? Yes, they must hear him when he pleads against them, when he has something to lay to their charge: The Lord has a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, of this land, of this holy land. Note, Sin is the great mischief-maker; it sows discord between God and Israel. God sees sin in his own people, and a good action he has against them for it. Some more particular actions lie against his own people, which do not lie against other sinners. He has a controversy with them for breaking covenant with him, for bringing a reproach upon him, and for an unthankful return to him for his favours. God’s controversy will be pleaded; pleaded by the judgments of his mouth before they are pleaded by the judgments of his hand; that he may be justified in all he does, and may make it appear that he desires not the death of sinners; and God’s pleadings ought to be attended to, for, sooner or later, they shall have a hearing.

II. The indictment read, by which the whole nation stands charged with crimes of a heinous nature, by which God is highly provoked. 1. They are charged with national omissions of the most important duties; There is no truth nor mercy; neither justice, nor charity; these most weighty matters of the few, as our Saviour accounts them, (Matt. xxiii. 23.) judgment, mercy, and faith. The generality of the people seemed to have no sense at all of the thing called honesty; they made no conscience of what they said and did, though ever so contrary to the truth, and injustices to their neighbour. Much less had they any sense of mercy, or any obligation they were under to pity and help the poor. And it is not strange that there is no truth and mercy, when there is no knowledge of God in the land. What good can be expected where there is no knowledge of God? It was the privilege of that land, that in Israel God was made known, and his name great, which was an aggravation of their sin, that they did not know him, Ps. lxxxvi. 1. 2. Hence follow national commotions of the most enormous sins against God, and a failure of the God's people to take warning at all to either. Swearing, lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, against the third, ninth, sixth, eighth, and seventh commandments, were to be found in all corners of the land, and among all orders and degrees of men among them, v. 2. The corruption was universal; what good people there were among them were either incapable of or readi for such contagion, for, when they got out, they transgress all bounds of reason and conscience, and the divine law; they have exceeded; (Job xxxvi. 9.) they have been overmuch wicked, (Ecc. vii. 17.) they suffer their corruptions to break out, they themselves over, and break through, all that stands in their way, and would stop them in their sinful career, as water overflows the banks. Note, Sin is a violent thing, and its power excoriating; when men's hearts are fully set in them to do evil, (Ecc. viii. 11.) what will be restrained from them? Gen. xi. 6. When they break out thus, blood touches blood, abundance of murders are committed in all parts of the country, and, as it were, in a constant series and succession. Cites alia alia sunt contingue.—Murders touch murders; a stream of blood ran among them, every man's blood was shed to shed, it was about this time that there was so much blood shed in grasping at the crown; Shallum slew Zecaiah, and Menahem slew Shallum, Pekah slew Pekahiah, and Hoshea slew Pekah; and the like bloody work, it is likely, there was among other contending parties; when the land was polluted with blood, (Ps. civ. 38.) it was filled with blood from one end to the other, 2 Kings xxv. 16. III. Sentence passed upon the guilty and polluted land; (v. 3.) It shall be utterly destroyed and laid waste. The whole land is infected with sin, and therefore the whole land shall mourn under God's sore judgments; shall sit in mourning, being stripped of all its wealth and beauty. As the valleys are said to shew for joy, and sing, when there are plenty and peace, so here they are said to mourn, when by war and famine they are made desolate. The whole land shall be brimstone, and salt, and burning, as was threatened in the law, Deut. xxix. 23. They had broken all God's commandments, and now God threatens to take away all their comforts. The land mourns, when there is neither grass for the cattle, nor hay for the service of man; and then every one that dwells therein shall languish for want of nice food, or, as the margin has it, choice food; and it is the usual delicacies for delight. The beasts of the field will languish, Jer. xiv. 5, 6. Nay, the destruction of the fruits of the earth shall be so great, that there shall not be picking for the fruits of the air, to keep them alive; they shall suffer with man, and their dying, or growing lean, will be a punishment to those who used to have their tables replenished with whatever was wanting, vi. 14. The wheat and barley, away, or gathered together, that they may go away in swarms to some other coast, and then the fishing trade will be worth nothing. This desolation shall be in that respect more general than that by Noah's flood, for that did not affect the fishes of the sea, but this shall. It was part of one of the plagues of Egypt, that he slew their fish; (Ps. cv. 35.) neither the river nor the sea, nor any fish shall be there, (2. Zeph. ii. 6.) Note, When man becomes disobedient to God, it is just that the inferior creatures should be made unserviceable to man. O what reason have we to admire God's patience and mercy to our land, that though there are in it so much swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and adultery, yet there is plenty of flesh, and fish, and fowl, on our tables! IV. An order of court, that no pains should be taken with the condemned criminal to bring him to repentance, with the reason for that order. Ob- serves, 1. The order itself; (v. 4.) Yet let no man strive or reprove another; let no means be used to reduce and reclaim them, let their physicians give them up as desperate and past cure. It intimates that as long as there is any hope, we ought to reprove sinners for their sins; it is a duty we owe to one another to give and to take reproofs, it was one of the laws of Moses; (Lev. xi. 17.) Thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour; it is an instance of brotherly love. Sometimes there is need to rebuke sharply, not only to reprove, but to strive, so loath are men to part with their sins. But it is a sign that persons and people are abandoned to ruin, when God says, Let them not be reproved. Yet this is to be understood as God's command sometimes to the prophets, not to pray for them, notwithstanding which they did pray for them; but the meaning is, They are so hardened in sin, and so ripened for ruin, that it will be to little purpose, either to deal with them, or to deal with God for them. Note, It bodes ill to a people when reprovers are silenced, and when those who should witness against the sins of the times, retire into a corner, and give up the cause. See 2 Chron. xxxiii. 17. The order is injurious to this order; Let them not reprove one another; for, (1.) They are determined to go on in sin, and no reproves will cure them of that; They people are as they that strive with the priests; they are grown so very impudent in sin, so very insolent, and impatient of reproof, that they will fly in the face even of a priest himself, if he should but give them the least check, with out any regard to his character and office; and how then can it be thought that they should take a reprofe from a private person? Note, Those sinners have their hearts wickedly hardened, who quarel with their ministers for dealing faithfully with them; and those who rebel against ministerial reproof, which is an ordinance of God for their reformation, have forfeited the benefit of brotherly reproof too. Perhaps this may refer to the late wickedness of Josiah king of Judah, and his people, who stoned Zecariah, the son of Jehoiada, for delivering them a message from God, 2 Chron. xxiv. 21. He was a priest, with him they strive, when he was officiating between the temple and the altar; and Dr. Lightfoot thinks the prophet had an eye to his case when he spake, (v. 2.) of blood touching blood; the blood of the prophet and the blood of the priest; that is, they were used to take with them the usual delicacies for delight. That says he, was the apex of their wickedness, from thence their ruin was to be dated, (Matth. xxiii. 35.) as this is of their incorrigibleness, that they are as these who strive with the priest, therefore let no man reprove them; for, (2.) God also is determined to proceed in their ruin; (v. 5.) Therefore, because thou wilt take no reproof, neither have they taken no reproof, let the reproof of God, which is sent to thee in the same year, prevent it, for the decree is gone forth. Thou shalt stumble and fall in the day, and the prophet, the false prophet that flattered and seduced thee, shall fall with thee in the night; both thou and thy prophet shall fall night and day, shall be continually falling into one calamity or another; the darkness is upon the right eye, and the light is upon the left; the light of the day helpeth thee to see, but the light of the night helpeth thee to flee from it. The prophets are blind leaders, and the people blind followers; and to the blind, day and night are alike, so that whether it be day or night, both shall fall together into the ditch. "Then shalt fall in the day, when thy fall is least feared by thyself, and thou art very secure; and in the day, when it will be seen and observed by others, and turn neither to thy shame; and the prophet shall fall in the night, when to himself it will be most terrible." Note,
The ruin of those who have helped to ruin others, will, in a special manner, be intolerable. And did the children think that when they are in danger of falling their mother would help them? It shall be in vain to expect it, for _I will destroy thy mother_; Samaria, the mother-city; the whole state, or kingdom, which is as a mother to every part. It shall all be made silent. Note, When all are involved in guilt, nothing less can be expected, than that all should be involved in ruin.

6. My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge, because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will also reject thee, that thou shalt be no priest to me: seeing thou hast forgotten the law of thy God, I will also forget thy children. 7. As they were increased, so they sinned against me; therefore will I change their glory into shame.

3. They eat up the sin of my people, and they set their heart on their iniquity. 9. And there shall be, like people, like priest; and I will punish them for their ways, and reward them their doings. 10. For they shall eat, and not have enough; they shall commit whoredom, and shall not increase: because they have left off to take heed to the Lord. 11. Whoredom, and wine, and new wine, take away the heart.

God is here proceeding in his controversy, both with the priests, and with the people; the people were as those that _strue with the priests_, (v. 4.) here is a charge upon the priests, who should have taught them the knowledge of God; but they did not, because of their unbelief, and because of the generality of them lived in the neglect of their duty, and here is a word for those priests, and for the people that love to have it so, Jer. v. 31. And it is observable here, how the punishment answers to the sin, and how, for the justifying of his own proceedings, God sets the one over against the other.

1. The _people strive with the priests_, that should have taught them the knowledge of God; but they therefore are they destroyed for lack of knowledge, v. 6. Note, Those that rebel against the light, can expect no other than to perish in the dark. Or, it is a charge upon the priests, who should have been still teaching the people knowledge, (Ecc. xii. 9.) but they did not, or did it in such a manner, that it was as if they had not done it at all, so there was no knowledge of God in the land; and because there was no vision, or none to any purpose, the people _perished_, Prov. xxxix. 18. Note, IGNORANCE is so far from being the mother of devotion, that it is the mother of destruction; lack of knowledge is ruining to any person or people. They are my people, that are thus destroyed, their relation to God as his people, aggravates both their sin in not taking pains to get knowledge, and their own miseries. They were under and with whom they were taken into covenant, and their sin likewise, who should have taught them; God set his children to school to them, and they never minded them, nor took any pains with them.

2. Both priests and people _rejected knowledge;_ and justly therefore will God reject them. The reason why people did not teach, and the priests did not teach, was, not because they had not the light, but because they hated it; not because they had not ways of coming to the knowledge of God, and of communicating it, but because they had no heart to it; they rejected it. They desired not the knowledge of God's ways, put it from them, and shut their eyes against the light; and therefore if I will also reject thee, I will refuse to take cognizance of thee, and to own thee; you will not know me, but bid me depart; I will therefore say, Depart from me, I know you not. Then shalt thou be no priest to me._ (1.) The priests shall be no longer admitted to the privileges, or employed in the services, of the priesthood, nor shall they ever be received again, as we find, Ezek. xiv. 13. Note, Ministers that reject knowledge, that are grossly ignorant and senseless, ought not to be owned as ministers; but that which they seem to have, should be taken away, Luke viii. 18. (2.) The people shall be no longer, as they have been, a _kingdom of priests_, a royal priesthood, Exod. xix. 6. God's people, by rejecting knowledge, forfeit their honour, and profane their own crown.

3. They forget the law of God, neither desired nor endeavoured to retain it in mind, or transmit the remembrance of it to their posterity, and therefore justly will God forget them and their children; the people's children, they did not educate them, as they ought to have done, in the knowledge of God, and their duty to him, and therefore God will disown them, as not in covenant with him. Note, If parents do not teach their children, when they are young, to remember their Creator, they cannot expect that their Creator should remember them. Or, it may be meant of the _priests' children_; they shall not succeed in the priests' office, but shall be reduced to poverty, as is threatened against Eli's house. 1 Sam. ii. 20. 4. They dishonoured God with that which was their honour, and justly therefore will God strip them of it, v. 7. It was their honour, that they were increased in number, wealth, power, and dignity; the beginning of their nation was small, but in process of time it greatly increased, and grew very considerable in power; and of priests increased wonderfully; but as they were increased, so they sinned against God; the more populous the nation grew, the more sin was committed, and the more profane they were; their wealth, honour, and power did make them the more daring in sin. Therefore, says God, will I change their glory into shame. Are their numbers their glory? God will diminish them, and cut them off from the earth; and is their wealth their glory? God will impoverish them, and bring them low; so that they shall themselves be ashamed of that which they gloried in. Their priests shall be made contemptible and base, Mal. ii. 9. Note, That which is our honour, if we dishonour God with it, will, sooner or later, be turned into shame to us; for they that despise God shall be lightly esteemed, 1 Sam. ii. 30.

5. The priests ate up the sin of God's people; and therefore they shall eat, and not have enough. (1.) They abused the maintenance that was allowed to the priests, to the priests of the house of Aaron, by the law of God, and to the mock-priests of the calves by their constitution; (v. 8.) They _eat up the sin of my people_, that is, their sin-offerings. If God meant by his priests the true priests, it was because of their seizing that which they had no right to; they usurped the revenues of the priests though they were no priests. If it be meant of those who were legal priests, it intimates their greediness of the profits and perquisites of their office, when they took no care at all to do the duty of it. They feasted upon their part of the offerings of the Lord, but for priests, and of the work for which they were so paid; thus they set their hearts upon the people's iniquities, they lifted up their soul to them, they were glad when people did commit iniquity, that they might be obliged to bring an offering to make atonement for it, which they should have shared of; the more sins, the more sacrifices, and therefore they cared not how much sin people were guilty of. Instead of warning the people against sin, from the consideration of the sacrifices, which showed them what an offence sin was to God, since it needed such an expiration, they abandoned and encouraged the people to sin, since an atonement might be made so small an expense. Thus they gloated themselves upon the sins of the people, and helped to keep up that which they should have beaten down. Note,
It is a very wicked thing to be well pleased with the sins of others, because, some way or other, they may turn to our advantage. (2.) God will therefore deny them his blessing upon their maintenance,
(v. 5, 6.) Though they have great plenty by the abundance of offerings that are brought in, yet they shall have no satisfaction in it. Either their food shall yield no good nourishment, or their greedy appetites shall not be satisfied with it. Note, What is unlawfully gained, cannot be comfortably used; nor, nor that which is inordinately coveted; it is just that the desires which are insatiable, should always be unsatsisfied; and that those should never have enough, who never know when they have enough. See Mic. vi.
14. Hag. i. 6.

6. The more they increased, the more they sinned; (v. 7.) and therefore though they commit whoredom, though they take the most wicked methods to multiply their people, yet they shall not increase. Those they have are many waves and combings, and Solomon had, yet they shall not have their families built up by it in a numerous progeny, any more than he had. Note, Those that hope any way to increase by unlawful means, will be disappointed. And therefore God will thus blast all their projects, because they have left off to take heed to the Lord;
time was, when they had some regard to God, and to his authority over them, and interest in them, but they have left it off; they take no heed to his word or to his providences, they do not eye him in either. They forsake him, so as not to take heed to him; they have apostatized to that degree, that they have no manner of regard to God, but are perfectly without God in the world. Note, Those that leave off to take heed to the Lord, leave off all good, and can expect no other than that all good should leave them.

7. The people and the priests did harden one another in sin; and therefore justly shall they shew in the sharers in the punishment; (v. 9.) There shall be, like people, like priest. So they were in character;
people and priest were both alike ignorant and profane, regardless of God and their duty, and addicted to sin and sinning; and so they shall be in condition; God will bring judgments upon them, that shall be the destruction both of priest and people; the famine
that deprives the people of their meat, shall deprive the priests of their meat-offerings, Joel i. 9. It is part of the description of an universal desolation,
that it shall be, as with the people, so with the priest, Isi. xxiv. 2. God's judgments, when they come with commission, will make no difference. Note, Sin spreads itself to all kinds, and comes upon all kinds.
Thus God will punish them both for their ways, and reward them their doings. God will cause their doings to return upon them; so the word is; when a sin is committed, the sinner thinks it is gone, and he shall hear no more of it, but he shall find it called
over again, and made to return, either to his humor, or to his condemnation.

8. They increase in the delights of sense, to hold up their hearts; but they shall find that they take away their hearts; (v. 11.) Whoredom, and wine, and new wine take away the heart. Some join this with the foregoing words, They have forsaken the Lord, to take heed to whoredom, and wine, and new wine; Or, Because these have taken away their heart. Their sensual pleasures have taken them off from their devotions, and drowned all that is good in them. Or, we may take it as a distinct sentence, containing a great truth which we see confirmed by every day's experience; theft, violence, drunkenness, and uncleanness, are sins that
beget and infatuate men, weaken and enfeeble them.
They take away both the understanding and the courage.

12. My people ask counsel at their stocks, and their staff declareth unto them: for the spirit of whoredoms hath caused them to err, and they have gone a whoring from under their God. 13. They sacrifice upon the tops of the mountains, and burn incense upon the hills, under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow thereof is good: therefore your daughters shall commit whoredom, and your spouses shall commit adultery. 14. I will not punish your daughters when they commit whoredom, nor your spouses when they commit adultery; for themselves are separated with whores, and they sacrifice with harlots, therefore the people that doth not understand shall fall.
15. Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend; and come not ye unto Gilgal, neither go ye up to Beth-aven, nor swear, The Lord liveth. 16. For Israel shideth back as a backsliding heifer:
now the Lord will send them as a lamb in a large place. 17. Ephraim is joined to idols:
let him alone. 18. Their drink is sour; they have committed whoredom continually: her rulers with shame do love. Give ye.

The wind hath bound her up in her wings,
and they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifices.

In these verses we have, as before,
1. The sins charged upon the people of Israel; for which God had a controversy with them.

And they are,
1. Spiritual whoredom, idolatry. They have in-them a spirit of whoredoms, a strong inclination to that sin; the bent and bias of their hearts are that,
that it is their own iniquity; they are carried out towards it with an accountable violence, and this causes them to err. Note, The errors and mistakes of the judgment are commonly owing to the corrupt affections; men therefore have a good opinion of sin, because they have a disposition towards it. And,
having such erroneous notions of idols, and such passonate motions towards them, no marvel that with such a heart, and such a movement, they should have wandered ever from under their God, v. 12. They ought to have been in subjection to him as their Head and Husband, to have been under his conduct and command, but they revolted from their allegiance, and put themselves under the conduct and protection of false gods. So (v. 15.) Israel has played the harlot;
their conduct in the worship of their idols was like that of a harlot, wanton and impudent. And (v. 16.) Israel slipeth back, as a backsliding heifer; as an untamed heifer, so some; or, as a perverse or refractory one, some others; as a heifer that is turned loose, runs madly about the pasture; or, if put under the yoke, (which seems rather to be alluded to here,)
will draw back instead of going forward, will struggle to get her neck out of the yoke, and her feet cut of the furrow. Thus unruly, ungovernmental, untractable, were the people of Israel. They had begun to draw in the yoke of God's ordinances, but they drew back, as children of Bethal, that will not endure the yoke; as in the worship of were sent with the gods of reproof, to put them forward, they kicked against the furies, and ran backwards. The sum of all this, (v. 17.) Ephraim is joined to idols, is perfectly wedded to them, his affections are glued to them, and his heart is upon them.

There are two instances given of their spiritual whoredom, in both which they gave that honour to God which was due to his idols. (1.) They consulted them as oracles, and used those arts of divination which they had learned from their idolatrous priests; (v. 12.) _My people ask counsel at their stocks, their wooden gods; they apply themselves to them for advice and direction in what they should do, and for information concerning the event._ They say to a stock, _Thou art my father; (Jer. ii. 27.) and if it were indeed a father, it were worthy of this honour; but it was a great affront to God, who was indeed their Father, and whose lively oracles they had among them, with which they had liberty to consult at any time, thus to ask counsel at their stocks._ And they expect that their staff should declare to them what course they should take, and what event should happen to them. Thus priests and learned men are trusted with the secrets of God's affairs; He refers to some wicked methods of divination used among the Gentiles, and which the Jews learned from them, by a piece of wood, or by a staff, like Nebuchadnezzar's divining by his arrows, Ezek. xxi. 21. Note, Those who forsake the oracles of God, to take their measures from the world and the flesh, do in effect but consult with their stocks and their images. They offer sacred sacrifice to them as gods, whose favour they wanted, and whose wrath they dreaded and deprecated; (v. 13.) _They sacrifice to them, to atone and pacify them, and burn incense to them, to please and gratify them; and hope by both to recommend themselves to them._ God had pitched upon the place where he would record his name; but they, having forsaken that, chose places for their irreligious rites, which pleased their own fancies; they chose, _[1.]_ high places, _upon the tops of the mountains, and upon the hills; foolishly imagining that the height of the ground gave them some advantage in their approaches toward heaven._ [2.] Study places, _under oaks, and poplars, and elms, because the shadow thereof is pleasant to them, especially in those hot countries, and therefore they thought their worship more acceptable to them._ They fancied that a thick shade befriends contemplation, possesses the mind with something of awe, and therefore is proper for devotion.

2. Corporal whoredom is another crime here charged upon them; _They have committed whoredom continually, v. 18._ They drove a trade of uncleanness; it was not only a single act, but their constant practice, as it is of many that have eyes full of adultery, and which cannot cease from that sin, 2 Pet. ii. 14. Now the abominable filthiness and lewdness that was found in Israel is here spoken of, (1.) As a concomitant of their idolatry, their false gods drew them to it; for the devil whom they worshipped, though a spirit, is an unclean spirit. They were like dogs that walked about a sepulchre, were separated with whores, and they sacrificed with harlots; for because they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, but disdained him, therefore God gave them up to vile affections, by the indulging of which they dishonoured themselves, Rom. i. 24, 28. (2.) As a punishment of it; _The men that worshipped idols, were separated with whores that assured the defilement of the worship, and the Israelites were contaminated._ But God has in his Word, Num. xxv. 1, 2. To punish them for that, God gave up their wives and daughters to the like vile affections, they committed whoredom and adultery, (v. 13.) which could not but be a great grief and reproach to their husbands and parents; for those that are not chaste themselves, desire to have their wives and daughters so; but thus they might reap their sin in their punishment, as David's adultery was punished in the debauching of his concubines by his own son, 2 Sam. xii. 11. Note, When the same sin in others is made men's grief and affliction, which they have themselves been guilty of, they must own the Lord is righteous.

3. The inventing of justice; (v. 18.) _Their rulers (be it spoken to their shame) do love, Give ye; they love bribes, and have it continually in their mouths, Give, give; they are given to filthy lucre; every one that has any business with them, must expect to be asked, What will you give? Though, as rulers, they are bound by office to do justice, yet none can have justice done them without a fee; and you may be sure that for a fee they will do injustice._ Note, The love of money is the ruin of equity, and the root of all iniquity. But of all men it is a shame for rulers (who should be men fearing God, and hating covetousness) to love, Give ye. Perhaps this is intended in that part of the charge here, _Their drink is sour, it is dead, it is gone. Justice, duly administered, is refreshing, like the waters of Merom; but when men and rulers take rewards either to acquit the guilty, or to condemn the innocent, the drink is sour; they turn judgment into wormwood, Amos v. 7._ Or, It may refer in general to the depraved morals of the whole nation; they had lost all their life and spirit, and were as offensive to God as dead and sour drink is to us. See Deut. xxxiii. 32, 33.

4. The tokens of God's wrath against them for their sins.

1. Their wives and daughters should not be punished for the injury and disgrace they did to their families; (v. 14.) I will not punish your daughters; and, not being punished for it, they would go on in it. Note, The impurity of one sinner is sometimes made the punishment of another. Or, I will not punish them so as I will punish you; for you must own, as Judah did concerning his daughter-in-law, that they are more righteous than you, Gen. xxxviii. 26.

2. They themselves should prosper for awhile, but their prosperity should help to destroy them. It comes in as a token of God's wrath, (v. 16.) _The lamb will eat the fat pasture, and a large one, in which they shall be fed to the full, and fed with the best, but it shall be only to prepare them for the slaughter, as a lamb is that is so fed. If they wax fat and kick, they do but wax fat for the butcher. But others make them feed as a lamb on the common, a large place indeed, but where it is short grass, and lies exposed. The Shepherd of Israel will turn them both out of his pastures, and out of his protection._

3. No means should be used to bring them to repentance; (v. 17.) Ephraim is joined to idols, is in love with them, and addicted to them, and therefore, let him alone, as v. 4. Let no man reprove him. Let him be given up to his own heart's lust, and let the course be pursued, let us be healed, and he would not be healed, therefore forsake him. See what their end will be, Deut. xxxxi. 20. Note, It is a sad and sore judgment for any man to be let alone in sin, for God to say concerning a sinner, "He is joined to his idols, the world and the flesh, he is incurably proud, covetous, or profane, an incurable rake, or a drunkard, or an adulterer, and conscience, let him alone; minister, let him alone; providences, let him alone._ Let nothing awaken him till the flames of hell do it._

The father cor
rects not the rebellious son any more, when he determines to disinherit him. Those that are not disturbed in their sin, will be destroyed for their sin.

4. They should be hurried away with a swift and shameful destruction; (v. 19.) The wind hath bound her up in her wings, to carry her away into captivity, suddenly, violently, and irresistibly; he shall take them away with a whirlwind, Ps. lxi. 9. And then they shall be ashamed because of their sacrifice, and the sin of their idols, ashamed of their folly in putting themselves to such an expense upon gods that have no power to help them, and thereby to make that God their Enemy, who has almighty power to destroy them. Note, There are sacrifices that men will one day be ashamed of. Those that have sacrificed their time, strength, honour, and all their comforts, to the world and the flesh, shall be made ashamed of it, ver. 10, and those that bring to God blind, and lame, and heartless sacrifices, will be ashamed of them too.

III. The warning given to Judah, not to sin after the similitude of Israel's transgression. It is said in the close of v. 14. They that do not understand, shall fall; they must needs fall, that do not understand how to avoid, or get over, the stumbling-blocks that lie in their way. (v. 15.) But they that hearken, shall stand fast; he stands, take heed lest he fall, particularly the two tribes; (v. 15.) Though thou, Israel, play the harlot, yet let not Judah offend. Though Israel be given to idolatry, yet let not Judah take the infection. Now, I. This was a very needful caution. The men of Israel were brethren, and near neighbours to the men of Judah; Israel was more numerous, and more in prosperity in a prosperous condition, and therefore there was danger lest the men of Judah should learn their way, and get a snare to their souls. Note, The nearer we are to the infection of sin, the more need we have to stand upon our guard. 2. It was a very rational caution; Let Israel play the harlot, yet let not Judah do so; for Judah has greater means of knowledge than Israel has, the temple and priesthood, and a king of the house of David; from Judah, Shiloh is to come; and for Judah, God has reserved great blessings in store; therefore let not Judah offend, for more is expected from them than from Israel, they will have more to answer for if they do offend, and from them God will take it more unkindly. If Israel play the harlot, let not Judah do so too, for then God will have no professing people in the world. God bespeaks Judah in his heart, Ch. iv. 2, 3, Lord, they have turned their backs upon him, will ye also go away? John vi. 67. Note, Those that have hitherto kept their integrity, should for that reason still hold it fast, even in times of general apostasy. Now, to preserve Judah from offending as Israel had done, two rules are here given. I. That they might not be guilty of idolatry, they must keep at a distance from the places of idolatry; Come no more into Gilgal, where all their wickedness was; (ch. x. 13. — xii. 11.) there they multiplied transgression, (Amos iv. 4.) and perhaps they contracted a censure for that place, because there it was said to Joshua, The place where thou standest is holy ground; (Josh. v. 13.) therefore they are forbidden to enter into Gilgal, Amos v. 5. And for the same reason to enter no more into Bethel, come no more into Bethel, save the house of vanity, for so Beth-given signifies, not the house of God, as Bethel signifies. Note, Those that were kept from sin, and not fall into the devil's hand, must studiously avoid the occasions of sin, and not come upon the devil's ground. (2.) That they might not be guilty of idolatry, they must take heed of professorism, and not swear, The Lord liveth, in truth and righteousness; (Jer. iv. 2.) and therefore which is here forbidden, is swearing so in untruth and unrighteousness; swearing rashly and lightly, or falsely and with deceit; or swearing by the Lord and the idol, Zeph. i. 5. Note, Those that would be steady in their adherence to God, must possess themselves with an awe and reverence of God, and always speak of him with solemnity and seriousness; for these that can make a jest of the true God, will make a god of any thing.

CHAP. V.

The scope of this chapter is the same with the foregoing chapter, to discover the sin both of Israel and Judah, and to denounce the judgments of God against them. I. They are called to hearken to the charge, v. 1, 8. They are assembled in many sins which are here aggravated. 1. Persecution, v. 1, 2. Spiritual whoredom, v. 3, 4. Pride, v. 5. 4. Apostasy from God, v. 7, 5. The tyranny of the princes, and the tameness of the people in the coming trouble, and religious affairs; Judah was threatened with God's displeasure for their sins; he knows all their wickedness, (v. 5.) and makes known his wrath against them for it, v. 9. They shall fall in their iniquity, v. 5. 2. God will forsake them, v. 6. 3. Their portions shall be devoured, v. 7. 4. God will rebuke them, and pour out his wrath upon them, v. 9, 10. 5. They shall be oppressed, v. 11. 6. God will be as a moth to them in secret judgments, v. 12.) and as a lion in public judgments, v. 14.) They are blamed for the wrong course they took under their afflictions, v. 13. V. It is intimated that they shall at length take a right course, v. 15. The more generally these things are expressed, and so much as one or two of them are for our learning, and particularly for our admonition.

1. HEAR ye this, O priests; and hearken, ye house of Israel; and give ear, O house of the king; for judgment is toward you, because ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor. 2. And the revolters are profound to make slaughter, though I have been a rebuker of them all. 3. I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me: for now, O Ephraim, thou committedtest whoredom, and Israel is defiled. 4. They will not frame their doings to turn unto their God: for the spirit of whoredoms is in the midst of them, and they have not known the Lord. 5. And the pride of Israel doth testify to his face: therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity; Judah also shall fall with them. 6. They shall go with their flocks, and with their herds to seek the Lord; but they shall not find him; he hath withdrawn himself from them. 7. They have dealt treacherously against the Lord; for they have begotten strange children: now shall a mouth devour them with their portions.

Here, I. All orders and degrees of men are cited to appear and answer to such things as shall be laid to their charge; (v. 1.) Hear ye this, O priests, whether in holy orders, as those in Judah, and perhaps many in Israel too, for in the ten tribes there were divers cities of priests and Levites, who, it is probable, stood in their own lot after the revolt of the ten tribes, and did so much of their office as might be done at a distance from the temple; or pretending to holy orders, as the priests of the calves, who, some think, are included here. Hearken, ye house of Israel, and give ear, O house of the king; let them all take notice, for they have all contributed to the national guilt, and they shall all share in the national judgments. Note, If neither the sanctity of the priesthood, nor the dignity of the royal family, will prevail to keep them from sin, it cannot be expected that they should avoid to keep out wrath. If the priests, and the house of the king, though they bear such noble characters, sin like others, their noble characters will not excuse them, but they must smart like others. Nor shall it be any plea for the house of Israel, that they were misled by the priests, and princes, but they shall receive the same reproof, and punishment, and be brought to the shame, not merely, or in one sense, but as it were, for the blame on their own hands, as if it were their own sin: they whose lips shall be defended by their teachers, and they have not defended themselves, shall be held guilty.

2. Witness is produced against them; one instead of a thousand, it is God's omniscience; (v. 3.) I know Ephraim, and Israel is not hid from me. They have not known the Lord, (v. 4.) but the Lord has known them; knows their true character, however disguised; knows their secret wickedness, however concealed. Note, Men's rejecting the knowledge of God will not secure them from his knowledge of them; and when he contends with them, he will prove their sins upon them by his own knowledge, so that it will be sin vain to plead Not guilty.

3. Very bad things are laid to their charge. They had been very ingenuous and very industrious to draw people either into sin, or into trouble; Ye have been a snare on Mizpah, and a net spread upon Tabor; (v. 1.) such snares and nets as the huntsmen use to lay upon those mountains, in pursuit of their game. When the worship of the calves was set up in Israel, the patrons of that idolatry, and sticklers for it, contrived by all possible arts and wiles to draw men into it, and recommended it to them, that at first had a dread of it. Note, Those that allure and entice men to sin, however they may pretend friendship and good will, are to be looked upon as snares and nets to them, and their hands as bands, Excl. vii. 26. But to those whom they could not seduce into sin they were as a net and a snare, to bring them into trouble. Some think it was their practice to set snares in the road, and particularly upon the mountains of Mizpah and Tabor, at the times of the solemn feasts at Jerusalem, to watch if any of their people who were piously affected went thither, and to inform against them, that they might be prosecuted for it; thus doing the devil's work, who disquiets those whom he cannot debauch. The method which men use in carrying on their designs; (v. 2.) The revolters are professed to make slaughter. Note, Those who have themselves apostatized from the truths of God, are often the most subtle and barbarous persecutors of those who still adhere to them. Nothing will serve them, but to make slaughter; it is the blood of the saints that they thirst after, and with the serpent's sting they have their head, they are brazen to do it. O the depth of the depths of Satan, of the wickedness of his agents, of those that have deeply revolted, Isa. xxxi. 6. Now that which aggravated this, was, the many reproofs and warnings that had been given them; though I have been a reaper of them all. The prophet had been so, a reprobator by office; he had many a time told them of the evil of their ways under God, and had delivered them with his own soul with the worship of idols, v. 3. This God was a Witness to, though secretly committed, and artfully palliated. Nay, the piercing eye of God saw the spirit of whoredom that was in the midst of them, their secret inclination and disposition to those sins, the love they had to them, and the delight of their sins, and how much they were under the power of a spirit of whoredom, that root of bitterness which bore all this gall and wormwood, that corrupt and poisonous fountain.

4. They have no disposition at all to come into acquaintance and communion with God. The spirit of whoredom that was in them, noted and kept them wandering endless, v. 4. (1.) They have not known the Lord, nor desire to know him, but have rather declined, nay, dreaded, the knowledge of him, for that would disturb them in their sinful ways. (2.) Therefore they will not frame their doings to turn to God, by which it appeared that they did not know him aright. It speaks their obstinate persisting in their apostasy from God, that they would not turn to God, though he is their God, theirs in covenant, by whose name they have been called, and whom they are obliged to serve. They would not return to the worship of him, from which they had turned aside. Nay, they would not frame their doings to turn to God. They would not consider their ways, nor dispose themselves into serious temper, but their thoughts were of those things that would bring them to God. It is true, we cannot by our own power, without the special grace of God, turn to him; but we may by the due improvement of our own faculties, and the common aids of his Spirit, frame our doings to turn to him. Those that will not do that, that prepare not their hearts to seek the Lord, (2 Chron. xxi. 16.) owe it to themselves that they are not turned, they die because they will die; and to those that will do this, further grace shall not be wanting.

5. They were guilty of notorious arrogancy, and insolence in sin; (v. 5.) The pride of Israel doth testify to his face, doth witness against him, that he is a rebel to God and his government; the spirit of whoredoms which was in the midst of them, showed itself in the grievance and grandiness of their worship, as a harlot is known by her attire, Prov. vii. 10. The wantonness of her dress testifies to her face, that she is not a modest woman; or, their pride in confronting the prophets God sent them, and the message they brought; (Jer. xiii. 2.) or, a haughty, scornful conduct toward their brethren, and those that were convicted against them, that they were not God's people, and justified God in all the humbling judgments he brought upon them. His pride testifies in his face; so some read it, agreeing with Isa. iii. 9. The show of their countenance doth witness against them. They have that proud look which the Lord hates.

6. They departed from God to idols, and bred up their children in idolatry; (v. 7.) They have dealt treacherously against the Lord, as a wife, who, in contempt of the marriage-covenant, forsook her husband, and lives in adultery with another. Thus they who are guilty of spiritual adultery, whose god is their money, whose god is their belly, deal treacherously against the Lord, they violate their engagements to him, and frustrate his expectations from them. Note, With sinners are treacherous dealers. They have begotten strange children; their children which they have begotten are estranged from God, and trained up in a false way of worship, they are a spurious breed, as children of fornication, (John viii. 41.) whom God will disown. Note, Those deal treacherously with God indeed, who not only turn from him, but deal with him himself, but train up their children in wicked ways.

IV. Very sad things are made to be their doom; in general, (v. 1.) Judgment is toward you, God is coming forth to contend with you, and to testify his displeasure against you for your sins." It is time to hearken when judgment is towards us. In particular,

1. They shall fall in their iniquity. This follows upon their pride testifying to their face; (v. 5.) therefore shall Israel and Ephraim fall in their iniquity. Note, They fall as a fruit to the sages and forerunner of them; they that exalt themselves shall be abased. The face in which pride testifies, shall be filled with confusion. They shall not only fall, but fall in their iniquity, the saddest fall of all other. Their pride kept them from repenting of their iniquity, and therefore they shall fall in it. Note, Those that are not humbled for their sins, shall perish for the greatness of their iniquity. It is added, Judah also shall fall with them in her iniquity; as the ten tribes were carried captive into Assyria for their idolatry, so the two tribes, in process of time, were carried into Babylon for following their bad example; but the former fell, and were utterly cast down, the latter fell, and were raised up again. Judah had the temple and priesthood, and yet that shall not secure them, but, if they sin with Israel and Ephraim, with them they shall fall.

2. They shall fall short of God's favour, when they profess to seek it; (v. 6.) They shall go with their flocks and with their herds to seek the Lord, but in vain; they shall not find him. This seems to be spoken principally of Judah, when they fell into their iniquity, and when they fell in their iniquity. (1.) When they fell in the iniquity of the Lord; but they did not seek him only, and therefore he was not found of them. When they worshipped strange gods, yet they kept up the show and shadow of the worship of the true God; they went as usual, at the solemn feasts, with their flocks and herds to seek the Lord; but their hearts were not upright with him, because they were not entire for him, and therefore he would not accept them; for then only shall we find him, when we seek him, with our whole heart; not divided between God and Baal, Ezek. xiv. 3. (2.) When they fell in their iniquity, or found themselves falling by it, they sought the Lord; but they did not seek him early, and therefore he will not be found of them. They shall see ruin coming upon them, and shall then, in their distress, flee to God, and think to make his friends with burnt-offerings and sacrifices; but it will be too late then to turn away his wrath, when the decree is gone forth. Even Josiah's reformation did not prevail to turn away the wrath of God, 2 Kings xxiii. 25, 26. Those that go with their flocks and their herds only to seek the Lord, and not with their hearts and souls, cannot expect to find him, for his favour is not to be purchased with thousands of rams. Nor shall those speed, who do not seek the Lord while he may be found, for there is a time when he will not be found. They shall not find him, for he has withdrawn himself; he will not be inquired of by them, but will turn a deaf ear to their prayers, and have no regard to their sacrifices. See how much it is our concern to seek God early, now while the accepted time is, and the day of salvation.

They shall call upon him, who do not seek the Lord, they have dealt treacherously against the Lord, and have thought to strengthen themselves in it by their alliances with strange children; but now shall a month devour them with their portions, their estates and inheritances, all those things which they have taken, and taken up with as their portion; or, their portions, their idols whom they chose for gods, their idols, and the idols of God. Note, He that make an idol of the world, by taking it for their portion, will themselves perish with it. A month shall devour them, or eat them up; a certain time prefixed, and a short time. When God's judgments begin with them, they shall soon make an end; one month will do their business. How much may a body be weakened by one month's sickness, or a kingdom wasted by one month's war! Three sheaf herds (says God) I cut off in one month, Zech. xi. 8. Note, The judgments of God sometimes make quick work with a sinful people. A month devours more, and more portions, than many years can repair.

3. Blow ye the comet in Gibeah, and the trumpet in Ramah; cry aloud at Bethaven, after thee, O Benjamin. 9. Ephraim shall be desolate in the day of rebuke; among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be. 10. The princes of Judah were like them that remove the bound: therefore I will pour out my wrath upon them like water. 11. Ephraim is oppressed and broken in judgment, because he willingly walked after the commandment. 12. Therefore will I be unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judah: I, even I, will tear and go away; I will take away, and none shall rescue him. 15. I will go and return to my place till they acknowledge their offence, and seek my face; in their affliction they will seek me early.

Here is,

I. A loud alarm sounded, giving notice of judgments coming; (v. 8.) Blow ye the comet in Gibeah, and in Ramah, two cities near together in the confines of the two kingdoms of Judah and Israel, Gibeah, is in the kingdom of Judah, Ramah, of Israel; so that the warning is hereby sent into both kingdoms; Cry aloud at Bethaven, or Bethel, which place seems to be already seized upon by the enemy, and therefore the trumpet is not sounded there; but you hear the cutters of them that shout for mystery, mixed with theirs that are overcome. Let them cry aloud; "After thee, O Benjamin, comes the enemy. The tribe of Ephraim is already vanquished, and the enemy will be upon thy back, O Benjamin, in a little time, thy turn comes next." The cup of trembling shall go round. The prophet had described God's controversy with them as a trial at law; (ch. iv. 1.) here he describes it as a trial by battle; and here also when he judges he will overcome; let all therefore prepare to meet the God. He had before spoken of the judgments as certain; here he speaks of them as near; and when they are apprehended as just at the door, they are very startling and awakening. The blowing of this comet is explained, v. 9. Among the tribes of Israel have I made known that which shall surely be, that which is true or certain; so the word is. Note, The destruction of impenitent sinners is a thing which shall surely be; it is not mere talk to frighten them, but it is an irrevocable sentence. And it is a mercy to us, that it is made known to us, that we have timely warning given us of it, that we may flee from the wrath to come. It is the privilege of the tribes of Israel, that, as they are told their duty, so they are told their danger, by the oracles of God committed to them.

11. God's controversy with them.

1. He has a quarrel with the princes of Judah, because they were daring leaders in sin, v. 10. They are like them that remove the bound, or the ancient landmarks. God has given them his law, to be a fence about his own property; but they have sacrilegiously broken through it, and set it aside; they have encroached even upon God's rights, have trampled under foot the divisions between good and evil, and the most sacred obligations of reason and equity, thinking, because they were princes, that they might do anything. Quicquid liber, illet—Their will was a law. Or, it may be understood of their invading the liberty and property of the subject, for the advancing of the prerogative; which was like removing the ancient landmarks. Some have observed that the princes of Judah were more absolute, and assumed a more arbitrary power, than the princes of Israel did; now for this, God has a controversy with them: I will pour out my wrath upon them like water, in great abundance, like the waters of the flood, which were poured upon the giants of the old world, for the violence which the earth was filled with through them, Gen. vi. 13. Note, They that are princes, who would have the world do as they please, must not remove, bounds both of religion and justice, which they are limited by, and which if they break through must know that there is a God above them that will call them to account for it.

2. He has a quarrel with the people of Ephraim, because they were sneaking followers in sin (v. 11). He willingly walked after the commandment, the commandment of Jeroboam, and the succeeding kings of Israel, who obliged all their subjects by a law to worship the calves at Dan and Bethel, and never to go up to Jerusalem to worship; this was the commandment, it was the law of the land, and backed with reasons of state; and the people not only walked after it in a blind, implicit obedience to authority, but they willingly walked after it, from a secret antipathy they had to the worship of God, and a strong bias to the worship of idols. Note, An easy compliance with the commandments of men that thwart the commandments of God, ripens a people for ruin as much as any thing else. And the punishment of the sequacious disobedience (if I may call it so) that Ephraim is oppressed, and broken in judgment, has all his civil rights and liberties broken in upon, and trodden down; and, (1.) It is just with God that it should be so; that those who betray God's property, should lose their own; and those who subject their consciences to an infallible judge, and an arbitrary power, should have enough of both. (2.) There is a natural tendency in the thing itself towards it; they that willingly walk after the commandment, even when it walks contrary to the command of God, will find the commandment an encroaching thing, and that the more power is given it, the more it will claim. Note, Nothing gives greater advantage to a mastiff-like tyranny, that is fierce and furious, than a spaniel-like submission, that is faithless. (3.) There is a natural tendency in the thing itself towards it; they that willingly walk after the commandment, even when it walks contrary to the command of God, will find the commandment an encroaching thing, and that the more power is given it, the more it will claim. Note, Nothing gives greater advantage to a mastiff-like tyranny, that is fierce and furious, than a spaniel-like submission, that is faithless.

III. The different methods that God would take both with Judah and Ephraim, sometimes one method, and sometimes the other; and sometimes both together; rather, by which, first the one, and then the other, he would advance toward their complete ruin.

1. He would begin with lesser judgments, which should sometimes work silently and insensibly; (v. 12.) I will be, unto Ephraim as a moth, nay, (as it might better be supplied,) they are unto Ephraim as a moth, for it is such a sickness as Ephraim now sees, v. 13. Note, The judgments of God are sometimes to a sinful people as a moth, and as rottenness, or as a worm. The former signifies the little animals that breed in clothes, the latter those that breed in wood; as these consume the clothes and the wood, so shall the judgments of God consume them. (1.) Silency, so as not to make any noise in the world, nay, so as they themselves shall not be sensible of it; they shall think themselves safe and thriving, but, when they come to look more narrowly into their state, shall find themselves wasting and decaying. (2.) Slowly, and with long delays and intervals, that he may give them space to repent. Many a nation, as well as many a person, in the prime of its time, dies of a consumption. (3.) Gradually. God comes upon people as a lion, as a vengeance, God's patience is justly a surprise to them, if they will be wise, and take warning; he comes upon them step by step, that he may be willing that they should perish. (4.) The moth breeds in the clothes, and the worm or rottenness in the wood; thus sinners are consumed by a fire of their own kindling.

2. When it appeared that those had not done their work, he would come upon them with greater. Christ is sometimes a Lion of the tribe of Judah, here he is a Lion against that tribe; see what God will do to a people that are secure in sin; Even I will tear. He seems to glory in it, as his prerogative, to be able to destroy, as the alone Lord, the people of the earth; I will make mine own thing mine own, and take it into my own hand; I say it, that will do it. There is a more immediate work of God in some judgments than in others; I will tear, and go away. He will go away, (1.) As not fearing them; he will go away in state, and with a majestic face, as the lion from his prey. (2.) As not helping them. If God tear by afflicting providences, and yet by his graces and comforts stays the issue of them, his work is not well enough; but his justice, and these that are delivered into the hands of his grace. It is in vain for a man to strive with his Maker.

IV. The different effects of these different methods.

1. When God contended with them by lesser judgments, they neglected him, and sought to creature for relief, but sought in vain, v. 13. When God was to them as a moth, and as rottenness, they perceived their sickness and their wound, after:
a while they found themselves going down the hill, and that they were behindhand in their affairs, their state was sensibly decaying, and then they sent to the Assyrian, to come in their distress, and thereby made their court to king Jareb, which, some think, was one of the names of Pul, or Tiglath-pileser, kings of Assyria, to whom both Israel and Judah applied themselves for relief in their distress, hoping by an alliance with them to repair and re-establish their declining interests. Note, Carnal hearts, in times of trouble, see their sickness, and see their want, but do not see the sickness that is in their sin, nor will be brought to acknowledge that, no, not to acknowledge the hand of God, his mighty hand, much less his righteous hand, in their trouble; and therefore instead of going the next way to the Creator, who could relieve them, they take a great deal of pains to go about to creatures, who can do them no service. Those who repent not that they have offended God by their sins, are both to be beholden to him in their afflictions, but would rather seek relief any where than with him. And what comes of it? Yet could he not heal you, nor cure you of your wound. Note, Those who neglect God, and seek to creatures for help, will certainly be disappointed; those who depend upon them for support, will find them, not foundations, but broken reeds; those who build upon them for safety, will find them, not fountains, but broken cisterns; those who depend upon them for comfort and a cure, will find them miserable comforters, and physicians of no value. The kings of Assyria, whom Judah and Israel sought unto, distressed them, and helped them not, 2 Chron. xxxviii. 16, 28. Some make king Jareb signifies the great, potent, or magnificent king, for they built much upon his power; others the king that will plead, or should plead, for they built much upon his wisdom and eloquence, and in his interesting himself in their affairs; they had sent him a present, (ch. x. 6.) a good fee, and, having so reta ined him of counsel for them, they doubted not of his fidelity to them, but he deceived them, as an arm of flesh does those that trust in it, Jer. xvii. 5, 6.

2. When, to convince them of their folly, God brought greater judgments upon them, then they would at length be forced to apply themselves to him, v. 15. When he has torn as a lion, (1.) He will leave them; I will go and return to my place, to heaven, or to the mercy-seat, the throne of grace, which is his glory. When God punishes sinners, he will leave them, or let them go out of his place; (Isa. xxvi. 21.) but when he designs the destruction of his enemies, he will not leave them, he will come to them, where he waits to be gracious, upon their submission. Or, he will return to his place, when he has corrected them, as not regarding them, hiding his face from them, and not taking notice of their troubles or prayers; and this, for their further humiliation, till they are qualified in some measure for the returns of his favour; (2.) He will at length work upon them, and bring them to repentance, to bring off their afflictions; which is the thing he waits for; and then he will no longer withdraw from them. Two things are here mentioned as instances of their return; [1.] Their penitent confession of sin; Till they acknowledge their offence, marg. Till they be guilty; till they be sensible of their guilt, and be brought to own it, and humble themselves before God, as by way of submission before their judges. Or, Till they be more of their sins than of their afflictions, then there begins to be some hope of them; and this is that which God requires of us, when we are under his correcting hand, that we own ourselves in a fault, and justly corrected. [2.] Their humble petition for the favour of God; Till they seek my face, which, it may be expected, they will do when they are brought to the last extremity; and they have tried other helpers in vain; In their affliction they will seek me early, diligently and earnestly, and with great importunity; and if they seek him thus, and be sincere in it, though he calls seeking him late, because it was long ere they were brought to it, yet it is not too late, nay, he is pleased to call it seeking him early, so willing is he to make the best of true penitents in their return to him. Note, When we are under the convictions of sin, and the corrections of the rod, our business is to seek God's face, we must desire the knowledge of him, and an acquaintance with him, that he may manifest himself to us, and for us, in toke of his favours to be in receipt with us. And it may reasonably be expected that affliction will bring those to God, that had long gone astray from him, and kept at a distance. Therefore God for a time turns away from us, that he may turn us to himself, and then return to us. Is any among you afflicted? Let him pray.

CHAP. VI. The closing words of the foregoing chapter gave us some hopes that God and his Israel, notwithstanding their sins and their world, might yet he happily brought together again; that they would seek him, and he would be found of them: now this chapter carries that matter further, and some join the beginning of this chapter with the end of that, They will seek me early, saying, Come, and let us return. But God did vain complacence in the declining-ness of this people; for though some did repent and reform, the greater part continued obstinate. Observe, I. Their resolution to return to God, and the comforts wherewith the Lord would encourage them to do it, and the assurance he would give them of the acceptance of their return, v. 1. 3. II. The instability of many of them in their professions and promises of repentance, and the severe course which God therefore took with them, v. 4, 5. III. The covenant God made with them, and his expectations from them; (v. 6.) their violation of that covenant, and frustrating of those expectations, v. 7.-11.

1. Come, and let us return unto the Lord: for he hath torn, and he will heal us: he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. 2. After two days will he revive us; in the third day he will raise us up, and we shall live in his sight. 3. Then shall we know, if we follow on to know the Lord: his going forth is prepared as the morning; and he shall come unto us as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth. These may be taken either as the words of the prophet to the people, calling them to repentance, as the words of the Lord to his Son, in encouraging and encouraging one another to seek the Lord, and to humble themselves before him, in hopes of finding mercy with him. God had said, In their affliction they will seek me; now the prophet and the good people his friends, would strike while the iron was hot, and set in with the convictions their neighbours seemed to be under. Note, Those who were disposed to seek the Lord, and found the Lord, God should encourage them, should do all they can to excite, and engage, and encourage others to return to him. Observe, I. What it is they engage to do; "Come, and let us return to the Lord, v. 1. Let us go no more to the Assyrian, nor send to king Jareb, we have enough of that, but let us return to the Lord, return to the worship of him from our idolatries, and come to our God for the spiritual breads of the world." Note, It is the great concern of those who have revolted from God, to return to him. And those who have gone from him by consent, and in a body, drawing one another to sin, should by consent, and in a body, return to him, which will be for his glory and their mutual edification. II. What inducements and encouragements to do this they fasten upon, to stir vp one another with.
1. The experience they had of his displeasure; "Let us return to him, for he has torn us, and has smitten; we have been torn, and it was he that tore us; we were burst asunder, and it was he that did it," therefore let us return to him, because it is for our revolts from him, that he has torn and smitten us in anger, and we cannot expect that he should be reconciled to us till we return to him; and for this end he has afflicted us thus, that we might be wrought upon to return to him; and his hand will be stretched out still against us, if the people turn not to him; (v. 1.)

Note, The consideration of the judgments of God upon us and our land, especially when they are fear judgments, should awaken us to return to God by repentance, and prayer, and reformation.

2. The expectation they had of his favour; "He that has torn, will heal us, that has smitten, will bind us up," as the skilful surgeon with a tender hand binds up the broken bone, or bleeding wound. Note, The same providence of God that afflicts his people, relieves them, and the same Spirit of God which convinces the saints, comforts them; that which is first a Spirit of bondage, is afterward a Spirit of adoption. This is an acknowledgment of the power of God; he can heal though we be ever so torn, and of his mercy he will do it; nay, therefore he that has torn, will heal us, and will bind us up. Some think these points particularly to the return of the Jews out of Babylon, when they sought the Lord, and joined themselves to him, in the prospect of his gracious return to them in a way of mercy. Note, It will be of great use to us, both for our support under our afflictions, and for our encouragement in our repentance, to keep up good thoughts of God, and of his purposes and designs concerning us.

Now this favour of God which they are here in expectation of, is described in several instances.

(1.) They promise themselves that their deliverance out of their troubles should be to them as life from the dead; (v. 2.) After two days he will revive us, that is, in a short time, in a day or two, and the third day, when it is expected that the dead body should putrefy and corrupt, and be buried out of our sight, then will he raise us up, and we shall live in his sight, we shall see his face with comfort, and it shall be reviving to us. Though he forsoke for a small moment, he will gather with everlasting kindness. Note, The people of God may not only be torn and smitten, but left for dead, and may lie so a great while; but they shall not always lie so, but rise up, and live, and be gathered and brought together to the place of God's inheritance; and the assurance given them of this should engage them to return, and adhere to him. But this seems to have a further reference, to the resurrection of Jesus Christ; and the time limited is expressed by the two days and the third day, that it may be a type and figure of Christ's rising the third day, which he is said to do according to the scripture, according to the figures foretold of him; from the figures witnessed of the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow. Let us see and admire the wisdom and goodness of God, in ordering the prophet's words so that when he foretold the deliverance of the church out of her troubles, he should at the same time point out our salvation by Christ, which other salvations were both figures and fruits of; and though they may appear to be obscure, yet they are not so, as they are sure it will come at the time appointed, and will not fail; and the light of his countenance will be both welcome to us, and growing upon us, unto the perfect day, as the light of the morning is. He shall come to us, and be welcome to us, as the rain, as the latter and former rain unto the earth, which refreshes it, and makes it fruitful. Now this looks perhaps rather to the morning of the day of rest, yet no doubt, was to have its full accomplishment in Christ, and the grace of the gospel. The Old Testament saints followed on to know him, earnestly looked for redemption in Jerusalem; and, at length, the outgoings of divine grace in him, in his going forth to visit this world, were, [v. 1.] As the morning to this earth when it is dark, for he went forth as the sun of righteousness, and in him the day-spring from on high visited us. His going forth was pre-poured as the morning, for he came in the fulness of time; John Baptist was his forerunner, nay, he was himself the bright and shining light. Up to the rain to this earth, yea, when it is dry; He shall come down as the rain upon the mean grass, Ps. lxxvi. 6. In him showers of blessings descend upon this world, which give seed to the sower and bread to the eater, Isa. lv. 10. And the favour of God in Christ is, what is said of the king's favour, like the cloud of the latter rain, Prov. xvi. 15. The grace of God in Christ is both the latter and the former rain, for by it the good work of our fruit-bearing is both begun and carried on.

4. O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? for your goodness is as a morning cloud, and as the early dew it goeth away. 5. Therefore have I heewed them by the prophets; I have slain them by the words of my mouth, and thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth. 6. For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings. 7. But they, like men, have transgressed the covenant: there have they dealt treacherously against me. 8. Gilead is a city of them that work iniquity, and is polluted with blood. 9. And as troops of robbers wait for a man, so the company of priests murder in the way by consent: for they commit lewdness. 10. I have seen a horrible thing in the house of Israel: there is the whoredom of Ephraim, Israel is defiled. 11. Also, O Judah, he hath set a harvest for thee, when I returned the captivity of my people.

Two things, two evil things, both Judah and Ephraim are here charged with, and justly accused of.

1. That they were not firm to their own convictions, but were unsteady, unstable as water; (v. 4).

5. O Ephraim, what shall I do unto thee? O Judah, what shall I do unto thee? This is a strange expression; Can Infinite Wisdom be at a loss what to do? Can it be perplexed, or put upon taking new measures? By no means; but God speaks after the manner of men, to show how absurd and unreasonable they were, and how just his proceedings against them were. Let them not complain of him as harsh and severe in terrors them, and smiting them, as he has done; for what else should he do? What other course could he take with them? God had tried various methods with them. (What could have been done more to his vineyard than he had done? Isa. v. 4.) and very least he was to let things go to extremity; he reasons with himself, (as ch. xi. 8, 9.) How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? God would have done them good, but they were not qualified for it; "What shall I do unto thee? What else can I do but cast thee off, when I cannot in honor or glory preserve thee?" Note, God, the gracious sovereign, in judging his sinners till he sees there is no other way with them. See here, 1. What their conduct was toward God; Their goodness, or kindness, was as the morning cloud. Some understand it of their kindness to themselves and their own souls, in their repentance; it is indeed mercy to ourselves to repent of our sins, but they too much trusted it. kindness to themselves, would it again, and wronged their own souls as much as ever; but it is rather taken for their piteous and religion; what good appeared in them some times, it soon vanished and disappeared again, as the morning cloud, or the morning dew is but a show or appearance, is not a true and certain blessing; and the goodness of Israel in Jein's time, and of Judah, in Hezekiah's and Josiah's time; it was soon gone. In time of drought, the morning cloud promises rain, and the early dew is some present refreshment to the earth; but the cloud is dispersed, (and hypocrites are compared to clouds without water, Josh. 1.) the dew does not sink into the ground, but is drawn back again into heaven; and therefore the kindness is parched still. What shall he do with them? Shall he accept their goodness? No, for it passes away; and factum non dictur quod non perseverat—That which continues not, can scarcely be said to be done. Note, That goodness never will be either pleasing to God, or profitable to ourselves, which is as the morning cloud, and the early dew. When men promise by kindness, or by promises of sin, and they begin well in religion, and do not hold on, when they leave their first love, and their first works, or, though they do not cast off religion, are yet unsteady, uneven, and inconsistent in it, then is their goodness as the morning cloud and the early dew.

2. What course God had taken with them; (v. 5.) Therefore because they were so rough and ill-treated, God had made them to go barefoot, and let their head or stone is heved for use; I have slain them by the words of my mouth. What the prophets did, was done by the word of God in their mouths, which never returned void. By it they thought themselves slain, were ready to say that the prophets killed them, or cut them to the heart, when they dealt faithfully with them. (1.) The prophets left them by convictions of sin, endeavouring to cut off their transgressions from them. They were uneven in religion, (v. 4.) therefore God heved them. The hearts of sinners are not only as stone, but as rough stone, which requires a great deal of pains to bring it into shape; or as knotty timber, that is not squared without a deal of difficulty; ministers' work is to hevem them, and God by the minister hevem them, for with the forward he will show himself forward. And there are those whom ministers must rebuke sharply; every word should cut, and though the chips fly in the face of the workman, though the reprieved fly in the face of the reprover, and reckon him an enemy because he tells the truth, yet he goes on with his work. (2.) They slew them by the denunciations of wrath, foretelling that they should be slain, as Ezek. xldii. (Tell the city of the destruction of it, Ezek. xliii. 3.) and God accomplished that which was foretold; "I have slain them by my judgments, according to the words of my mouth." Note, The word of God will be the death either of the sin or of the sinner; a savour either of life unto life, or of death unto death. Some read it, "I have heved the prophets, and slain them by the words of my mouth; I have commanded the sword, the sword for the people's good, which has wasted their strength, they have spent themselves, and hewed away all their spirits, in their work, and in hazardous service which has cost many of them their lives." Note Ministers are the tools which God makes use of in working upon people; and though with many they labour in vain, yet God will recompense the work out of his own heart; and he will not disannul the labour of ministers, but will be pleased with it. (God will hereby justified in the severest proceedings against them afterward. His prophets had taken a deal of pains with them, had admonished them of their sin and warned them of their danger, but the means used had not the desired effect; some good impressions perhaps were made for the present, but they wore off, and passed away as the morning cloud. How then shall I charge God with severity, if he bring upon them the miseries threatened. The prophet turns to him and acknowledges, Thy judgments are as the light that goeth forth, evidently just and righteous. Note, Though sinners be not exalted by the pains that ministers take with them, yet thereby God will be justified when he speaks, and clear when he judges. See Matth. xi. 17.—19.

II. That they were not faithful to God's covenant with them, 6, 7, &c. Where observe,

1. What the covenant was, that God made with them, and upon what terms they should obtain his favour, and be accepted of him; (v. 6.) I desired mercy, and not sacrifice, that is, rather than sacrifice, and insisted upon the knowledge of God, more than upon burnt-offerings. Mercy here is the same word which we rendered goodness, v. 4. these—favour—satisfaction, instead of sacrificial sacrifice, and it is the same with charity in the New Testament, the reigning love of God and our neighbour; and this accompanied with, and flowing from, the knowledge of God, as he has revealed himself in his word, a firm belief that he is, and is the Rewarder of them that diligently seek him, a good affection to divine things, guided by a good judgment, which cannot but produce a very good conversation; this is that which God by his covenant requires, and not sacrifice and offering. This is fully explained, Jer. vii. 22, 23. I take not to your fathers concerning burnt-offerings, (that was the smallest of the matters I spake to them of, and on which the least stress was laid,) but this I said, Obey my voice, Mic. vi. 6, 7. To love God and our neighbour is better than all burnt-offerings, and well accepted in the sight of the Lord; Ps. li. 16. Not but that sacrifice and offering were required, and to be paid, and had their use, and when they were accompanied with mercy and the knowledge of God, were acceptable to him, but, without them, God regarded them not, he despised them, Isa. i. 10, 11. Perhaps this is mentioned here, to show a difference between the God whom they deserted and the gods with whom they went over to. The true God aimed at nothing but that they should be good men, and live good lives for their own good, and the ceremony of honouring him with sacrifices was one of the smallest matters of his law; whereas the false Gods required that only; let their priests and altars be regaled with sacrifices and offerings, and the people might live as they list; what fools was it to build up a covenant of such a nature, that his worshippers a new nature, for gods who aimed at nothing but making themselves a new name! It is mentioned likewise to show that God's controversy with them was not for the omission of sacrifices, (I will not reprove thee for them, Ps. I. 8.) but because there was no justice, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God, among them; (ch. iv. 1.) and to teach us all that the power of godliness is the main thing God looks at and requires, and without it the form of godliness is of no avail. Serious piety in the heart and life is the one thing needful, and, separate from that, the performances of devotion, though ever so plausible, ever so costly, are of no account. Our Saviour quotes this, to show that moral duties are to be preferred before rituals, when they come in competition, and to justify himself in eating with publicans and sinners, because it was in mercy to the souls of men, and in healing on the sabbath-day, because it was in mercy to the bodies of men, to which the ceremony of singularity in eating and the sabbath-rest must give way, Matth. ix. 13.—xii. 7.

2. How little they had regarded this covenant. They had not regarded it in all things, though they, and not God, would be the gainers by it; yet see here what came of it.

(1.) In general they broke with God, and proved unfaithful; there were good things committed to them, to keep the jewels of mercy and piety, and the knowledge of God, in the cabinet of sacrifice and burnt-offering, but they betrayed their trust, kept the cabinet, but pawned the jewels for the gratifications of a base lust, and this is that for which God has justly a quartet with them; (v. 7.) They, like men, have transgressed the covenant, that covenant which God made with them; they have broken the conditions of it, and so forfeited the benefit of it. By casting over and over, and, burnt-offerings of God, and other instances of disobedience, (1.) They had contracted the guilt of perjury and covenant-breaking; they were like men that transgress a covenant by which they had solemnly bound themselves, which is a thing that all the world eres cut shame on; men that have done so, deserve not again to be valued, or trusted, or dealt with; "There, in that thing, they have dealt treacherously, (Ps. xiv. 2.) They have transgressed the covenant like men, like the Gentiles that transgressed the covenant of nature. Like mean men; the word here used is sometimes put for men of low degree, they have dealt deceitfully, like base men that have no sense of honour. (3.) Herein they trod in the steps of our first parents; they, like Adam, have transgressed the covenant; (so it might be, the words of the apostle to the city of Jerusalem, Rom. iv. 14.) Low thoughts of God and of his authority and favour was at the bottom of all this; for so some read it. They have transgressed the covenant, as of a man, as it had been but the covenant of a man, that stood upon even ground with them; as if the commands of the covenant were but like those of a man like themselves, and the knowledge of God a mere piece of innocency, so they transgressed the covenant of grace; so treacherously, so foolishly; there in paradise he violated his engagements to God, and there in Canaan, another paradise, they violated their engagements. And by their treacherous dealing they, like Adam, have ruined themselves and theirs. Note, Sin is so much the worse, the worse than in the sin of the nine peads of Adam's transgression, Rom. v. 14. [4.] Low thoughts of God and of his authority and favour was at the bottom of all this; for so some read it. They have transgressed the covenant, as of a man, as it had been but the covenant of a man, that stood upon even ground with them; as if the commands of the covenant were but like those of a man like themselves, and the knowledge of God a mere piece of innocency, so they transgressed the covenant of grace; so treacherously, so foolishly; there in paradise he violated his engagements to God, and there in Canaan, another paradise, they violated their engagements. And by their treacherous dealing they, like Adam, have ruined themselves and theirs.

(2.) Some particular instances of their treachery are here given. There they dealt treacherously, in the places hereafter named.

[1.] Look on the other side Jordan to the country which lay more exposed to the insults of the neighbouring nations, and where therefore the people were concerned to keep themselves under the divine protection; yet there you will find the most darting provocations of the Divine Majesty, v. 8. Gilgal, which lay in the lot of Gad, and the half tribe of Manasseh, was a city of the workers of iniquity. Wickedness was the trade that was driven there; by casting over and over, and burnt-offerings of God, but it was all called a city, because they were all as it were incorporated in one society of rebels against God. Or, (as most think) Ramoth Gilgal is the city here meant, one of the three cities of refuge on the other side Jordan, and a Levites' city; the inhabitants of it, though of the sacred tribe, were workers of iniquity, contrived it, and practised it. Note, It is bad indeed when a Levite's city is a city of those that work iniquity; when those that are to preach good doctrine, live life of evil. It is a great rebuke to them, as if they were a sin which the wicked Levites were in a special manner guilty of. In popish countries the clergy are observed to be the most bloody persecutors. Or, as it was a city of refuge, by abusing the power it had to judge of murders, it became polluted with blood. They would, for a bribe, protect those that were guilty of willful murder, whom they ought to have put to death; and would deliver them, in the name of the avenger of blood, who were guilty but of chance-medley, if they were poor, and had nothing to give them; and both these ways they were polluted with blood. Note, Blood defiles the land where it is shed, and where no inquisition is made, or no vengeance taken for it. See how the best institutions, that are ever so well designed to keep the balance even between justice and mercy, are capable of being abused and perverted to the manifest prejudice and violation of both.

[2.] Look among those whose business it was to minister in holy things; they were as bad as the worst, and as vile as the vilest; (v. 9.) The company of priests are so, not here and there one that is scandal of his order; but the whole order and body of them, the priests go all one way by consent, with one apiece, and all together. They murder those that they think a people, they are a people, and stand in their way; nothing less will satisfy them. Secondly, They were cunning; They laid wait for men, that they might have a fair opportunity to compass their mischievous, malicious designs; thus the company of priests laid wait for Christ, to take him, saying, Not on the feast-day. Thirdly, They were concaving as one man; They murder in the morning, and in the evening, and in the night, and they make one another worse, more daring, and fierce, and impudent, in sin; more crafty, and more cruel. A company of priests will say and do that in conspiracy, which none of them would dare to say or do singly. The companies of priests were as troops of robbers, as banditti, or gangs of highwaymen, that cut men's throats to get their money. First, They were cruel; and bloodthirsty; They murder those that they think a people, they are a people, and stand in their way; nothing less will satisfy them. Secondly, They were cunning; They laid wait for men, that they might have a fair opportunity to compass their mischievous, malicious designs; thus the company of priests laid wait for Christ, to take him, saying, Not on the feast-day. Thirdly, They were concaving as one man; They murder in the morning, and in the evening, and in the night, and they make one another worse, more daring, and fierce, and impudent, in sin; more crafty, and more cruel. A company of priests will say and do that in conspiracy, which none of them would dare to say or do singly. The companies of priests were as troops of robbers, as banditti, or gangs of highwaymen, that cut men's throats to get their money.

When I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria: for they commit falsehood; and the thief cometh in, and the troop of robbers spoileth without. 2. And they consider not in their hearts that I remember all their wickedness: now their own doings have beset them about; they are before my face. 3. They make the king glad with their wickedness, and the princes with their lies. 4. They are all adulterers, as an oven heated by the baker, who ceaseth from raising after he hath kneaded the dough until it be leavened. 5. In the day of our king the princes have made him sick with bottles of wine: he stretched out his hand with scorners. 6. For they have made ready their heart like an oven, while they lie in wait: their baker sleepeth all the night; in the morning it burneth as a flaming fire. 7. They are hot as an oven, and have devoured their judges: all their kings are fallen; there is none among them that calleth unto me.

Some take away the last words of the foregoing chapter, and make them the beginning of this; "When I returned, or would have returned, the captivity of my people, when I was about to come toward them in ways of mercy, even when I would have healed Israel, then the iniquity of Ephraim, the country and common people, was discovered, and the wickedness of Samaria, the court and the chief city.

Now, in these verses, we may observe, I. A general idea given of the present state of Israel, v. 1, 2. See how the case now stood with them.
1. God graciously designed to do well for them; he could have healed Israel. Israel were sick and wounded, their disease was dangerously malignant, and likely to be fatal, Isa. i. 6. But God offered to be their Physician, to undertake the cure, and there was balm in Gilead sufficient to recover the health of the daughter of his people; their case was bad, but it was not desperate, say, it was hopeful, when God would have healed them! (1.) They would have recovered their health, and would have been delivered out of the corruption that was among them, by his laws and prophets. (2.) He would have delivered them out of their troubles, and restored to them their peace and prosperity. Several healing attempts were made, and their declining state seemed sometimes to be in a hopeful way of recovery; but their folly put them back again. Note: If sinful, miserable souls be not healed and helped, but perish in their sin and misery, they cannot lay the blame on God, for he both could, and would, have healed them, he offered to take the rain under his hand. And there are some special seasons when God manifests his readiness to heal a distempered church and nation, when now and then a hopeful crisis, which carefully considered, might, even when the case is very bad, turn the scale for life and health.
2. They stood in their own light, and put a bar in their own door: When God would have healed them, when they bid fair for reformation and peace, then their iniquity was discovered, and their wickedness, and that stopped that current of God's favours, and undid all again. (1.) Then, when their case came to be examined and inquired into, in order to their cure, that wickedness which had been concealed and palliated, was found out; not that it was ever hid from God, but he speaks after the manner of men; as a surgeon, when he probes a wound in order to the cure of it, and finds that it touches the vitals, and is incurable, goes no further in his endeavour to cure it: so, when God came down to see the case of Israel, (as the expression is, Gen. xvii. 21.) with kind intentions toward them, he found their wickedness so very flagrant, and them so hardened in it, so impudent and importunate, that he could not in honour show them the favour he designed them. Note, Sinners are not healed, because they would not be healed; Christ would have gathered them, and they would not. (2.) Then, when some endeavours were used to reform and reclaim them, that wickedness which had been restrained and kept under, broke out; and from God's steps toward the healing of them they took occasion to be so much the more provoking. When endeavours were used to reform them, vice grew more impetuous and mischievous, so much the higher, as a stream when it is dammed up; when they began to prosper, they grew more proud, wanton and secure, and so stopped the progress of their cure. Note, It is sin that turns away good things from us, then when they are coming towards us; and it is the folly and ruin of multitudes, that, when God would do well for them, they do ill for themselves. An obnoxious, and spread the much mischief? In one word, they commit falsehood, they worship idols, (so some,) defraud one another, (so others,) or, rather, they dissolve with God in their professions of repentance, and regard to him. They say that they are desirous to be healed by him, and, in order to that, willing to be ruled by him; but they be hide him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue.
3. A practical disbelief of God's omniscience and government was at the bottom of all their wickedness; (v. 2.) They consider not in their hearts, they never say it to their own hearts, never think of this. They receive all their wickedness as if God either could not or would not be, though, he is all capable, and did not heed, though his name is Jealous, or had forgotten it, though he is an eternal Mind that can never be unmindful, or would not reckon for it, though he is the Judge of heaven and earth. This is the sinner's atheism; as good say that there is no God, as say that he is either ignorant or forgetful, that there are none that judges in the earth, as say that he remembers not the least event upon it; it is a high affront they put upon God, it is a damning cheat they put upon themselves; they say, The Lord shall not see, Ps. xcv. 7. They cannot but know that God remembers all their works, they have been told it many a time; nay, if you ask them, they cannot but own it, and yet they do not consider it; they do not think if it when they should, and with application to themselves and their own works, else they would not, they durst not, do as they do. But the time will come when those who thus deceive themselves, shall be unbecoming; "Now their own doings have beset them about; they are come at length to such a pitch of wickedness, that their sins appear on every side of them; they sit in the midst of them, and are there under the Lord's hand; and can they think that God does not see it?" Orr, p. 476, The punishment of their doings beset them about, they are surrounded and embarrased with troubles, so that they cannot get out; by which it appears that the sins they smart for are before my face; not only that I have seen them, but that I am displeased at them; for till God by pardoning our sins has cast them behind his back, they are still before his face. Note, Sooner or later, God will convince those who do not now consider it, that he remembers all their works.

4. God had begun to contend with them by his judgments, in earnest of what was further coming; The thief comes in, and the trooph of robbers spoil without. Some take this as an instance of their wickedness, that they robbed and spoiled one another; Nic horses had hospite tus.—The host and the guest stand in fear of each other. It seems rather to be a punishment of their sin; they were infested with secret thieves among themselves, that robbed their houses and shops, and picked their pockets, and troops of robbers, foreign invaders, that with open violence spoil abroad; so far was moral freedom from all possible surety and security, and wounds given them daily by robbers and spoilers. And all this the effect of sin, all to punish them for robbing God, Isa. xliii. 24. Mal. iii. 8, 11.

II. A particular account of the sins of the court, the kings and princes, and those about them, and the tokens of God's displeasure that they were under for them.
1. The king and princes were pleased with the wickedness and pravityness of their subjects, who were imbazoned thereby to be so much the more wicked; (v. 3.) They make the king and princes glad with their wickedness. It pleased them to see the people conform to their wicked laws and examples, in the worship of their idols, and other instances of impiety and immorality; and to hear them use one another and abuse God in their professions of repentance, and regard to him. They say that they are desirous to be healed by him, and, in order to that, willing to be ruled by him; but they be hide him with their mouth, and flatter him with their tongue.

Vol. IV.—5 Y
those about them, who will fill their ears with such stories; Prov. xxxix. 12. If a ruler hearken to lies, all his servants are wicked, and will make him glad with their lies.

2. Drunkenness and reveling abound much at the holiday of the king. (v. 1.) The day of our king was a merry day with them, either his birthday, or his inauguration-day, of which it is probable that they had an anniversary observation; or, perhaps, it was some holiday of his appointing, which was therefore called his day; on that day the princes met to drink the king's health, and got him among them, to be merry, and made him sick with bottles of wine. It should seem that the king did not ordinarily drink to excess, but he was now upon a high day brought to it by the artifices of the princes, tempted by the goodness of the wine, the gaiety of the company, or the healths they urged; and so little was he used to it, that it made him sick; and it is justly charged as a crime, as crimine base majestatis—treason, upon those who thus imposed upon him, and made him sick; nor would it serve for an excuse, that it was the day of their king, but was rather an aggravation of the crime, that when they pretended to do him honour, they dishonoured him to the highest degree. If it is a great affright and injury to a common person to make him drunk, and there is a wo to those that do it, (Hab. ii. 15.) much more to a crowned head; for the greater any man's dignity is, the greater is the crime of the violation of it. Thus it is for kings, O Lenael, it is not for kings, to drink wine, Prov. xxxi. 4, 5. See what a prejudice the sin of drunkenness is to a man, to a king. (1.) In his health; it made him sick; it is a force upon nature; and strange it is by what charms men, otherwise rational enough, can be drawn to that which, beside the offence it gives to God, and the damage it does to their spiritual and eternal welfare, is a present disorder and distress to their own bodies. (2.) In his honour; for, when he was thus intoxicated, he stretched out his hand with scorners; then he that was intrusted with the government of a kingdom, lost the government of himself, and so far forgot. [1.] The dignity of a king, that he made himself familiar with players and buffoons, and those whose company was a scandal. [2.] The duty of a king, that he should have no dealings with scorners and scoffers, the atheists, and the profane scoffers at religion, whom he ought to have silenced, and put to shame; he sat in the seat of the scornful, of those that are arrived at the highest pitch of impiety; he struck in with them, said as they said, did as they did, and exerted his power, and stretched forth the hand of his government, in concurrence with them. Goodness and good men are often made the song of the daughters ofardois; (Ps. lix. 12—xxxvi. 16.) but wo unto thee, O land, when thy king is such a child as to stretch forth his hand with those that make him so, Eccl. x. 16.

3. Adultery and uncleanness prevailed much among the courtiers. This is spoken of, v. 4, 6, 7; and that of drunkenness comes in in the midst of this. But that is to the end, Prov. xxiii. 33. Those that are inflamed with fleshly lusts, that are adulterers, (v. 4.) are here again and again compared to an oven heated by the baker; (v. 4.) They have made ready their heart like an oven, (v. 6.) they are all hot as an oven, v. 7. Note, (1.) An unclean heart is like an oven heated; and the unclean lusts and affections of it are as the fuel that makes it hot. It is an inward fire, it keeps the heat within itself; so adulterers and fornicators secretly burn in lust, as the expression is, Rom. i. 27. The heat of the oven is an intense heat, especially as it is here described; he that heats it, stirs up the fire, and ceases not from raising it up, till the bread is ready to be put in, being kneaded and leavened. (All which only signifies that they are like an oven when it is at the hottest. Nay, when it is too hot for the baker, (so the learned Dr. Pocock,) when it is hotter than he would have it, so that the raiser up of the fire ceases so long as while the dough that is kneaded in the oven rises.) The inordinate lusts of their hearts consist in a kind of latent, unexpressed, anavitated passion; a little fire hot are the lusts of an unclean heart. (2.) The unclean wait for an opportunity to compass their wicked desires; having made ready their heart like an oven, they lie in wait, to catch their prey. The eye of the adulterer waits for the twilight, Job xxiv. 13. Their baker sleeps all the night, but in the morning it burns as a flaming fire. As the baker, having kindled a fire in his oven, and laid sufficient fuel to it, goes to bed, and sleeps all night, and in the morning finds his oven well heated, and ready for his purpose; so these wicked people, when they have laid some wicked plot, and formed a design for the gratifying of some covetous, ambitious, revengeful, or unclean lusts, have their hearts so fully set in them to do evil, that, though they may stifle them for awhile, yet the fire of corrupt affections is still glowing within, and as soon as ever there is an opportunity for it, their purposes which they have compassed and imagined, break out into overt acts, as a fire flames out when it has vent given it. Thus they are all hot as an oven. Note, Lust in the heart is like fire in an oven, puts it into a heat; but the day is coming when, when their way shall be stretched forth as a fiery oven with their own vile affections, if that fire be not extinguished by divine grace, shall be made as a fiery oven by divine wrath, (Ps. xxi. 9.) when the day comes, that shall burn as an oven, Mal. iv. 1.

4. They resist the proper methods of reformation and redress; They have devoured their judges, these few good judges that were among them, that would have put out their fire with their reformation, and heated, they fell foul upon them, and would not suffer them to do justice, but were ready to stone them, and perhaps did so; or, as some think, they provoked God to deprive them of the blessing of magistracy, and to leave all in confusion; All their kings are fallen one after another, and their families with them; which could not but put the kingdom into confusion. They have devoured their judges, and among a great many other misdeeds, and occasions a great deal of bloodshed; there are heart-burnings among them, they are hot as an oven, with rage and malice at one another, and this occasions the devouring of their judges, the falling of their kings; for the transgression of a land many are the princes thereof; Prov. xxviii. 2. But in the midst of all this trouble and disorder, there is none among them that calls unto God, that sees his hand stretched out against them in these judgments, and deprecates the strokes of it; none, or next to none, that stir up themselves to take hold on God. Isa. lxiv. 7. Note, These are not only heated with sin, but hardened in sin, that continue to live without prayer, even when they are in trouble and distress. (3.) They have devoured their kings, 8. Or, they have devoured their strength, and he knoweth it not; yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, yet he knoweth not. 10. And the pride of Israel testifieth to his face; and they do not return to the Lord their God, nor seek him for all this. 11. Ephraim also is like a silly dove without heart: they call to Egypt, they go to Assyria: 12. When they shall go, I will spread my net upon them; I will bring them down as the bowls of the heaven; I will chastise them as their congregation hath heard. 13. Wo unto them! for they have fled from me; destruction unto them! because they have transgressed against me: though I have redeemed them, yet they have spoken lies against me. 14. And they have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds: they assemble themselves for corn and wine, and they rebel against me. 15. Though I have bound and strengthened their arms, yet do they imagine mischief against me. 16. They return, but not to the Most High; they are like a deceitful bow: their princes shall fall by the sword for the rage of their tongue. This shall be their derision in the land of Egypt.

Having seen how vicious and corrupt the court was, we now come to inquire how it is with the country; and we find that to be no better; no marvel if the distemper that has so seized the head, affect the whole body, so that there is no soundness in it; the iniquity of Ephraim is discovered, as well as the sin of Samaria, of the people as well as the princes, of which here are divers instances.

II. They were not jealous and distrust God, as they should have done. v. 8. They did not distinguish themselves from the heathen, as God had distinguished them; Ephraim, he has mingled himself among the people; has associated with them, and conformed himself to them, and has in a manner confounded himself with them, and lost his character among them. God had said, The people shall dwell alone; but they mingled themselves with the heathen, and learned their works, Ps. cxii. 3.

They went up and down among the heathen, to beg help of one of them against another; (so some;) whereas, if they had kept close to God, they had not needed the help of any of them. 2. They were not entirely devoted to God; Ephraim is a cake not turned; and is burnt on one side, and dought on the other side, but good for nothing on either side. As in Noah's time, so now, they threw themselves into God and Baal; sometimes they seemed zealous for God, but at other times as hot for Baal. Note, It is sad to think how many, who, after a sort, profess religion, are made up of contraries and inconsistencies, as a cake not turned; a constant self-contradiction, and always in one extreme or the other.

II. They were strangely insensible of the judgments of God, which they were under, and which threatened their ruin, v. 9. Observe, 1. The condition they were in; God was now to them, in his judgments, as a moth and as rottenness; they were silently and slowly drawing toward the ruin of their state; partly by the encroachments of foreigners upon them; Strangers have devoured his strength, and eaten him up; they have wasted his wealth and treasured store, lessened his numbers, and consumed the fruits of the earth. Some devoured them by open wars, (as 2 Kings xiii. 7. when the king of Syria made them like the dust by threshing;) others by pretending treaties of peace and amity, in which they extorted abundance of wealth from them, and made them pay dear for that which did them no good; and then, afterward they paid dearer for; as 2 Kings xvi. 9. This Ephraim got by mingling himself with the heathen, and suffering them to mingle with him; they devoured that which he rested upon, and supported himself with. Note, Those that make not God their Strength, (Ps. iii. 7;) make that their strength, which will soon be devoured by strangers. They were thus reduced, partly, by their own mal-administrations among themselves: Yea, gray hairs are here and there upon him, (are sprinkled upon him, so the word is;) the sad symptoms of a decaying, declining state, that is wasting old, and readily to vanish away, and effects of trouble and vexation.

Care turns to joy; The almondy-tree does not as yet flourish, but it begins to turn colour, which speaks aloud to him that the evil days are coming, and the years of which he shall say, I have no pleasure in them, Excl. xii. 1. 2. Their regardlessness of these warnings; He knows it not; he is not aware of the hand of God gone out against him; it is lifted up, but he will not see. Isa. vi. 11. He does not know how near his ruin is, and takes no care to prevent it. Note, Stupidity under lesser judgments is a presage of greater coming.

III. They went on frivolously in their wicked ways, and were not reclaimed by the rebukes they were under; (v. 10.) The pride of Israel still testifies to his face, as it had done before; (ch. v. 3;) under humble and providential visits, they were not humbly, their hearts unumbred; and it is through the pride of their countenance that they will not seek after God; (Ps. x. 4;) they do not return to the Lord their God by repentance and reformation, nor do they seek him by faith and prayer for all this; though they suffer for going astray from him, though it can never be well with them till they come back to him, and though they have in vain sought to others for relief, yet they think not of applying to God.

IV. They were infatuated in their counsels, and took very wrong methods when they were in distress; (v. 11, 12,) Ephraim is like a silly dove without heart. To be harmless as a dove without gall, and not to hurt or injure others, is commendable; but to be sottish as a dove without heart, that knows not how to defend herself, and provide for her own safety, is a shame. The silliness of this dove is, 1. That she lament not the loss of her young that are taken from her, but will make her nest again in the same place; so they have their people carried away by the enemy, and are not affected with it, but continue their dealings with those that deal barborously with them. 2. That she is easily enticed by the devil into that which has been forbidden her; she tarries, to discern her danger, as many other fowls do; (Prov. i. 17,) she hasteth to the shame, and knows not that it is for her life; (Prov. vii. 23,) so they were drawn into leagues with neighbouring nations that were their ruin. 3. That, when she is frightened, she has not courage to stay in the dove-house, where she is safe, and under the careful protection of her own, but flutters and hovers, seeking shelter, first in one place, then in another, and thereby exposes herself so much the more: so this people, when they were in distress, sought not to God, did not fly like the doves to their windows, where they might have been secured from all the birds of prey that struck at them, but threw themselves out of God's protection, and then called to Egypt to help them, and when they went in and out with their hearts not understanding in vain, which they might, by repentance and prayer, have found nearer home, in their God. Note, It is a silly, senseless thing for those who have a God in heaven, to trust to creatures for that refuge and relief that are to be had in him only; and they that do so, are a people of no understanding, they are without heart.
pursued by the justice of God. Here, (1.) They are ensnared; "I will spread my net upon them, bring them into straits, that they may see their folly, and think of returning." Note, It is common for those that go away from God, to find snares there where they expected shelters. (2.) They are humbled; they soar upward, proud of their foreign alliances, their inordinate loves, and wickedness, yet let them down, let them fly ever so high, as the fowls of heaven that are shot flying. Note, God can and will bring those down, that exalt themselves as the eagle, Obad. iii. 4. (3.) They are made to smart for their folly; I will chastise them. Note, The disappointments we meet with in the creature, when we put a confidence in it, are a necessary chastisement inflicted upon us, that we may be saved from another time. (4.) In all this, the scripture is fulfilled; it is as their congregation has heard; they have been many a time told by the word of God, read, and preached, and sung, in their religious assemblies, that vain is the help of man, that in the son of man there is no help; they have heard both from the law and from the prophets what judgments God would bring upon them for their wickedness; and as they have heard, now they shall see, they shall feel. Note, It concerns us to take notice of the word of God, which we hear from time to time in the congregation, and to be governed by it, for we must shortly be judged by it; and it will justify God in the condemnation of sinners, and aggravate it to them, that they have had plain public warning given them of it; it is what their congregation has heard many a time, but they would not take warning. "Son, remember thou wast told what would come of it; and now thou seest they were not vain words." Zech. i. 6.

V. They revoluted from God, and rebelled against him, notwithstanding the various methods he took to retain them in their allegiance, v. 13.—15. Where giver is more, Receiver is more. 1. How kindly and tenderly God had dealt with them, as a gracious Sovereign towards a people dear unto him, and whose prosperity he had much at heart. He had redeemed them; (v. 13.) brought them, at first, out of the land of Egypt, and, since, delivered them out of many a distress. He had bound and strengthened their arms; (v. 15.) when they were thus bound, as it were, he had, like an arm bound, out of joint, God set it again, and bound it, as the surgeon does a broken bone, to make it knit. God had given Israel victories over the Syrians, (2 Kings xiii. 16, 17.) had restored their coasts, (2 Kings xiv. 25, 26.) had girded them with strength for battle. Though I have chastened them, (so the margin reads it,) sometimes corrected them for their faults, and thereby taught them, at other times strengthen'd their arms, and relieved them, though I have used both fair means and foul to work upon them, it was all to no purpose, they were mercy-proof and judgment-proof.

2. How impudently their conduct had been toward him, notwithstanding; which is described here for the conviction and humiliation of all those who have gone on in any way of wickedness, that they may see how exceeding sinful their sin is, how heinous, how the God of heaven interprets it, how he resolves it. (1.) He had courted them to him, and taken them into covenant with himself; but they fled from him, as it he had been their dangerous Enemy, who had always approved himself their faithful Friend. They wand'red from him as the silly dove from her nest; for those who forsake God, will find no rest or settlement in the creature, but wander endlessly. They fled from God when they forsake the worship of him, and ran away from his service, and withdrew themselves from their allegiance to him. (2.) He had given them his laws, which were all holy, just, and good, by which he designed to keep them in the right way; but they transgressed against him, they sinned with a high hand, and a stiff neck, wilfully and presumptuously; (so the word signifies;) they broke through the tenes of the divine law, and therein thwarted the design of the divine love. (3.) He had made known his truths to them, and given them his word; they could not but be constrained to hear and Obey him; (as his word then was, so it was to them;) but yet they spake lies against him, and set up false gods in competition with him, they denied his providence and power; thus they belied the Lord, (Jer. v. 12.) they rejected his messages sent them by his prophets, and said that they should have peace, though they went on in sin, directly against what he said. In their hypocritical conduct, and presumption of devotion, and promises of amendment, they lied to the Lord, which he took as lying against him. (4.) He was their righteous Lord and King, and had always ruled in Jacob with equity, and for the public good; and yet they rebelled against him, v. 14. They not only went off from him, but took up arms against him; would have deposed him if they could, and set up another. (5.) He designed well for them, but they imagined mischief against him, v. 15. Sin is a mischievous thing, it is mischief against God, for it is treason against his crown and dignity; not that the sinners can do anything to hurt their Creator, (as one of the ancients observes on these words,) but what they can do; and it is so much the worse when it is not done by surprise, or through inadvertency, but designedly, and with contrivance. The Jews have a saying, which Dr. Pococke quotes here, "The thoughts of transgression are worse than the transgression." The designing of mischief is doing it, in God's account; compassing and imagining the death of the king is treason by our law. They that imagine an evil thing, though it prove a vain thing, (Ps. ii. 1.) will be reckoned with for the imagination.

3. How they shall be punished for this; (v. 13.) We unto them! for they have fled from me. Note, Those who fly from God, have woes sent after them, and are, without doubt, in a woeful case. The wrath of God is revealed from heaven against them, the word of God saith, We to them! And observe what follows immediately, Destruction unto them! The woes of God's word have real effects. The Jews have a saying, which Dr. Pococke quotes here, "The thoughts of transgression are worse than the transgression." The designing of mischief is doing it, in God's account; compassing and imagining the death of the king is treason by our law. They that imagine an evil thing, though it prove a vain thing, (Ps. ii. 1.) will be reckoned with for the imagination.

VI. Their shows of devotion and reformation were but shows, and in them they did but mock God.

1. They pretended devotion, but it was not sincere, v. 14. When the hand of God was gone forth against them, they made some sort of application to him. When he slew them, then they sought him. Lord, in trouble have they visited thee; but it was all in hypocrisy. (1.) When they were under personal troubles, and called upon God in secret, they were not sincere in that; They have not cried unto me with their heart, when they howled upon their beds. When they were chastened with pain upon their beds, and the multitude of their bones with strong pains, perhaps ill of the wounds they received in war, they cried, and groaned, and complained, in the forms of devotion, and it, may be, they used many good words, proper enough for the circumstances they were in, they cried, God help us, and, Lord, look upon us; but they did not cry with their heart, and therefore God reckons it was no crying to him. Moses is said to cry unto God, when he spake not a word, only his heart prayed, with faith and fervency, Exod. xiv. 15. These made a great noise, and said a deal, and yet did not cry to God, because their hearts were not right with him, not subjected to his will, devoted to his honour, or employed in his service. To pray is to lift up the soul to God, this is the essence of prayer; if that be not, words, though ever so well worded, are but wind; and if there be that, it is an acceptable prayer, though the grounds cannot be uttered. Note, to God, and not to men, is the true prayer in the spirit. Nay, God is so far from approving it, and accepting of it, that he calls it howling; some think it intimates the noisiness of their prayers, (they cried to God, as they used to cry to Baal when they thought he must be awakened,) or the bruitish, violent passions which they vented in their prayers; they startled at the stone, and howled under the wind, but they would not have the ground of their notes, that their hypocritical prayers were so far from pleasing God, that they were offensive to him; he was angry at their prayers; the songs of the temple shall be howlings, Amos vii. 3. God will be so far from pitying them, that he will justly laugh at their calamity, who have so often laughed at his authority. (2.) When they were under public troubles, and met together to implore God's favour, in that also they were hypocritically; they assembled themselves, for fashion's sake, because it was usual to call a solemn assembly in times of general mourning, Zeph. ii. 1. But it was only to pray for corn and wine that they came together, which was the thing they wanted, and feared being deprived of by the want of rain, the judgment they now laboured under. They pretended repentance, but no favour and grace of God, that God would give them repentance, pardon their sins, and turn away his wrath, but only that he would not take away from them their corn and wine. Note, Carnal hearts, in their prayers to God, covet temporal mercies only, and dread and deprecate no other but temporal judgments, for they have no sense of any other.

(1.) The sin of Israel. They return, they make show as if they would return, they take on them to repent and amend their doings, but they make nothing of it; they do not come home to God, nor turn to their allegiance; whereas God says, (Jer. iv. 1.) If thou wilt return, O Israel, return to me; do not only turn toward me, but return to me. This is dissimulation. This makes them like a deceitful bow, which looks as if it were fit for business, and is bent and drawn accordingly; but when strength comes to be laid to it, either the bow or string breaks, and the arrow, instead of flying to the mark, drops at the archer's foot. Such were their essays toward repentance and reformation. (2.) The sin of the princes of Israel; that which is charged upon them, is the rage of their tongue, quarrelling with God and his providence, and with all about them, when they are crossed. Princes think they may say what they will, and that it is their prerogative to huff and bluster, to curse and rail, and call names at their pleasure, but let them know there is a God above them that will call them to an account for the rage of their tongues, and make their own tongues to fall upon them. (3.) The punishment of Israel and their princes for their sin. As for the princes, they shall fall by the sword, either of their enemies, or of their own people, some by one, and some by the other; and this shall be their derision, this is that for which they shall be derided in the land of Egypt, when they flee to the Egyptians for succour, v. 11. Their sin and punishment shall make them a laughing-stock to all about them. Note, Those that are treacherous and deceitful in their dealings with God, and passionate and outrageous in their carriage towards men, will justly be made a derision to their neighbours, for they make themselves ridiculous.

CHAP. VIII.

This chapter, as that before, divides itself into the sins and punishments of the people; every sin has its burden and all to bring them to repentance. When they saw the malignant nature of their sin, in the descriptions of that, they could not but be convinced how much it was their duty to repent of it; and when they saw the miserable consequences of their sin, in the predictions of them, they could not but see how much it was their interest to repent for the preventing of them. 1. The sin of Israel is here set forth, v. 1. In many general expressions, v. 1, 3, 12, 14. 2. In many particular instances; setting up kings without God, (v. 4.) setting up idols against God, (v. 4, 6, 11,) and courting alliances; setting up estates for them, v. 1, 10. 3. In this aggravation of it, that they still kept up a profession of religion, and relation to God, v. 2, 13, 14. II. The punishment of Israel is here set forth as answering the sin. God's blast by setting an enemy upon them, v. 1, 3. All their projects shall be blasted, v. 7. Their conquests both in their idols and in their foreign alliances should disappoint them, v. 6, 8, 10. Their strength at home should fail them, v. 14. Their sacrifices should have no recompence made of them, and their sins should have a reckoning made for them, v. 13.

1. Set the trumpet to thy mouth: he shall come as an eagle against the house of the Lord, because they have transgressed my covenant, and trespassed against my law. 2. Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know thee. 3. Israel hath cast off the thing that is good: the enemy shall pursue him. 4. They have set up kings, but not by me; they have made princes, and I knew it not: of their silver and their gold have they made them idols, that they may be cut off. 5. Thy call, O Samaria, hath cast thee off; mine anger is kindled against them; how long will it be ere they attain to innocency! 6. For from Israel was it also: the workman made it; therefore it is not God: but the calf of Samaria shall be broken in pieces. 7. For they have sown the wind, and they shall reap the whirlwind: it hath no stalk; the bud shall yield no meal: if so be it yield, the strangers shall swallow it up.

The reproaches and threatenings here are introduced with an order to the prophet to set the trumpet to his mouth, (v. 1,) thus to call a solemn assembly, that all might take notice of what he had to deliver, and take warning by it. He must sound an alarm, must in God's name proclaim war with this rebellious nation; an enemy is coming with speed and fury to seize their land, and he must awaken them to expect it. Thus the prophet must do the part of a watchman, that was by sound of trumpet to call the besieged to stand to their arms, when he saw the besiegers making their attack, Ezek. xxxiii. 3. The prophet might lift up his voice like a trumpet, (Isa. lviii. 1.) and the people must hearken to the sound of the trumpet, Jer. vi. 17.

Now, 1. Here is a general charge drawn up against them as sinners, as rebels and traitors against their sovereign Lord. 1. They have transgressed my covenant, v. 1. They have not only transgressed the command, (every sin does that,) but they have transgressed the covenant, they have been guilty of such sins as break the original contract, they have revolted from their allegiance, and violated the marriage-covenant by their spiritual whoredom;
HOSEA, VIII.

they have, in effect, declared that they will be no longer God's people, nor take him for their God, that is transgressing the covenant; they have not only done foolishly, but have dealt deceitfully. 2. They have trespassed against my law, in many particular instances. God's law is the rule by which we are to walk; and this is the malignity of sin, that it trespasses upon the bounds set by that law. 5. They have cast off many of my covenants. They have cast away and rejected God; God himself; so some understand it, and very fitly. He is good, and does good, and is our Goodness. There is none good but one, that is God, the Fountain of all good. They have cast him off, as not desiring to have any thing more to do with him; God was abandoning them to ruin, and here gives the reason for it. Note, God never casts off any of his people: they first cast him off. Or, as we read it, They have cast off the thing that is good, they have cast off the service and worship of God, which is, in effect, casting God off. They have cast off that which denominates men good; they have cast off the fear of God, and the regard of man, and all sense of virtue and honesty. Observe; They have transgressed my covenant, it is here said; they have cast off many of my covenants. The covenants of God's law, breaking the command, and made way for breaking the covenant; and they did that, for they cast off that which was good; there it began first. They left off to be wise, and to do good, and then they went all to naught. Ps. xxxiii. 3. See the method of apostasy; men first cast off that which is good; then those omissions make way for making more and more. Note, God will not be wronged by a long time; he will not be the greater master of the temple, but he will not be left out of any bargain of the temple: but if we make it to point at the destruction of the kingdom of the ten tribes by the king of Assyria, we must reckon it is the body of that people, which, as Israelites, to whom pertained the adoption, the glory, and the covenants, is here called the house of the Lord. They thought their being so would be their protection; but the prophet is bid to tell them what now they had lost the life and spirit of their religion, though they still retained the name and form of it; they were but as a carcass to which the eagles and other birds of prey should be gathered together. The enemy shall pursue them as an eagle, so swiftly, so strongly, so furiously. Note, Those who break their covenant of friendship with God, expose themselves to the enmity of all about them, to whom they have lost the life and spirit of their religion; and their having been the house of the Lord, and his living temples, will be no excuse or refuge to them.

See Amos iii. 2.

III. Here is the people's hypocritical claim of relation to God, when they were in trouble and distress; (v. 2.) Israel shall cry unto me; when they cried, they were threatened with these judgments, and would plead their past compliance. Those who give themselves to God, and their judgments are inflicted on them, and they apply themselves to God for relief, pouring out a prayer, when God's chastening is upon them, they will plead that among them God is known, and his name is great, (Ps. lxxvi. 1.) and in their distress will pretend to that knowledge of God's ways, which in their prosperity they desired not, but despised. They will then cry unto God, will call him their God, and (as impudent beggars) will tell him they are well acquainted with him, and have known him many years. Note, There are people who walk deny God, and, when they are in trouble, yet, to serve a turn, will profess that they know him, that they know more of him than some of their neighbours do. But what stand will it stand a man in to be able to say, My God, I know thee, when he cannot say, "My God, I love thee, and my God, I serve thee, and cleave to thee only." V. Here is the prophet's expostulation with them, in God's name; (v. 3.) How long will it be ere they attain to innocency? It is not meant of absolute innocency; (that is what the guilty cannot never attain to;) but how long will it be ere they repent and reform; ere they become innocent in this matter, and free from the sin of idolatry? They are wedded to their idols; how long will it be ere they are weaned from them, ere they are able to get clear of them? VII. Here is the prophet's conclusion. This intimated that custom in sin makes it very difficult for men to part with it. It is hard to cleanse from that filthiness either of flesh or spirit, which has been long wallowed in. But God speaks as if he thought the time long till sinners cast away their iniquities, and come to live a new life. He complains of their obstinacy; that is it that keeps his anger against them burning, with which, if they did but attain to innocency from those sins that kindled it. They in trouble cry, How long will it be ere God return to us in a way of mercy; but they do not hear him ask, How long will it be ere they return to God in a way of duty? V. Here are some particular sins which they are charged with, are convicted of the folly of, and warned of the fatal consequences of; away if they did but attain to innocency from those sins that kindled it. They in trouble cry, How long will it be ere God return to us in a way of mercy; but they do not hear him ask, How long will it be ere they return to God in a way of duty? 1. In their civil affairs; they set up kings without God, and in contempt of him, v. 4. So they did when they rejected Samuel, in whom the Lord was their King, and chose Saul, that they might be like the nations; so they did when they revolted from their allegiance to the house of David, and set up other kings, and despised God, yet they neither aimed at his glory, nor consulted his oracle, nor applied themselves to him by prayer for direction, nor had any regard to his providence, but were led by their own humour, and hurried on by the impetuosity of their own passions; so they did now about the time when Hosea prophesied; when it seems to have grown fashionable to set up kings, and despise them again, as long as the contenders for the crown could make an interest, 2 Kings xvi. 8, &c. Note, We cannot expect comfort and success in our affairs, when we go about them, and go on in them, without consulting God, and acknowledge him in all our ways; "They set up kings, and I knew it not; I did not know it from them, they did not ask counsel at my mouth, whether kings and princes should rise up, or whether at all be best for them to do it, though they had prophets and oracles with whom they might have advised." They look not to the Holy One of Israel, Isa. xxxii. 1. Nor did the princes do as Jephthah, who, before he took upon him the government, uttered all his words before the Lord in Mizpeh, Judges xi. 11. Note, Those that are entered into with public consciences, and yoked therewith by the election of magistrates, ought to take God along with them therein, by desiring his direction, and designing his honour.

2. In their religious matters they did much worse;
for they set up calves against God, in competition with him, and contradiction to him. Of their silver and their gold which God gave them, and multiplied to them, that they might serve and honour him with it, they have made them idols; they called them gods, I Kings xii. 28. Behold this god, but God calls them idols; the word signifies griefs, or troubles, because they are offensive to God, and will be ruining to those that worship them; Their silver and their gold they have made to them idols; so the words are, referring primarily to the images of their gods, which they made of gold and silver, especially the golden calves at Dede, O Bethel. Idolaters spare no cost in worshipping their idols. But they are very applicable to the spiritual idolatry of the covetous; Their silver and their gold are the gods they place their happiness in, set their hearts upon, to which they pay their homage, and in which they put their confidence.

Now, to show them the folly of their idolatry, he tells them,

(1.) Whence their gods came. Trace them to their original, and you will find the creatures of their own fancies, and the work of their own hands, vi. 6. The calf they worshipped is here called the calf of Samaria, because it is probable that, when Samaria, in Ahaz’s time, became the most famous city, one of the calves was set up in the temple to be near the court, besides those at Dan and Bethel, or perhaps one of those was removed thither; for those that are for new gods, will still be for newer. Now let them consider what this god of theirs owed its rise and being to. [1.] To their own invention and institution; From Israel it was also. Not from the God of Israel, (be expressly forsworn of Israel,) but from them; it was a device of their own, some think, not borrowed from any of their neighbours, no, not from the Egyptians; for though they worshipped Apis in a living cow, they never worshipped a golden calf; that was from Israel, it was their own iniquity. Now could that be worthy of their worship, which was a contrivance of their own? It was from Israel; the gold and silver of which it was made, were collected from the people of Israel by a bribe; it was a poor god that was framed by contribution. [2.] It was owing to skill and labour of the craftsmen, Deut. xxviii. 15. ‘The workmen made it, therefore it is not God.’

This is a very cogent, conclusive argument, and the inference so very plain, that one would think their own conscience would have suggested it to them, so as to make them ashamed of their sin; and there could be more absurd than for men to worship that as a god, giving being and good to them, which they themselves gave being to, (both matter and form,) but could not give life to? A made god is no God. This is a self-evident truth; yet and St. Paul was accused as criminal for preaching that they be no gods, nor any altar, Acts xix. 27. And this which should have turned them from their idols, comes in as a reason why they were insensibly or perspicuously made to them; therefore they could not attain to innocence, because it was from themselves; they were willing to have gods of their own to do what they pleased with, that they themselves might do as they listed.

(2.) What their gods would come to. If they are not gods, they will not last; nay, if they pretend to be gods, they will be reckoned with; The calf of Samaria shall be broken to pieces, and those that would not yield to the force of the former argument shall be convinced by this, that it is not God, but an unprofitable idol, as the Chaldee calls it. It shall be broken to shivers, like a potter’s vessel, though it be a golden calf. It shall be chibs or saw-dust, it shall be a spider’s web. So St. Jerome. It seems to allude to Moses’s grinding the golden calf to powder that was in his time. This shall be served as that was; Sennacherib boasted what he had done to Samaria and her idols, Isa. x. 11. Note, Defiling any creature makes way for the destruction of it. If they had made vessels of silver and gold, they might have retained; but if they make gods of them, they shall be broken to pieces.

(3.) What their gods would bring to. The breaking of them to pieces would be a disappointment to those who trusted in them. But that was not all; They have made themselves idols, that they may be cut off; (so the Chaldee,) and that their gold and silver, which they so abused, may be cut off, (so some take it,) may, that they may themselves be cut off from God, from their own land, from the land of the living. Their idolatry will as certainly end in their extirpation as if they had purposely designed it. And when this proves to be the effect of their sin, what relief will they have from the gods wherein they trusted? None at all; ‘Thy calf, O Samaria, has cast thee off; it cannot give thee any help in thy distress, and the pleasure thou now takest in it will vanish, and be no pleasure to thee.’ Those that were justly sent to gods whom they had chosen, found them miserable comforters, Judg. x. 14. If men will not quit the love and service of sin, yet they shall certainly lose the delights and pleasure of it. If Samaria had continued firmly and faithfully to the God of Israel, he would have been a present, powerful Help to her; but the calf she preferred before him, was a broken reed. The case will be the same with those that make their silver and their gold their god. It will cast them off, and not profit them in the day of wrath, Ezek. xii. 12. Note, Those that suffer themselves to be engrossed with idols and idolatrous services, will certainly find themselves deceived in them. Cardinal Wesley owned that if he had served his God as faithfully as he had served his prince, he would not have cast him off, as his prince did, in his old age.

Their disappointment in their idols is illustrated (v. 7,) by a similitude which speaks both that, and the destruction which God brought upon them for their idolatry. [1.] They got no good to themselves by worshipping idols; They have sown the wind. They have put themselves to a great deal of trouble and expense, to make and worship their idols, have made a business of it as much as the husbandman does of sowing his corn, in expectation of reaping some mighty advantage from it, and that they should be as prosperous and victorious as the neighbour who sowed his corn was very. But it is all a cheat; it is like sowing the wind, which can yield no increase; they labour in vain, labour for the wind, Eecl. v. 16. They take great pains to no purpose, and weary themselves for very vanity, Hab. ii. 13. They that make an idol of this world, do so; they set their eyes on that which is fair and pleasing, the winds, as if it would make a great noise, but has nothing substantial in it, it will not only be a great contrivance to ruin upon themselves by it; They shall reap the whirlwind, a great whirlwind, (so the word signifies,) which shall hurry them away, and dash them to pieces. They not only have not their false gods for them, but they set the true God against them; their favour will stand in no more stead than the whirlwind’s; but the whirlwind has more mischief than a whirlwind. As a man sows, so shall he reap. ‘If it may be supposed that a man should sow the wind, and cover it with earth, or keep it there for awhile penned up, what could he expect but that it should be enforced by its being shut up, and the accession of what might increase its strength to do further gain in greater quantities with greater violence?’ So Dr. Pocock. They promise themselves plenty, peace, and victory, by worshipping idols, but their expectations come to nothing; what they sow never comes up; it has no stalk, no blade, or, if it have, the bud shall yield no meal, it shall be as the thin ears in Pharaoh's dream, that were blasted with the east wind; and there was nothing in them; or, if it yield, if they do prosper for a little while, they shall be as the stubble course; the strangers shall swallow it up, it shall be so far from doing them any service, that it shall be as but a bait to invite stringers to invade them, and as a spoil to enrich those strangers, and enable them to do so much the more mischief.

Note, The service of idols is an unprofitable service, and the works of darkness unfruitful; may this be a warning to the perseverance (Rom. vi. 21), the end of those things is death. That they sow iniquity, reap vanity: may the day, that sow to the flesh, reap corruption: the hopes of sinners will be cheats, and their gains will be snares.

3. Israel is swallowed up: now shall they be among the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure. 9. For they are gone up to Assyria, a wild ass alone by himself: Ephraim hath hired lovers.

10. Yea, though they have hired among the nations, now will I gather them, and they shall sorrow a little for the burden of the king of princes. 11. Because Ephraim hath made many altars to sin, altars shall be unto him to sin. 12. I have written to him the great things of my law, but they were counted as a strange thing. 13. They sacrifice flesh for the sacrifices of mine offerings, and eat it; but the Lord accepteth them not: now will he remember their iniquity, and visit their sins: they shall return to Egypt. 14. For Israel hath forgotten his Maker, and buildeth temples; and Judah hath multiplied fenced cities: but I will send a fire upon his cities, and it shall devour the palaces thereof.

It was the honour and happiness of Israel, that they had but one God to trust to, and he all-sufficient, in every strait; but one God to serve, and he well worthy of all their devotions; but it was their sin, and folly, and shame, that they knew not when they were well off; that they forsook their own mercies for kings' vanities; for,

I. They multiplied their alliances; (v. 9.) They have hired lovers, or, as the margin reads, They have hired loves. They were at great expense to purchase the friendship of the nations about them, that otherwise had no value or affection at all for them, nor cared for having any thing to do with them, but only upon the Shechemites' principles: Shall not the cattle and their substance be ours? Gen. xxxiv. 23. Had Israel maintained the honour of their peculiarity, the nations about would have continued to admire them as a wise and understanding people; but when they profaned their own crown, their neighbours despised them, and they had no interest in them further than they paid dear for it. But those surely have behaved ill among their neighbours, who have no loves, no lovers, but what they hire. See here,

1. The contempt that Israel lay under among the nations; (v. 8.) Israel is swallowed up, devoured by strangers, their land eaten up, (v. 7.) and themselves too, and being impoverished, they have quite lost their credit and reputation, like a merchant that is become a bankrupt, so that they are among, the Gentiles as a vessel wherein is no pleasure, a vessel of dishonour, (2 Tim. ii. 20.) a despised, broken vessel, Jer. xxii. 28. None of their neighbours had any value for them, nor care to have any thing to do with them. Note, Those that have professed religion, if they degenerate, and grow profane, are of all men the most contemptible; if the salt have lost its savour, it is fit for nothing but to be trodden under foot of men. Or, it denotes their desision and captivity among the Gentiles; they shall be among them poor and prisoners; and who has pleasure in such?

The time is come that Israel made to the nations notwithstanding; (v. 9.) They are gone to Assuria, to engage the king of Assyria to help them; and herein they are as a wild ass alone by himself; foolish, headstrong, and unrruly, they will have their way, and nothing shall hold them in, no, not the bridle of God's laws, nothing shall turn them back, no, not the sword of God's wrath. They take a course by themselves, and the effect will be that, like a wild ass by himself, they will be the easier and surer prey to the lion. See Job xi. 12. Jer. ii. 24. Note, Man is in nothing more like the wild ass's colt than in seeking for that succour and that satisfaction in the creature that are to be had in God only.

3. The crosses that they were likely to meet with in their alliances with the neighbouring nations; (v. 10.) Though they have hired among the nations, and hoped that it might be to profit them, now will I gather them, as the sheaves in the floor, Mic. iv. 12. So that what they provided for their own safety, shall but make them the easier prey to their enemies. Note, There is no fence against the judgments of God, when they come with commission; nay, that which men hire for their own preservation, often contributes to their own destruction. Isa. viii. 7. The king of Assyria, whose people they courted, called himself a king of princes, Isa. x. 8. Are not my princes altogether kings? He laid burdens upon Israel, levied taxes upon them. 2 Kings xv. 29. And for these they shall sorrow a little; this shall be but a little burthen to them, in comparison of what they may further expect; or, they will be but little sensible of this grievance, will bear it with patience, and therefore expect heavier judgments. They have begun to be diminished (so some read it) by the burden of the king of princes: but this is only the beginning of sorrows, (Matt. xxiv. 8.) the beginning of revenges, Deut. xxxii. 42. Note, God often comes gradually with his judgments upon a provoking people; that he may show how slow he is to wrath, and may awaken them to repentance; but that they are made to sorrow a little, if they are not thereby brought to sorrow after a godly sort, will another day be made to sorrow a great deal, to sorrow everlasting.

11. They multiplied their altars and temples. Observe, 1. How they denied the power of godliness, and willingly cast that off; (v. 12.) I have written to him the great things of my law; that speaks the privilege they enjoyed, as having God's statutes and judgments made known to them, and being intrusted with the lively oracles. Note, (1.) The things of God's law are magnalia Dei— the great things of God. They are things that speak the greatness of the Law-Maker, and the importance of and great welfare depends upon our observance of them, and obedience to them; they will make us great if we make a right use of them; and they are things which God will magnify and make honourable. (2.) It is a great privilege to have the things of God's law written; thus they are reduced to a greater ce tahat, spread the further, and last the longer, with much less danger of being embezzled and corrupted than if they were transmitted by word of mouth only. (3.) The things of God's law are of his own writing; for Moses and the prophets were his amanuenses, and holy men wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. (4.) It is the advantage of those that are members of the visible church, that these great things are written to them, are intended for their direction, and so they must receive them; what things were written in former ages were written for our learning, and are profitable for us. And if they were happy, who had the great things of God's law written to them, how much happier are we, who have the gospel written to us! But see how this privilege was slighted; these great things of the law were counted as a strange thing, as unintelligible and unreasonable, which might therefore be slighted, because not to be fathomed, not to be accounted for; or, as foreign, and things of no concernment to them; things that they had nothing to do with, nor were to be governed by; they used those things as strangles, which they were shy of, and knew not how to bid welcome; We desire not the knowledge of thy ways. Note, [1.] God having written us the great things of his law, we ought to make them familiar to us, as our nearest relations; (Prov. vii. 3, 4.) for, therefore we have them written, that they may talk with us. [2.] There is a vast difference between the things of God's law, if we make strange of them, as if they did not affect us, and therefore we need not be affected with them.

2. How they kept up the form of godliness, notwithstanding, and to what little purpose they did so.

(1.) They multiplied their altars; (v. 11.) Ephraim made many altars to sin. God appointed that there should be but one altar in Israel, (Deut. xii. 5.) but the ten tribes, having forsaken that, would still be thought very devout, and zealous for the honour of God, and, as if they would make amends for the affront they put on God's altar, they made many altars, dedicated to the God of Israel, whom hereby they intended, or, at least, pretended, to give glory to; but that would not justify their violation of God's righteous law, and affront both to God and to his people. The example of the patriarchs, who before the law of Moses had many altars. No, they made many altars to sin; they did that which turned into sin to them; and therefore these altars shall be into him to sin; God will charge it upon them as a heinous sin, and put that upon the score of their crimes, which they charged upon God. What are their crimes! Or, they shall be to him an occasion of further sin. Their multiplying of altars dedicated to the God of Israel, would introduce altars dedicated to other gods. Note, It is a great sin to corrupt the worship of God, and it will be charged as sin upon them that do it, how plausible soever their pretensions may be. And the way of this, as other sins, is downward; it being an humbleness of heart under the fixed rule of God's commands, will wander endlessly.

(2.) They multiplied their sacrifices, v. 13. Their altars were smoking altars, and they sacrificed flesh for the sacrifices of God's offerings, and they celebrated their feasts upon their sacrifices; they were at a great expense upon their devotions, and (as those commonly are, who set up their own inventions in the room of divine institutions) were very zealous in their way; as if they hoped by their impositions on themselves to atone for the contempt of the great atonement, and by their observing a ceremonial law of their own to excuse themselves from the obligation of all God's moral precepts. But how does it speed? [I.] God makes no reckoning of their services; The Lord accepts them not. How should he, when they did not offer their sacrifice upon that altar which alone sanctified that gift, and when they only sacrificed flesh, but not the spiritual sacrifice of a penitent, believing heart? Note, Those services only are acceptable to God, which are performed according to the rule of his word, and through Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. iii. 2. [2.] He takes that occasion to reckon with them for their sins, how now will he, instead of pardoning their iniquity, and blotting out their sins, as they expected, remember their iniquity, and visit their sins; such an abomination to the Lord are the sacrifices of the wicked, that they provoke him to call them to an account for all their other abominations; when they think by their sacrifices to bribe the Judge of heaven and earth into a concurrence at their way, they represent that as the highest affront they can put upon him, and it shall be the measure-filling sin. Note, A petition for leave to sin amounts to an impredication of the curse for sin, and so it shall be answered, according to the multitude of the idols, I will punish their sins; for they shall return to Egypt, they shall be carried captive into Assyria, which shall be to them a house of bondage, as Egypt was to their fathers. Or it refers to Deut. xxxii. 68, where returning to Egypt is made to close and complete the miseries of that sinful nation.

(3.) They multiplied their temples; and these also in honour of the true God, as they pretended, but really in contempt of the choice he had made of Jerusalem as his metropolis. In whom has forgotten his Maker, v. 14. They pretended to have forgotten him, and yet forgot him, for they liked not to retain God in their knowledge, when the remembrance of him would give check to their lusts: it was an aggravation of their sin in forgetting God, that he was their Maker, (Deut. xxxiii. 13, 18. Job xxxvi. 10.) as nothing obliges us more to remember him than that we are his children. [1.] He has forgotten his Maker, and builds temples; he seems by the temples he builds to be mindful of his Maker, and to be desirous still to keep him in mind, and yet really he has forgotten him, because he has cast off the fear of him. Some by temples here understand palaces, for so the word sometimes signifies. He has forgotten his Maker, and yet is so secure and easy that he doth not think himself in any danger, as Nebuchadnezzar did, when he said, Is not this great Babylon that I have built? Judah is likewise charged with multiplying fenced cities, and trusting in them for safety, when the judgments of God were abroad. To fortify their cities in subjection and subordination to God, was well enough; but to fortify them in opposition to God, and without any regard to him or his providence, (Isa. xxv. 11.) shows their hearts to be desperately hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. But none ever hardened his heart against God, and prospered; nor shall they; God will send a fire upon his cities, upon the cities both of Judah and Israel, not only the head cities of Jerusalem and Samaria, but all the other cities of these two kingdoms, and it shall devoure the city of Assyria, and all the towns thereof; though ever so strong, the fire shall master them; though ever so stately and sumptuous, the fire shall not spare them. This was fulfilled when all the cities of Israel were laid in ashes by the king of Assyria, and all the cities of Judah. The fires they both kindled, were of his sending; and when he judges, he will overcome.

CHAP. IX.

In this chapter, I. God threatens to deprive this degenerate seed of Israel of all their worldly enjoyments, because by sin they have so offended him; so little to them, so that they should have no comfort either from the gifts of nature or themselves, or in offering them to God, v. 1-5. II. He dooms them to utter ruin, for their own sins, and the sins of their prophets, v. 6-8. III. He upbraids them with the wickedness of their fathers before them, whose steps they trod in, v. 9, 10. IV. He threatens them with the destruction of their children, and the rooting out of their posterity, v. 11, 17.

1. Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy, as other people: for thou hast gone a whoring from thy God; thou hast loved a reward upon every corn-floor. 2. The floor and the wine-press shall not feed them, and the new wine shall fail in her. 3. They shall not dwell in the Lord's land; but Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and they shall eat unclean things in Assyria. 4. They shall not offer wine-offerings to the Lord; neither shall they please unto him: their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners; all that eat thereof shall be polluted: for their bread for their soul shall not come into the house of the Lord. 5. What will ye do in the solemn day, and in the day of the feast of the Lord? 6. For, lo, they are gone because of destruction: Egypt shall gather them up, Memphis shall bury them: the pleasant places for their silver, nettles shall possess them: thorns shall be in their tabernacles.

Here.

I. The people of Israel are charged with spiritual adultery; O Israel, thou hast gone a whoring from thy God, v. 1. Their covenant with God was a marriage-covenant, by which they were joined to him as their God, renouncing all others. But when they set up idols and worshipped them, when they fled to creatures for succour, and put a confidence in them, they went a whoring from God, as their God, and honoured the pretended and rivals with the affection, adoration, and confidence which were due to God only. Other people were idolaters, but that sin was not in them, going a whoring from God, as it was in Israel that had been married to him. Note, The sins of those who have made a profession of religion and relation to God, are more provoking to him than the sins of others. As a proof of the going a whoring from God, he charges upon them that they loved a reward upon every corn-floor: 1. They loved to give rewards to their idols, in the offerings and first-fruits they presented to them out of every corn-floor. They took a strange pleasure in serving their idols with that which they would have grudged to consecrate to God, and employ in his service. Note, It is common for those that are niggardly in the expenditure of their substance, to be very prodigal in spending upon their lusts. Or, 2. They loved to receive rewards from their idols; and such they reckoned the fruits of the earth to be; These are my rewards, which my lovers have given me, ch. ii. 12. Note, These are directly disposed to spiritual idolatry, that love a reward in the corn-floor better than a reward in the favour of God and eternal life. Note, They are forbidden to rejoice as other people do; Rejoice not, O Israel, for joy. Do not expect to rejoice; What peace, what joy, what hast thou to do with either, while thy whoredoms and witchcrafts are so many? 2 Kings ix. 19, 22. Be not disposed to rejoice, for it does not become thee, but rather to be afflicted, and mourn, and weep, Jer. iv. 9. Judah, that keeps close to the true God, may, and other people, that never knew him, nor could ever be charged with revolting from him, may be allowed to rejoice, as not having so much cause to be ashamed as Israel has, that has gone a whoring from him. Some think that they had at this time, particular occasions for joy, upon the account either: of some losses recovered, or some advantages gained, or some league made with a potent ally, for which they had public rejoicings, as other people used to have upon such occasions; but God sends to them now a call to not rejoice, Joah. When they are at peace, they are to be affected, and mourn, and weep.

II. The Lords land.

1. What it was which they rejoiced in, would be no security or advantage to them, so long as they were at a distance from God, and at war with him. Note, We are likely to have small joy of any of our creature-comforts, if we make not God our chief joy. 2. There is no sense of sin and danger of wrath ought to be a damper upon their joy, and a strong and full their comforts. Note, Those who by departing from God have made work for repentance, have thereby marred their own mirth, till they return, and make their peace with God.

III. They are threatened with destroying judgments for their spiritual whoredoms, according to what it was said long before; (Ps. lxviii. 27.) Thou hast destroyed thine ownOTCMKTHE SOWING OF 1899.

The 2d Lesson, John iv. 19, 22. The Lord is mine, says God, xxv. 23. They had used it, or abused it rather, as if it had been their own, had not paid the rent, nor done the services, due to God as their Landlord, and therefore God justly enters, and takes possession of it, they having forfeited their lease; It is my land, (says God,) and I will make it appear, for they shall be turned off, as bad tenants, and be made to know that they had been the worse, the worse, the worse, the better; for theirs. Note, It is for the honour of God's justice and holiness, that those who go a whoring from God, should not be supposed to dwell upon his land; and therefore, sooner or later, the wicked shall be chased out of the world. Or, it is called the Lords land, because it was the holy land, Immanuel's land, the land that had peculiar tokens of God's favour to it, and presence in it, where God was known, and his name was great, where God's prophets and oracles were; it was a kind of copy of the earthly paradise, and a type of the heavenly paradise. If they had enjoyed it, they might have a lot in such a land as this; it was a great sin and folly to rebel against God, and go a whoring from him, in such a land as this, to deal unjustly in a land of uprightness, Isa. xxvi. 10. And it was a sad and sore judgment to be driven out from such a land as this; it was like driving our first parents out of the garden of Eden, and almost amounted to an exit from the presence of God. Note, Those cannot expect to dwell in the Lord's land, that will not be subject to the Lord's laws, nor be influenced by his love. Those have forfeited the privileges of the church, that conform not to the rules of it.

3. That, when they are turned out of the Lord's land, they shall have no rest or satisfaction in any other land. When Cain was driven out from the presence of the Lord, he was a fugitive and a vagabond. So here: they shall be turned out of the land of Canaan. Note, Those cannot expect to dwell in the Lord's land, that will not be subject to the Lord's laws, nor be influenced by his love. Those have forfeited the privileges of the church, that conform not to the rules of it.

4. That in the land of their enemies, to which they shall be driven, they shall have no opportunity either of giving honour to God, or obtaining favour with their enemies, or doing them any good; they shall not be in a capacity of keeping up any face or show of religion among them; "And so (as Dr. Pocock expresses it) "should be as it were quite cut off from any expression of relation to him, from all signs of grace, and means of reconciliation with him, which would be to them a token of their being rejected of God, estranged from him, and no more owned by him as his people."

(1.) They shall have no sacrifices to offer, nor any altar to offer them on, or priests to offer them; they shall not so much as offer drink-offerings to the Lord, much less any other sacrifices. (2.) If they should offer them, neither they nor their sacrifices shall be pleasing to him, for they cannot have any legal offerings, nor are their hearts humbled. (3.) Instead of their sacrifices of joy and gladness, they shall eat the bread of mourners; they shall live desolate and disconsolate, mourning for the death of their relations and their own miseries, so that if they had opportunity of sacrificing, they should never be themselves in a frame fit for it; for they were forbidden to eat of the holy things in their mourning, Deut. xxvi. 14. All that eat of the bread of mourners, are polluted, and incapacitated to partake of the altar. (4.) Their bread for their soul, the bread which they must either eat or starve, the bread which they shall have for the support of their lives, shall not come into the house of the Lord; they shall have no house of the Lord to bring it to, or if they had, it is such as is not fit to be brought, nor are they able to bring it.

5. The return of the days of their sacred and solemn feasts would therefore be very melancholy and uncomfortable to them; (v. 5.) What will you do in the solemn day, in the sabbath, the solemn day of every week, in the new moons, the solemn days of every month, at the return of the times for keeping the passover, pentecost, and feast of tabernacles, the solemn days of every year, the days of the feasts of the Lord? Note, The feasts of the Lord are solemn days; and when we are invited to these feasts, we ought to consider seriously what we shall do. But the question is here put to those who were to be deprived of the benefit and comfort of those solemn feasts; What will you do then? You will then spend those days in sorrow and lamentation, which, if it had not been your fault, you might have been spending in joy and praise. You will then be made to know the worth of mercies by the want of them, and to prize spiritual bread by being made to feel a famine of it.

Note, When we enjoy the means of grace, we ought to consider what we shall do if ever we should know the want of them; if either they shall be taken from us, or we be disabled to attend upon them.

6. That their land, which they left behind, and to which they hoped to return, should become a desolate and desolate land, when they return to it; it shall be barren, and barren forever; if they should return, they should not return to a land of delights, but to a land of desolation, when they return to their own land, where their relations and their own property shall be turned out of the land of Canaan; and when they return to their own land restored, they shall find it not fruitful nor habitable, it would afford them neither food nor lodging. Note, Those that make the Lord their God, reckon the places of their silver their pleasant places, as those that make the Lord their God, reckon their tabernacles amiable, and his ordinances their pleasant things, Isa. lvii. 11. But while the pleasures of communion with God are out of the reach of change and change, the pleasant places of men's silver, which were purchased with silver, or in which they denied that silver, or which were bought and adorned with silver, are liable to be laid in ruins, in nettles, and with all the pleasure men took in them.

7. The days of visitation are come, the days of recompense are come; Israel shall know it: the prophet is a fool, the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity, and the great hatred. 8. The watchman of Ephraim went with my God but the prophet is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and hatred in the house of his God.

9. They have deeply corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah: therefore he will remember their iniquity, he will visit their sins.

10. I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness; I saw your fathers as the first-ripe in the fig-tree at her first time: but they went to Baal-peor and separated themselves unto that shame; and their abominations were according as they loved.

For their further awakening, it is here threatened,

11. That the destruction spoken of shall come speedily; they shall have no reason to hope for a long reprieve, for the judgment slumbers not, it is at the doors; (v. 7) The days of visitation are come, and there shall be no more delay; the days of recompense are come, which they have been so often warned to expect; their prophets have told them that destruction would come, and now it is come, and the time of the divine patience is expired. Note, The days of visitation are come, in which men's sins are inquired into, and brought to light, and a day of recompense, in which men's dooms will be passed, and a reward given to every man according to his work; the strict visitation is in order to a just retribution. 2. This day of visitation and recompense is hastening on apace; it is sure, it is near, as if it were already come.

12. That hereby they should be made ashamed of their sentiments concerning their prophets. When the day of visitation comes, Israel shall know it, shall be made to know that by sad experience, which they would not by instruction. Israel shall know then what an evil and bitter thing it is to despise from God, and what a fearful thing it is to fall into his hands; when thy hand is lifted up, they will not see, but they shall see. Israel shall know the difference between true prophets and false. 1. They shall know then that the pretenders to prophecy, who flattered them in their sins, and rocked them asleep in their security, and told them that they should have peace, though they went on, however they pretended to be spiritual men, (as Ahab's prophets did, 1 Kings xxii. 24.) were fools and madmen, and not true prophets; they deceived themselves, and those to whom they prophecied. But why would God suffer his people Israel to be imposed upon by those false prophets? He answers, It is for the multitude of thine iniquity, which, in contempt of the divine law, hath persisted in, and for the great hatred of the true prophets, that reproved thee, in God's name, for it. Note, Because men receive not the love of the truth, but con- cieve a hatred of it, and do not like to have their iniquities defined to, therefore God shall send them strong delusions, to believe a lie, so strong, that they shall not be undeceived till the day of visitation and recompense comes, which will convince them of the folly and madness of those that seduced them, and of their own folly and madness in suffering themselves to be seduced by them. 2. They shall know then whether the true prophets, that God hath set over Israel (as Ahab's prophets were such as they called and counted them, fools and madmen; and they shall be convinced that they were so far from being so, that they were the wise men of their times, and God's faithful ambassadors to them. When Israel saw that none of Samuel's words fell to the ground, they knew he was established to be a prophet; (1 Sam. iii. 20.) and who, when God fulfils the word of his messengers, by bringing the days of recompense they foretold, then those that despised and ridiculed them, and thought Bedlam the fittest place for them, will be ashamed of the multitude of their iniquities of that kind, and of their great hatred, for which God brings upon them this swift destruction. Mocking the messengers of the Lord was the sin they were punished for, and so made ashamed of.

13. That hereby the wickedness of the false prophets thereby should be displayed to their shame; (v. 8.) The watchman of Ephraim was with my God; he had been formerly, they had a set of worthy, good ministers, that kept close to God, and maintained communion with him; but now they have a race of corrupt, malignant, persecuting prophets, that are the ringleaders of all mischief. Or, The watchman of Ephraim now pretends to have been with my God, and preaches his lies with The watch the Lord; but he is a snare of a fowler in all his ways, and is cunning to draw the simple into sin, and the upright into trouble; and he is so full of hatred and enmity to goodness and good men, that he is become hatred itself in the house of his God, or against the house of his God. Note, Wicked prophets are of all others the worst of men; their sins against God are most heinous, and their plots against the best rulers. They may boast that they are watchmen, speculators, and as far as speculation goes, they may be right, and with my God, may have their heads full of good notions; but look into their lives, and they are the snare of a fowler in all their ways, catching for themselves, and making a prey of others; look into their hearts, and they are hatred in the house of my God; very malicious and spiteful against good ministers and good people. Whither unto thee, O land, unto thee, O church, that hast such watchmen, such prophets; that are seers, but not doers! Corruptio optimi est pes sima.—The best things, when corrupted, become the worst.

14. That God would now reckon with them for the sins of their fathers which they trod in the steps of.

15. They were as bad as their fathers; They have deeply corrupted themselves, they are rooted and rivetted in sin, they are far gone in the depths of Sat- an, (Isa. xxxxi. 6.) so that it is next to impossible that they should be recovered; the stain of their corruption is deep, not to be got out, it is as scarlet and crimson, or as the spots of the leprous; and it is their own fault, they have corrupted themselves, have polluted and stained themselves. Then of the days of Gibeah, when the Levite's concubine was abused to death by the men of Gibeah, and the whole tribe of Benjamin patronized the villany; that was a time of deep corruption indeed, and such were the present days. Lewdness and wickedness were as imputable and daring now as in the days of Gibeah; and therefore what can be expected but such vileness and baseness? Every tribe is now as bad as the tribe of Benjamin then was, and therefore may expect to be brought as low as that tribe then was.

2. They shall therefore be reckoned with for their father's sins; He will remember their iniquity, and visit their sins, the iniquity they have by kind and by entail, the sin that runs in the blood, the sin of the fathers will be visited upon the children; and hence God takes occasion to upbraid them with the degeneracy and apostacy of their ancestors, their perfidiousness and base ingratitude, v. 10. Where observe, (1.) The great honour God put upon Israel, when he first formed them into a people; I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness; he took as much delight and pleasure in them as a poor traveller would do if he found grapes in a wilder- ness; where he most needed them, and least ex expected them. Or, when they were in the wilderness, he found them as grapes, not precarious in themselves, but precious to him, and pleasant as the first-ripe grapes to the lord of the vineyard. They were precious in his sight, and honourable; (Isa. xliii. 4.) he planted them a choice vine, a right seed, (Jer. ii. 21.) and found them no better than he himself made them, good grapes at first; I saw them with pleasure, as the first-ripe in the fig-tree at the first time; good people are compared to the good flowers that are first ripe. Jer. xxiv. 2. One thing is worth more than many after. This speaks the delight God took in them, and in doing them good; not for their sakes, but because he loved their fathers. He preserved them carefully, as a man does the first and choicest fruits of his vineyard. Now when he put all this honour upon them, and they stood so fair for promotion, one would think they should have maintained the good excellence; but, (2.) See the great disgrace they put upon themselves. God set them apart for himself as a peculiar people, but they went to Baal-peor, joined with the Moabites in sacrificing to that dirty dunghill-deity, (Numb. xxv. 2, 3.) and they separated themselves unto that shame, that shameful idol, so Baal-peor was in a particular manner to make alike of them and the people committed with the daughters of Moab, was a part of the service done to Baal-peor. Note, Whatever those separate themselves to, that forsake God, it will certainly be a shame to them, first or last. Their abominations are here said to be as they loved; their practices which were an abomination to God, were as the best-beloved of their souls. Or, When they had once forsaken God, they multiplied their abominations, their idols and abominable idolatries, at their pleasure. This was the way of their fathers; God had done well for them, but they had acted ungratefully toward him, and in the same manner had the present generation deeply corrupted themselves.

11. As for Ephraim, their glory shall flee away like a bird, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. 12. Though they bring up their children, yet will I bereave them, that there shall not be a man left: yea, wo also to them when I depart from them! 13. Ephraim, as I saw Tyrus, is planted in a pleasant place: but Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer. 14. Give them, O Lord! what wilt thou give? give them a miscarrying womb and dry breasts. 15. All their wickedness is in Gilgal; for there I hated them; for the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of my house, I will love them no more: all their princes are revolters. 16. Ephraim is smitten, their root is dried up, they shall bear no fruit; yea, though they bring forth, yet will I slay even the beloved fruit of their womb. 17. My God will cast them away, because they did not hearken unto him: and they shall be wanderers among the nations.

In the foregoing verses, we saw the sin of Israel derived from their fathers; here we see the punishment of Israel derived to their children; for as death entered by sin at first, so it is still entailed with it.

We may observe in these verses, 1. The sin of Ephraim. Some expressions are here, which speak that, 1. They did not hearken to God, (v. 17.) they did not give attention to the voice either of his word or of his rod. They did not believe what he said, nor would they be ruled by him. He told them their duty, their interest, their danger, but they regarded him not; all he said to them by his words and by his prophets, was to them as a tale that is told; and then no wonder that we hear, 2. Of the wickedness of their doings, (v. 15.) the downright malice that was in their sins; they were not infirmities, but during present evil came over them. 3. They were so hard hearted to the word of God, that would teach and persuade them to do well? And no wonder that there were wicked doings among them, when, 3. Their worship is corrupt; (v. 15.) All their wickedness is in Gilgal; which was a place infamous for idolatry, as appears, ch. iv. 15.—xii. 11. Amos iv. 4.—v. 5. It is probable that the idolaters chose their head-quarters, because it had been famous in other ages for solemn transactions between God and Israel, as Josh. v. 2, 10. 1 Sam. x. 8.—xi. 15. There, where the source of idolatry was, whence it spread through the kingdom, there it might be said, that all their wickedness was, for all other wickedness owed its original to that; corruptions in worship are the springs of corruptions in conversation, and therefore God, as their head, would not overlook, even in his word, their head-quarters, because it had been famous in other ages for solemn transactions between God and Israel. Hence he mentions Gilgal in particular, because it was a sort of Chíseh, or central place of idolatry, the mother of all her abominations; Rev. xvii. 5. The learned Groton conjectures that there is a mystical sense here. Golgotha in Syria is the same with Gilgal in Hebrew, and therefore he thinks this may have reference to the putting of Christ to death at Golgotha, which was the greatest sin of the Jewish nation, and of which they could not but think; it may be said, All their wickedness was summed up in that. And no wonder that the people did wickedly, both in worship and conversation, when, 4. All their princes were revolters; the whole succession of the kings of the ten tribes did evil in the sight of the Lord; or, all the set of judges and magistrates at this time were wicked; they turned aside to sinful ways, and persisted in these ways.

II. The displeasure of God against Ephraim for sin. This is variously expressed here, to show what a provocation sin is to the pure eyes of his glory, and how cold it makes the sinner to him. 1. He departs from them, v. 12. When they revolt from him, and withdraw from their allegiance to him, how can they expect but that he should depart from them, and withdraw both his protection and his bounty? And how may his angry people, who in the most bitter distresses are as it is, and made terrible; Wo also unto them when I depart from them! Note, Those are in a woful condition indeed, whom God has forsaken. Our yearly or wo depends upon the gracious presence of God with us; and if he goes, all woal goes with him, and all woes come upon us. God has forsaken him; persecution and take him. Some knew this when he said such an accent upon the part of his command, and the Philistines make war against me, and God is departed from me. Nay, he does not only depart from them, but, 2. He hates them; in Gilgal, where all their wickedness is, there I hated them. There where the abominations of sin are committed, there God abominates the sinners. In Gilgal he had bestowed many tokens of his favour upon their ancestors, but there is the place where he hates them for their base ingratitude. Nay, he not only hates them, but, 3. He will love them no more, will never take them into his favour again; the breach between God and Israel is wide as the sea, which cannot be healed. This agrees with what he had said, (ch. i. 6, 7.) I will no more have mercy upon the house of Israel, because of all the abominations which they have done, and have no more to do with them; For the wickedness of their doings I will drive them out of my house. He will no longer own them as his, or as belonging to his family in the world; he will turn them out of doors as unfaithful tenants that pay him no rent, as unprofitable servants that do him neither credit nor work. Note, Those that profane God's house, can expect no other than to be expelled his house, and no longer suffered to be either lodgers in it, or retainers to it. Nay, he will not only drive them out of his house, but, 3. He will drive them to enough (v. 17.) My God will cast them away, not only out of his house, but out of his sight: he will quite abandon and reject them, they shall be cast-aways. God said that he would drive them out of his house, and here the prophet seconds it, as one that knew his Master's mind very well; My God will cast them away. See with what comfort and pleasure he calls God's name (v. 11.) In fulfillment of this promise, and are disowned by him, it is a very great satisfaction to good people that they can call God their God, can cheerfully own him, and see themselves owned by him; all revolters, all ruined, yet God is my God.

III. The fruit of this displeasure, in the cutting off and abandoning of their posterity, which is the judgment here threatened again and again. Observe here,

1. How numerous Ephraim was likely to be; the name Ephraim is derived from fruitful, Gen. xii. 52. Joseph is a fruitful bough, Gen. xlix. 22. And Moses's blessing foretold the ten thousands of Ephraim, Deut. xxxiii. 17. This was his glory, (v. 11.) for this he seemed designed by him that appoints the bounds of men's habitations, for Ephraim, as I now Ephraim, is planted in a pleasant place, to encourage his increase; which one may expect as from a tree planted by the river's side. Ephraim is as strong and rich as ever Tyre was, and as proud and secure. The Chaldee Paraphrase gives this sense of it, The congregation of Israel, while they observed the law, was like to Tyreus in prosperity and security.

2. How few Ephraim should be; (v. 11.) Their glory shall fly away, like a bird; their children shall be taken away, and the hopes of their families cut off. All their glory shall fly as an eagle toward heaven, swiftly and irrecoverably. Note, Worldly glory is glory that will fly away; but they that have their God's glory, have in him an unchanging, everlasting glory. Ephraim has been as a fruitful tree; but now Ephraim is smitten, is blasted, the root is to be dried up, they shall bear no fruit. v. 16. If the root be dried, the branch must wither of course.

Observe, (1.) God's threatening this judgment, of the destroying of their children. [1.] They shall perish of themselves by the immediate hand of God; (v. 11.) They shall fly away, from the birth, and from the womb, and from the conception. Some of their children shall die as soon as they are born, the cradle shall be presently turned into a coffin; others of them shall be still-born, or the womb shall be their grave, and their death there, their mother's death too; of others, their mothers shall miscarry almost as soon as they have conceived, and they shall be as unfruitful see. How easily God can, and how justly we are sure he might, root out the whole race of mankind, that degenerate, guilty, obnoxious race, and blot out the name of it from under heaven; it is but doing as he does by Ephraim here, writing them all childless, making all their glory to fly away from the birth, the womb, and the conception, driving up their root, that they bear no fruit, and their business is done in a few years. [2.] They shall perish by the hand of their enemies; they shall die violent deaths; (v. 12.) Though they bring up their children to some maturity, though they escape the diseases and deaths which the infant age is liable to, and are thought to be reared past danger, yet will I bereave them, (v. 12.) by one judgment or other, so that there shall not be a man left, to build up their families, and bear up their name. Again, (v. 13.) Ephraim shall bring forth his children to the murderer; the mother shall travail with pain, to bear her children, and a deal of care and pains and cost shall be bestowed upon the nursing of them. And when a cruel enemy comes, and puts all to the sword, young and old, without mercy, then they seem but as lambs that were all this while fed for the slaughter. Note, It is a great allay to the comfort parents have in their children, that they know not what they have brought them forth, and brought them up, for, perhaps, for the murderer, or, which is worse, to be themselves the plagues of their generation. It is threatened against them, (v. 16.) Though they bring forth, I will slay all of the fruit of their womb, those children that they are most fond of. Note, The parents' love is no security to the children's lives; nay, sometimes death is commissioned to take the darlings of the family, and leave the burdens of it. When sentence was passed upon Israel in the wilderness, that they should all perish there, this mercy was mixed with the wrath, that their children should nevertheless enter into that rest, which they through unbelief could not enter into; but this here is a total and final rejection; even their children shall all be cut off, and the land shall eschew to the crown, ob defectum sanguinis—shall be lost for want of heirs. The Chaldee Paraphrase, and many of the rabins, by the murderers to which the children were brought forth, understand those that sacrificed the children of Ephraim, a number of the young and poor parent, which shewed the parents void of bowels, and justly left them void of blessings. [3.] Those few that escape, and remain, shall be despised; (v. 17.) They shall be wanderers among the nations; so the remains of the Jews are at this day, and there is no place in the world where they are a distinct nation.

(2.) The prophet's prayer relating to it; (v. 14.) Give them, O Lord; what shall I give? What shall I ask for a people thus doomed to destruction? It is this; since the decree is gone forth, that they must either die from the womb, or be brought forth for the murderer; of the two let them rather die from the womb. Rather let them have no children than have them to be made miserable; for the same reason when a total ruin was coming on the Jewish nation, Christ said, Blessed is the womb that never bare, and the laps that never gave suck, Luke xxi. 29. Give therefore a miscarrying womb and dry breasts: for it is better to fall into the hands of the Lord, whose mercies are great, than into the hands of man. Note, Those that are childless, may with this reconcile themselves to the will of God herein, that the time may come, when, if they were not so, they would wish they had been so.

CHAP. X.

In this chapter, I. The people of Israel are charged with gross corruptions in the worship of God, and are threatened with the destruction of their images and altars, v. 1, 2, 4, 6, 9, 10. They are charged with the abuse of the administration of the civil government, and are threatened with the ruin of that, v. 3, 4, 7. III. They are charged with imitating the sins of their fathers, and with security in their own sins, and are threatened with smarting humiliation, and with a repetition of judgments, v. 9, 11. IV. They are earnestly invited to repent and reform, and are threatened with ruin if they did not, v. 12, 13.

I. ISRAEL is an empty vine, he bringeth forth fruit unto himself: according to the multitude of his fruit he hath increased the altars; according to the goodness of his land they have made good images. 2. Their heart is divided; now shall they be found faulty: he shall break down their altars, he shall spoil their images. 3. For now they shall say, We have no king, because we feared not the Lord; what then should a king do to us? 4. They have spoken words, swearing falsely in making a covenant: thus judgment springeth up as hemlock in the furrows of the field. 5. The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear because of the calves of Beth-aven: for the people thereof shall mourn over it, and the priests thereof that rejoiced on it, for the glory thereof, because it is departed from it. 6. It shall be also carried unto Assyria for a present to king Jareb: Ephraim shall receive shame, and Israel shall be ashamed of his own counsel. 7. As for Samaria, her king is cut off as the foam upon the water. 8. The high places also of Aven, the sin of Israel, shall be destroyed: the throne and the thistle shall come up on their altars, and they shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us.

Observe,

1. What the sins are which are here laid to Israel's charge, as national sins which bring down national judgments. The prophet deals plainly with them; for what good would it do them to be flattened?
2. They were not fruitful in the fruits of righteousness, to the glory of God. Here all their other wickedness began: (v. 1.) Israel is an empty vine. The church of God is fitly compared to a vine, weak, and of an unpromising outside, yet spreading and fruitful; believers are branches of that vine, and partake of its root and fitness. But this was the character of Israel, they were as an empty vine, a vine that had no sap or virtue in it, and therefore none of those good fruits produced by it, that were expected from it, with which God and man should be honoured. Note, There are many who, though they are not become degenerate vines, are yet empty ones, and may be said to have no spirit or life in them. As an empty vine is of all trees least serviceable, if it do not bear fruit. It is thenceforth good for nothing, Ezek. xx. 3, 5. And they that bring forth no grapes, will soon come to bring forth wild grapes; they do that do good, will do hurt. He is an empty vine, for he brings forth fruit to himself: What good there is in him, is not directed to the glory of God, but he takes the praise of it to himself, and prides himself in it. Christians live not to themselves, (Rom. xiv. 6.) but hypocrites make self their centre; they eat and drink to themselves, Zech. vii. 5, 6. Or, Israel is by the judgments of God emptied and spoilt of all his wealth, because he made use of it in the service of his lusts, and not to the honour of God who gave it him. Note, What we do not rightly employ we may not consider as fruit for ourselves, (v. 3.) and that they multiplied their altars and images, and the more beautiful God's providence was to them, the more prodigal they were in serving their idols: According to the multitude of his fruit which his land brought forth, he has increased the altars, and according to the goodness of his land, they have made goodly images. Note, It is a great affront to God, and an abuse of his goodness, when the more mercies we receive from him, the more sins we commit against him: and when the more wealth men have, the more mischief they do. Should not we therefore be thus abundant in the service of our God, as they were in the service of their idols? As we find our estates increasing, we should proportionably abound in more works of piety and charity.
3. Their hearts were divided, v. 2. (1.) They were divided among themselves; they were at variance about their idols, some for one, some for another, at variance about their kings, whose separate interests were in opposition, yet the hearts of Israel were divided, for their very hearts were divided, and alienated one from another, and there was no such thing as cordial friendship to be found among them; it follows therefore, Now shall they be found faulty. Note, The divisions and animosities of a people are the causes of national ruin, and the presages of ruin. (2.) They were divided between God and their idols. They had been divided off from God, but a reigning affection for their idols; They hated between God and Baal, that was the dividing of their heart. But God is the Sovereign of the heart, and he will by no means endure a rival; he will either have all, or none. Satan, like the pretended mother, says, Let it be neither thine nor mine, but divide it; but if that be yielded to, God says, Nay, thou shalt not divide me. A heart divided will be found faulty, and be rejected as treacherous in covenanting with God. Note, A heart divided between God and Mammon, though it may trim the matter so as to appear plausible, will, in the day of discovery, be found faulty.
4. They made no conscience of what they said, and what they did, in the most solemn manner, v. 4. (1.) Not of what they said in swearing, which is the most solemn of all oaths: They said, 1. False words, and words only, for they meant not as they said; they did verba dare—give words; they swore falsely in making a covenant, they were deceitful in their covenanting with God, the covenant of circumcision, the fair promises they made of reforming, when they were in distress; and no marvel if those that were false to their God, were false to all mankind; they contracted such a habit of treachery, that they broke through the most sacred bonds, and made nothing of them; subjects violated their oaths of allegiance, and their kings their coronation oaths; they broke the leagues with the nations they were in alliance with, nor was any conscience made of contracts between private persons. (2.) Nor of what they did in judgment, which is the most solemn of all actions; they did, 1. What they said they did; for it was said and done, for nothing of forsaking themselves for this judge, which is a man's soul, Zech. ix. 14. So much of their lives was occupied with nothing but the right judgment, which should have been a healing, medicinal plant, and of a sweet smell, strang ut hemlock, which is both nauseous and noxious, in the furrows of the field, in the field that was ploughed and furrowed for good corn. Note, God is greatly offended with corruptions, not only in his own worship, but in the administration of justice between man and man, and the dishonesty of a people shall be the ground of his controversy with them as well as their idolatry and impiety; for God's laws are intended for man's benefit and the good of the community, as well as for God's honour. And the profanation of courts of justice shall be avenged as surely as the profanation of temples.
5. Their judgments are, with which Israel should be punished for these sins; they sinned both in civil and religious matters, and in both they shall be punished.
1. They shall have no joy of their kings, and of their government. Because justice is turned into oppression, therefore those who are intrusted with the administration of it, and should be blessings to the state, shall be consigned to the just damnation of all sinners. (v. 3.) and they that would not rule their people well, should not be able to protect them: Now they shall say, We have no king; we are as if we had none, we have none to do us any good, or stand us in any stead, none to keep us from destroying ourselves, or being drugged by our enemies, none to preserve the public peace, or to fight our battles; and justly is this come to us, for we have grieved not the Lord, when we were safe under the protection of our kings, therefore we are rejected by him; and then what shall a king do for us? What good can we expect from a king, when we have forfeited the favour of our God?" Note, Those that cast off the fear of God, are not likely to have joy of any of their creature-comforts; nor will men's loyalty to their prince befriend them without religion, for their present prosperity is no evidence that they will be secure in the good will that do them, if God be against them. Those that keep themselves in the fear and favour of God, may say, with triumph, "What can the greatest of men do against us?" But those that throw themselves out of his protection, must say, with despair, "What can the greatest of men do for us?" He was a king that said, If the Lord do not help thee, whom shall I help thee in? Yet he is a fool that says, If a king cannot help us, we must perish; (as these intimate here,) for God can do that for us which kings cannot. Time was, when they voted upon having a king; but now what can a king do for them, a being who, they thought, could do any thing? God can make people sick of those creature-confidences which they were most fond of. This is their complaint, when their king is disabled to help them: But the true reason why their civil government shall not only be weakened, but quite destroyed; (v. 7.) As for Samaria, the royal city, which is now almost all that is left, her king is cut off as the foam from the water. The foam swims uppermost, and makes a great show upon the face of the water, yet it is but a heap of bubbles raised by the troubling of the water; such were the kings of Israel, after their removal from the Ark of God, a mere scum, their government had no foundation; no better are the greatest of kings when they set up in opposition to God; when God comes to contend with them by his judgments, he can as easily disperse and dissolve them, and bring them to nothing, as the froth upon the water.

2. They shall have no joy of their idols, and of their worship of them. And miserable is the case of such people, whose gods fall them when their kings do.

(1.) The idols they had made, and the altars they set up in honour of them, should be broken down, and spoiled, and carried away, as common plunder, by the victorious enemy; He shall break down their altars. God shall do it by the hand of the Assyrian, the Assyrian shall do it by order from God; he shall destroy their images. v. 2. Note, What men make idols of, it is just with God to break down and spoil. But the calf at Bethel was the sovereign idol, that was it which the inhabitants of Samaria doted most upon; now it is here foretold that that should be destroyed; The glory of it is departed from it, (v. 5.) when it is thrown down and defaced, no more to be worshipped; but that is not all, It shall also be carried to Assyria, (some think the calf at Dan was some time delivered to Assyria, for 1 Kings xii. 30, it was carried to him as a rich booty, for it was a golden calf, and, probably, adorned with the gifts and offerings of its worshippers,) and as a trophy of victory over their enemies; and what more glorious trophy could they bring than this, or more incontestable proof of an absolute conquest; Thus it is said, The sin of Israel shall be destroyed, (v. 8.) the idols, which they made the matter of their sin: it is said of them, They became a sin to all Israel, 1 Kings xii. 30. Note, If the grace of God prevail not to destroy the love of sin in us, it is just that the providence of God should destroy the food and fuel of sin about us. With the idols, the high places shall be destroyed, high places of Aven, of Bethaven, (v. 5.) or Bethel; it was called the house of God, (so Bethel signifies,) but now it is called the house of idols by men, iniquity itself. The kings did not, as they ought to have done, take away the high places, by the sword of justice, and therefore God will take them away by the sword of war. So that the thorn and the thistle shall come up on their altars; they shall lie in ruins. Their altars, while they stood, were as thorns and thistles, offensive to God and good men, and fruits of sin and the curse, justly therefore are they buried in thorns and thistles.

(2.) The destruction of their idols, their altars, and their high places, shall be the occasion of sorrow and shame and terror to them. [1.] It shall be an occasion of sorrow to them. When the calf at Bethel is broken, the people thereof shall mourn over it. They looked upon the calf to be the protector of their nation, and, when that was gone, thought they must all be undone, which made the poor ignorant people, that were deluded into the love of it, take on bitterly as Micah did; (Judg. xviii. 24.) Ye have taken away my gods, and what have I more? The priests that had rejoiced in it, shall now mourn for it with the people. Note, Whatever men make a god of, they will mourn for the loss of; and inordinate sorrow for the loss of anything good is a sign of a made idol of it. They used to be very merry in the worship of their idols, but now they shall mourn over them; for sinful mirth shall sooner or later be turned into mourning. [2.] It shall be an occasion of shame to them; (v. 6.) Ephraim shall receive shame, when he sees the gods he trusted to carried into captivity in putting such confidence in them, and paying such adoration to them, God's ark, and the other gods were thrown down, when the people were doting on them, which shows that the contempt of the former, and the veneration for the latter, were the sins for which God visited them. [3.] It shall be an occasion of fear to them; (v. 5.) The inhabitants of Samaria shall fear; they shall be in pain for their gods, and afraid of losing them; or, they shall be in fear, for they shall have no fear of their children and families, when they see the judgments of God breaking in upon them, and beginning with their idols, as he executed judgment against the gods of Egypt, Exod. xii. Thus idolaters are brought in trembling, when God arises to shake terribly the earth, Isa. ii. 21. And here, (v. 8.) They shall say to the mountains, Cover us; and to the hills, Fall on us. The supporters of idolatry (Rev. vi. 13, 16.) are brought in, calling thus in vain to rocks and mountains to shelter them from God's wrath.

9. O Israel, thou hast sinned from the days of Gibeah; there they stood: the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them. 10. It is in my desire that I should chastise them; and the people shall be gathered against them, when they shall bind themselves in their two furrows. 11. And Ephraim is as a heifer that is taught, and loveth to tread out the corn; but I passed over upon her fair neck: I will make Ephraim to ride; Judah shall plough, and Jacob shall break his yokes. 12. Sow to yourselves in righteousness, reap in mercy; break up your fallow ground: for it is time to seek the Lord, till he come and rain
13. You have plowed wickedness, you have reaped iniquity: you have eaten the fruit of lies: because you did trust in your way, in the multitude of thy mighty men. 14. Therefore shall a tumult arise among thy people, and all thy fortresses shall be spoiled, as Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle: the mother was dashed in pieces upon her children. 15. So shall Beth-el do unto you because of your great wickedness: in a morning shall the king of Israel be utterly cut off.

Here,

I. They are put in mind of the sins of their fathers and predecessors, for which God would now reckon with them. It was told them, (ch. ix. 9.) that they had corrupted themselves, as in the days of Gibeah, and here (v. 9.) Q Israel thou hast sinned since the days of Gibeah. Not only the wickedness that was committed in that age, is revived in this, and acted, a copy from that original, but the wickedness that was committed in that age, has been continued in a constant series and succession through all the intervening ages down to this; so that the measure of iniquity had been long in filling; and still there had been a dealing in that which had been sinned more than in the days of Gibeah; (so it may be read;) the signs of this age exceed those of the worst of former ages. The case was bad then, for them they stood, the criminals stood in their own defence, and the tribes of Israel, who undertook to chastise them for their wickedness, were at a stand, when both in the first and in the second battle the murderers were the victors; and the battle in Gibeah against the children of iniquity did not overtake them till the third engagement, and then did not overtake them all, for 600 made their escape. But they sin is worse than theirs, and therefore thou canst not expect but that the battle against the children of iniquity should overtake thee, and overcome thee.

II. They have warning given them, fair warning of the judgments of God, that were coming upon them, v. 10. God had hitherto pitied and spared them; though they had been very provoking, he had a mind to try whether they would be wrought upon by patience and forbearance; but now, It is in my desire that I should chastise them; it is what I have a purpose of, and will take pleasure in. He will rejoice over them to do them hurt, Deut. xxviii. 63. Which is a pointed way of expressing the pleasure that God hath to take in the ruin of the wicked; for it is a natural consequence of his justice and righteousness, that he should delight in their going down to destruction, and that he should rejoice in their miseries; for sin is as an iniquity against the original of the creature, against the goodness of God, and against the principles of the soul's nature; and therefore it is that God should delight in it, and should rejoice in it, and should have pleasure in it. So the apostle speaks, Gal. vi. 7, 8. Every action is seed sown; Let them sow to themselves in righteousness; let them sow to righteousness, that they may reap in righteousness, for the fruit of the spirit is in all virtue and prudence, 1 Cor. x. 8. For they are not sown to the flesh; for they are not sown to bring forth fruit of the flesh, for they are sown to death, and they are sown to resurrection again, v. 10. Or, When I shall bind them for their two transgressions; so the margin reads it, meaning their corporal and spiritual whoredom, which they so often changed the person of God into Baal, and Baal-berith; or those two great evils mentioned, Jer. ii. 13. Or, When I shall bind them to their two favours; bring them into servitude to the Assyrians, who shall keep them under the yoke as oxcen in the plough, who are bound to the two favours up the field and down it, and dare not for fear of the goad, stir a step out of them. The Chaldee says, Those that are gathered against them shall exercise dominion over them, in like manner as a pair of heifers are tied to their two furrows. Thus they that would not be God's freemen, shall be their enemies' slaves, and shall be made to know the difference between God's service and the service of the kingdoms of the countries. 2 Chron. xvi. 11.

III. They are made to know that their unaccounted with sufferings and hardships should not excuse them from a very miserable captivity, v. 11. See how nice, and tender, and delicate, Ephraim is; he is as an heifer that is taught to tread out the corn, and loves that work, because being not so brawny, she has liberty to eat at pleasure, and work it with dry and easy, and both its diversion and its own water, and is more tender. But, says God, I have a yoke to put upon her fair neck, fair as it is. I will make Ephraim to ride; I will take them, or cause them to be ridden by the Assyrians and other conquerors that shall rule them with rigour, as men do the beasts they ride upon; (Ps. lxxvi. 12.) and Judah too shall be made to plough, and Jacob to break the clods; they shall be used hardly, but not so hardly as Ephraim. Note, It is just with God to make those know what hardships mean, that indulge themselves too much in their own ease and pleasure. The learned Dr. Pocock inclines to another sense of these words, as speaking the tender, gentle methods God took with his people, to bring them into obedience to his law, as a reason why they should receive that correction; for he should remember what he had sinned more than in the days of Gibeah; for he should remember that as a heifer loves that work, because being not so brawny, she has liberty to eat at pleasure, and work it with dry and easy, and both its diversion and its own water, and is more tender, so Jacob and Judah are made to plough the clods, and are employed in the observance of precepts proper for them; and yet they would not be retained in their obedience, but started aside.

IV. They are invited and encouraged to return to God by prayer, repentance, and reformation, v. 12, 13. See here,

1. The duties they are called to. They are God's husbandry; (1 Cor. iii. 9.) and the duties are expressed in language borrowed from the husbandman's calling. If they would not be brought into bondage by their oppressors, let them return to God's service. (1.) Let them break up the fallow ground; let them cleanse their hearts from all corrupt affections and lusts, which are as seeds and thorns, and let them be humbled for their sins, and be of a broken and contrite spirit, in the sense of them; let them be full of sorrow and shame at the remembrance of them, and prepare to receive the divine precepts, as the ground that is ploughed is to receive the seed, that it may take root. See Jer. iv. 5. (2.) Let them sow to themselves in righteousness; let them set their hearts on righteousness, and then themselves in righteousness, and do all their works, according to the law of God, which is the rule of righteousness; let them abound in works of piety toward God, and of justice and charity toward one another, and herein let them sow to the Spirit, as the apostle speaks, Gal. vi. 7, 8. Every action is seed sown; Let them sow to righteousness; let them sow what they should sow, do what they should do, and then they are made to have the benefit of it.

2. The arguments used for the pressing of these duties. Consider, (1.) It is time to do it; it is high
